He was always ready to render service. The last time I saw him it was to ask if he would be willing at an irregular hour and on an unusual day to give a recital for the members of the American Society of Civil Engineers. As usual he answered promptly, "I will." As I left his studio with William R. Wallace I said, "He is not able, nor will he be, to play at that recital. He is not well. I fear we may never hear him play again."

While I have not seen him since, the words he handed me on that occasion concerning the great organ, I used in a public address. Among other things he wrote:

"The organ in every department is well nigh perfect. It is one of the world's greatest—a master instrument. For tone it has no equal. Notables from all over the earth, including four Presidents of the United States, Senators, Congressmen, the nobility of Europe and the king and queen of Belgium have been entertained by its music. It is used in more public affairs than any other dozen organs. It has a corps of five organists who use it daily."

I have been told by many who have had experience in the mission field that without exception they find friends in those who have heard the great organ. And not tens of thousands, but hundreds of thousands, during his twenty-five years of service, have heard this instrument. To me it is a source of keen regret that I was too far away to attend his funeral. How appropriate that the services were held in this great, this historic building, every fiber of which has vibrated with his divine music. How appropriate that the great organ should be draped and should, during his funeral, be silent.

While he has held no official position, yet for hours before the funeral hundreds came to take a last look at that friendly, intelligent face from which had come so many smiles and looks of kindness. When the hour for the funeral arrived, this great building was packed. The multitude came to do honor to a genius, a gentleman, a friend.

This man's father and mother were pioneers. He was purely a product of the "Mormon" Church. A commanding personality, a courtly manner, a disposition affable and charming, his life was full of love, laughter, and sunshine. The tenderness of his heart and the refinement of his mind, were expressed in his music. His eyes were always full of smiles.

May heaven be good to the wife of my lifelong friend. May kind Providence remember his excellent son and his charming daughters to enable them always to remember the virtues of their talented father. May kind Providence comfort the heart of his widowed and pioneer mother, bringing comfort to her who bore him, and who, mother-like, was devoted to him, with the fondness of unceasing love, I humbly pray, through Jesus Christ. Amen,

ELDER MELVIN J. BALLARD

I desire very much to say a few words upon this important occasion about the great responsibilities which rest upon the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. There is no more important responsibility than that to which the President of the Church has referred, in issuing the call during this conference for men who have already rendered missionary service, who are at present qualified to preach the gospel, to re-enter that field and assist the youth of Israel who are at present laboring as missionaries of the Church, particularly in the United States missions, to discharge this great responsibility which is resting upon the Church.

MISSIONARY WORK A FIRST GREAT RESPONSIBILITY OF THE CHURCH

I rejoice in my heart that this call has come, for it has been a dream of mine about which I have talked a good many times. Only six months ago I recall it was the theme of some remarks which I made in the conference. I do hope that the call shall be answered by the able men of Israel, that we shall recognize that God has placed the responsibility upon this Church to give to all flesh the news that he has spoken. I hope that this responsibility will be accepted by all classes. I have said, upon this point, that I believe the doctors and the lawyers might do well to consider responding to such an invitation, and that they owe something to the men of their own profession whom they can reach better than any one else, to carry the message of the gospel to them. Likewise men in the business professions whom we have excused from long-term missions, they may, with profit to themselves and without injury to their business, accept of this invitation to render service for a shorter period of time.

ADVANTAGES IN MISSIONARY WORK

I believe that every man who responds to this call will prolong his life. There is nothing so invigorating to the health, so uplifting to the spirits of men, as to preach the gospel. I believe that the money spent will be well invested in the good health that shall come, in the prolongation of life.

While it has been a tremendous sacrifice on the part of parents particularly to send their sons and daughters into the missionary field, a constant and continual drain upon their resources, a drain that probably no other community on earth could stand, and we could not stand it were it not for the blessings of God; nevertheless, I have never met in my associations, with hundreds of parents of missionaries, a single one who has ever regretted the money he spent in sending missionaries into the field to declare the gospel message. So far as the personal advantages to the missionary are concerned, I am sure that the money never could have been spent to equal advantage. If a young man had been sent to a college, or given a training in any other field, it would not have brought him so large personal advantage as his missionary experience. It has developed those finer qualities of the mind, faith, confidence in one's self, as well as confidence in God, and has given him the opportunity to study human nature and to be able to succeed in winning those who are opposed to his views, and that in itself is a valuable asset to any man, when his missionary experience is concluded, I care not what his business may be.

In addition to that, the valuable testimony, about which we have heard, can be obtained in the missionary field as nowhere else. It is worth more to any young man in Israel to have in his very heart and soul a burning conviction, a knowledge that God lives, and that Jesus is the Christ, than to be possessed of much wealth and to be devoid of this blessing. There are few, indeed I know of none, who have gone into the missionary field to discharge this obligation and have done their duty who have not been endowed with an abiding testimony that God does live, and that Jesus Christ is his Son. This in itself is worth everything. Indeed we have proved, in our missionary experiences in this Church, that it is more blessed to give than to receive; for if we have given to the world—our time and service—that has been a blessing to mankind, and it has returned with added blessings upon our heads. We have been enriched as communities by the breadth and depth of understanding, and have become cosmopolitan in our conception of things because of the varied experiences that these returning missionaries bring from all lands; for, the best of all lands is brought back to us. In addition to that, we are discharging the great obligation that God has placed upon us, to bring to his sons and daughters the light and the knowledge of the eternal truth, preparing them to come back into his presence and to rejoice in the restoration of the everlasting gospel.

NONE WHO ARE PREPARED TO GO ARE EXEMPT

In responding to this call, I trust that bishops of wards will not excuse themselves. Perchance, one may go. Perchance, it may be possible that one of the stake presidency may respond, and indeed no one should feel himself exempt. It will be profitable to respond, to any who shall accept of this invitation. We need you, we need your strength in this cause. In addition to that, let those who are in need of assistance be helped if necessary by the cooperation of their brethren, because the responsibility is upon each ward to furnish at least one of these brethren, the kind the President has been calling for, and by a cooperative effort on the part of every one in the ward it may be easily possible to help one who could not go without assistance from his associates. I want to invite you also, my brethren and sisters, to prepare yourselves for a continuation of this work, for while the call now is but for a short period, in the ensuing year, I hope and I trust, that the number we are asking for shall continue to go into the missionary field. Men of the class we are asking for are the kind of men we need to strengthen young and inexperienced men in the mission field, and to carry the gospel to the people whom it is difficult for these young and inexperienced men to reach.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF CARING FOR OUR MEMBERSHIP

Now the other point, the other responsibility that I have in my own mind, and about which I feel great concern, is the responsibility of taking care of those who come into the Church, all those who are born heirs of the gospel, children of the Latter-day Saints, keeping the flock within the fold, training them, preparing them for the future work which God has for this Church, and to prepare themselves for his coming. I feel great concern that we shall be successful in saving our own. I observe in our own Church records that we have had, so far as births are concerned, nearly four times as many children born to Latter-day Saint parents as all our baptisms number in the world, and that has been true for each of the last several years. While our baptisms in the world have been good—indeed they are a little better each year—we have nothing to complain about, so far as they are concerned, but the future growth and strength of this Church depends upon our ability to save our own. I feel that there is no greater responsibility placed upon us than to feed the sheep and to feed the lambs, and to keep them within the fold.

NEED OF WATCHMEN ON THE TOWERS OF ZION

I would like to say to the presidents of stakes, the bishops of wards and leaders in Zion, that there is need of the watchmen who are upon the towers of Zion, to exercise themselves vigilantly just now, a little more so perhaps than we have found it necessary heretofore. Yet it has always been necessary to be alert and active if we would preserve the flock. But by reason of conditions that obtain in the world, just at this time, I feel that we need to guard our flock against the inroads of the wolves in sheep's clothing. For, so far as the world is concerned, it is very evident to me that we have reached what I call the age of self-indulgence. The experiences through which we are passing reveal the fact that there is a spirit of indulgence in the world that leads men to the violation of the law in order to gratify appetite. The statistics of the United States Government reveals the fact that so far as the consumption of tobacco is concerned it has increased four hundred per cent. in the last ten years. It has doubled in the last two years, and the most sorrowful item they call attention to is the fact that perfumed cigarettes, manufactured to be sold to women, has shown the greatest increase in consumption, and that they cannot be manufactured in quantities sufficient to satisfy the demand. The cost of tobacco alone, in the United States last year, was a little over three billions of dollars. The increase in the consumption of tea and coffee has also gone forward, to say nothing of the violation of the Eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the manufacture of and indulgence in alcoholic beverages. Men know that these things are contrary to our physical health, contrary to the peace and the safety of our nation; but the appetite is stronger than the will. Passion and desire rule in many quarters today. Men in positions of trust and confidence, in ever-increasing numbers have shown a lack of fidelity and trustworthiness until surety rates, guaranteeing the honesty and integrity of men in business, have been doubled in the last two years. I could go on calling your attention to these things indicating what I say, that the spirit of the age is the spirit of self-indulgence, and it finds its final expression in self-degradation, in the violation of the law of God, in the committing of sexual sins that are destroying the life of men and women.

LET US KEEP CLEAN AND FREE FROM THE SINS OF THE WORLD

I am not an alarmist, nor do I see anything, particularly just now, that would indicate that there is a serious condition in the Church of Christ, but I see outside the storms that are gathering. I see the influences that are at work. The Lord said that he gathered us into these stakes of Zion to preserve us against the storms when they should break forth without measure upon the inhabitants of the earth. These storms are reaching us. Their influence will come. Individuals will come with their pernicious doctrines that will destroy, if listened to, the faith of the Latter-day Saints. I am anxious, therefore, that the young men and young women of Israel shall keep clean and undefiled from the sins of the world. The greatest evil that is threatening us, yes, and threatening the world, is the evil of immorality. So I am pleading with you that if you want to keep these boys and girls able to receive this witness and testimony of the gospel of Jesus Christ, we must keep them clean, morally clean, and we must adhere to our standards. For we have been taught—I received it from my mother's knee, you have heard it, you men of Israel, from your childhood—that next to the crime of murder itself is the crime of sexual impurity, and that rather than to be found guilty of these things we would better be found dead. Let us therefore adhere to this, our high standard, and we shall survive the storms, no matter how severe they become. We can save ourselves and save these young men and young women of Israel.

PROSPERITY SHOULD RESULT IN SALVATION TO US AND OUR CHILDREN

I rejoice in the bright prospects that are before us, so far as crops are concerned. That is good, that is splendid. It is of importance as a means, however, to a glorious end, and the glorious end is the salvation of ourselves and the salvation of our sons and daughters.

I wish to read a few words on this point from the Lord Jesus Christ, given to the early elders of this Church, and equally applicable to us in this present time. I am reading from the 16th Section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants, a revelation given to Peter Whitmer, Jr., in the month of June, 1829:

"Hearken, my servant Peter, and listen to the words of Jesus Christ, your Lord and your Redeemer.

"For behold, I speak unto you with sharpness and with power, for mine arm is over all the earth.

"And I will tell you that which no man knoweth save me and thee alone—

"For many times you have desired of me to know that which would be of the most worth unto you.

"Behold, blessed are you for this thing, and for speaking my words which I have given unto you according to my commandments.

"And now, behold, I say unto you, that the thing which will be of the most worth unto you will be to declare repentance unto this people, that you may bring souls unto me, that you may rest with them in the kingdom of my Father."

There is nothing in all this world that can be compared to the value of a human soul, redeemed, sanctified, and made worthy to receive the blessings of God our Father. There is no investment which you men can put your money or your time into that will pay you so well in time or in eternity as to invest in a human soul, whether that shall be in the missionary field or at home, in the care of those precious ones who have come under our supervision. We have already heard scripture in this conference, from the Lord Jesus Christ, wherein he declares that the worth of souls is great in his sight, and if we should labor all our days and as the result of that labor bring, save it be but one of those precious souls, how great will be our joy! I know that I need not convert you to the fact that this is a true doctrine, but we constantly need to be appealed to, to be willing to give ourselves and our means in the accomplishment of this, the greatest work there is in all the world.

CONCERNING GOING ON THE MISSION TO SOUTH AMERICA

My brethren and sisters, I respond to the call that has come from the Presidency of the Church, to leave home and loved ones and my native land, to go with Brother Wells and Brother Pratt into the great South American country. I do not go with any feeling of elation that it is going to be a great pleasure trip; I go in fear and in trembling, trusting in the Lord, knowing that we shall be utterly helpless, save the Lord shall be with us. I have felt in my soul that the time would come—and I thank God that it has come—that that great country may hear the Gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. I believe that it, too, is Zion, as the Prophet Joseph Smith has told us. I believe that it is altogether fitting and proper that more than half of the missionaries of the Church should be in the United States missions; for it is unto this land, the land of Zion, that the spirit of gathering has called Israel from all over the earth. They have been coming here, and here are the majority of our converts. As I recall it, three years ago one million two hundred fifty thousand people were permitted to come into the United States, and the quota was full. Yet, at that time, twenty-five million people applied to come. Since then, however, the government has seen fit to further reduce the privileges of immigration to this country, until today only three per cent. of the foreign population of any nation in this country, in 1900, may now come in, which means that not more than about two hundred thousand can enter this land in any single year from all nations of the earth. Where are they going? According to the evidence that I am gathering since this call came, millions of them are going to South America. I have hoped and prayed that we shall find that there, too, the spirit of gathering has called men and women from all nations of the earth. They are there in large numbers from all nations, and if God is willing to open their hearts and bless us with the ability to reach them and carry the message of the gospel, it is our desire that they who are from the Gentile nations may also, with others, have this privilege of hearing the message of the gospel and come into the fold of Christ. I know not what purpose God may have in their being in that great southland, the other part of Zion. These matters will all unfold in the Lord's own due time. And then it may only be the beginning of that other glorious work that we are anticipating shall come, for the Book of Mormon came to us, not for our sakes, but especially for the sons and daughters of father Lehi, who have dwindled in unbelief. May the day speedily come that this revelation shall also go forth in that land to the millions of sons and daughters who have the blood of father Lehi in their veins, that the day of their redemption may come.

TESTIMONY

May God bless the Saints at home, that they may preserve in the fold safely these precious ones that have been given to us, that they may be ready in preparation for the further extension of the Lord's work, and may his work go forth, that his kingdom may come, that all men may hear and the honest, obedient souls may have a witness and a testimony that he lives. I know with my brethren that God lives, as surely as I know that I live. My testimony is not based upon books. It has come to me by the revelations of the Lord Jesus Christ to my spirit, through the manifestations of the Holy Ghost upon my soul. In the thirteen years I have already spent in the missionary field there have come to me innumerable witnesses and testimonies of the truthfulness of this great work. I know that Christ lives as well as I shall know it when the veil of his tabernacle shall be parted, and he shall be revealed, when I may have the privilege of hearing his voice and looking upon his face, or be invited as he did invite the Nephites to come up and touch him, to see and handle his hands, to feel the prints of the nails. If that shall some day be my privelege, as I hope it shall, I shall not know any better than I know today; that he lives, that he visited the Prophet Joseph Smith, that he did restore his gospel, and that what the world knows as "Mormonism" is indeed the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Knowing this, there is no sacrifice too great. To leave father, mother, houses and lands, the world and all things for it, is not too big a price to pay for the thing that is the most precious and the most glorious.

THE DESTINY OF ZION CERTAIN

God help us that we shall keep in our hearts, burning sacredly, the desire to fulfil these great obligations that rest upon us, that Zion shall arise and shine, for her destiny is as certain as the rising of the sun. If only we keep the commandments of God, every promise shall be verified, and fulfilled upon our heads. May God help us to do it and speed the day of the redemption of all his sons and daughters, and bring the ungodly and the sinners to repentance; for they shall come to repentance, if not through the preaching of the gospel, through the judgments of Almighty God, for he is speaking, and he shall speak to the nations until they shall hear. God bless you, my brethren and sisters, and his peace be with Zion and all her interests, at home and abroad, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER SYLVESTER Q. CANNON

Presiding-Bishop of the Church

In occupying this important place, my brethren and sisters, I greatly need your faith and sympathy that I may be able to say something that shall be of profit. To that end I desire to enjoy the light of the Holy Ghost.

I would like to read a few words to which President Grant referred in his opening remarks of the conference. The Prophet Micah, in speaking to the people of Israel, and calling their attention to the things which the Lord desired of them, wherein he stated that more than their sacrifices and offerings of rams and oil, the Lord desired their hearts, he made the following statement:

"He hath shewed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?"

I would like to read also a portion of that which President Grant referred to—that brief but important revelation given to Joseph Smith, the father of the Prophet:

"For behold the field is white already to harvest; and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perisheth not, but bringeth salvation to his soul;

"And faith, hope, charity and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualify him for the work.

"Remember faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence."

In the important responsibility that has come to me I am sensible of the consideration of my brethren. I cannot express to you the appreciation I feel of their confidence and the confidence which I feel the Lord has in me. My only desire is that I may be worthy of that confidence and the confidence of all of you, my brethren and sisters, and of all the members of this Church. In accepting the place that has been assigned to me I realize the high standard which has been set by Bishop Nibley and his counsellors. I am glad to have the privilege of working with his associates, Bishops David A. Smith and John Wells, and all of the members of the department to which I have been assigned. I realize the great work that is there to do. I appreciate what has been done, the care and attention and the accuracy of the work, temporal largely as it is, that is assigned to that important department of the Church.

I desire with all my heart to do my part, to give the very best that is in me to advance this work, and if it were possible to even increase the care and the efficiency in looking after every interest that shall be intrusted to us in that department, to magnify the callings that come to us, and in every way to promote sympathy, kindness, love and good will among all the members and officers of the Church. That is my only desire. I have never sought any office in this Church. I have always desired, since the years of my maturity, to endeavor to help in the building up of the work of the Lord. Since I have been able to appreciate the responsibilities of life and of the Church I have endeavored to labor and to live constantly with this expression in view contained in this revelation given by the Lord, through the Prophet Joseph, to his father—to labor "with an eye single to the glory of God."

We were reminded yesterday afternoon by President Ivins and Brother George Albert Smith of the fact that we are created in the image of God, and that when the Lord created man he gave him dominion over all things of the earth. As stated by them, man is the only creature who has within himself the power of reason and of initiative. Men cannot lift themselves off the ground by their own boot-straps, but they can lift themselves out of their condition, mentally, spiritually and physically.

There is an opportunity for every man and every woman upon the face of the earth to grow, to develop, to progress. Every one of us can testify of that because all of us, directly or through our parents or grandparents, have accepted the gospel out in the world—have accepted that clear call that has come to us of the truth—and have had the power within ourselves, through the blessing of the Lord, to grow and increase in knowledge and power and understanding and faith in all the things that are true and divine.

We have been enabled to grow and to break away from the influences and the traditions of life which have interfered with the progress of man through the centuries.

The Lord has given man dominion over all things, though we may some of us think that we have not very much dominion, so far as the things of this earth are concerned. Some of us are very grateful when we have the opportunity to enjoy and to call our own a very small portion of God's earth. If we have a home of our own some of us think we are very fortunate, and some even haven't that much. We may think that we are far removed from that condition, when man had dominion over the earth and over all things pertaining thereunto and when he could look to the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills and call that dominion his own. But every one of us has a certain portion of the things of life and of this earth which the Lord has given to us.

We may not consider, or man may not always consider, that it comes from the Lord. They may forget that "the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof," but if we realize our relation, if we sense our position, we cannot deny the fact that all that we have and all that we are comes from him. If we appreciate our responsibilities we must recognize the fact that we are only stewards here upon the earth, that we cannot take from this earth anything of a material nature; that all we can take from here is that which we have stored up in our minds which has helped to develop us, the qualities which we have acquired and the service that we have rendered. For the material things will remain. They will be of no benefit to us hereafter. Unless wisely used they may prove a curse, not only to us but to our descendants.

What is our responsibility? What is the responsibility of men generally? All men should recognize their stewardship in all that they possess, whether it be little or great, whether it be of a small nature or whether their wealth amounts to millions. Some men in the earth today are recognizing that fact. Some of those who have acquired great fortunes through business transactions and in other ways, have recognized, in a measure at least, their accountability and their stewardship. They have given and are giving large amounts of their fortunes for the welfare of humankind, for research and investigation which shall inure to the benefit of the human family, and for the promotion of greater and better conditions of health and of peace and of general welfare. The obligation is upon every one of us, that we should ourselves have constantly in mind this important injunction, that we labor "with an eye single to the glory of the Lord." The laborer, the farmer, the miner, the clerk, the professional and business people—all can put their very best thought and effort each day into the work that is before them, with the incentive to better qualify themselves and to achieve all in their power for the promotion of God's work and the welfare of his children. All that we do, all that we have and all that we are is the Lord's—not only our means but our time—as has been expressed here today by Apostle Ballard and has been expressed previously by others of the brethren. We should not be content with one mission, but if we have the means and if we labor “with an eye single to the glory of the God,” diligently and faithfully and wisely, the Lord will bless us and will increase our store and our means, and enable us to give more time, greater talent, greater energy, to the advancement of his purpose. We shall then not be content with preaching the gospel on one mission only, abroad, but we shall be laboring continually here at home, as well as abroad, and by our testimony and our teachings, as well as by our lives and examples, evidence that we realize our responsibility, that we appreciate the opportunity that has come to us, and that we are striving to exemplify these things in our lives.

Let us, every one, endeavor to impress upon our children, boys and girls, the thought that all that we have and all that they have belongs to the Lord and that they should not claim these things selfishly. If we have that spirit in mind constantly and if we strive to impress upon those who come after us, that they should use their means and their time, with the purpose in view to be of the greatest benefit and blessing to the work of God, and to the promotion of the welfare of mankind, then shall we have joy and satisfaction. We shall increase in these qualities which shall make us most nearly the men and women that God would have us be.

May the Lord bless us and help us that we may grow in the knowledge of these things! May we constantly have this in mind, that we shall be willing to serve the Lord and be prepared to give to him not only one-tenth of our means, not only one-tenth of our time, not only one-tenth of all that we possess, but that if it should be the Lord's will we shall be prepared to consecrate our properties, in the assurance that we should receive our stewardship and be dealt with in justice and integrity and in propriety for our welfare and progress and development and for the welfare of all human kind, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The hymn, “High on the mountain top,” was sung by the choir and congregation.

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Joseph K. Nicholes, President of the St. George stake.

Conference adjourned until Tuesday morning, October 6, 1925, at 10 a. m.

THIRD DAY

MORNING SESSION

The Tabernacle was comfortably filled as President Heber J. Grant opened the meeting on Tuesday morning, October 6, 1925, at 10 o'clock.

The choir and congregation sang, "Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah."

Elder Heber J. Meeks, president of the Kanab stake, offered the opening prayer.

A sacred baritone solo entitled, "There is no death," was sung by J. H. Wood.

ELDER JOHN A. WIDTSOE

My Brethren and Sisters: I ask that while I stand before you this forenoon I may be guided by God's holy Spirit, so that the words I speak may be of value to those who have come here this day in hope of spiritual food. As I look back over my life, it seems to me that in halls of learning or among the affairs of men I have had ample self-confidence and sometimes just a little self-assurance; but when engaged in the work of the Lord, in this great latter-day program, I always feel my utter and complete dependence upon the Lord and his Spirit, if I would do my work well. In the high calling which has come to me in the Church—and I do not understand why that calling has come to me—I feel that I must be as clay in the hands of the potter, must be as an instrument in God's hands, by which divine purposes may be accomplished. So, I ask that I may have your assistance in the words that I may speak to you this morning.

TESTIMONY AND GRATITUDE

It seems that the theme of this conference has been that this Church is a latter-day witness to the reality and personality of our Father in heaven, of his Son Jesus Christ, and of the divine validity of the mission of the Lord Jesus Christ. I desire to bear witness with my brethren who have spoken that I know that God lives, that Jesus Christ was his Son, that we are engaged in working out an eternal plan for the salvation of mankind; and that Joseph Smith was called in his boyhood, by God, to initiate the work of the restoration of the gospel in our day. I am grateful beyond my power of expression for this testimony, and I bear it gladly to all who care to listen.

THRILLED BY THE CALL FOR MISSIONARIES

I have been fed and instructed by all that has been said by my brethren during these two days; but I must say that the one thing that pierced my heart and thrilled me during this conference was the call of our President, the living Prophet of God, for an army of mature men, one thousand strong, to go into the mission field to preach the everlasting gospel to those who do not yet understand it. I felt as if I heard the voice of the prophets of old, who asked if there were faith in Israel. I believe that there is faith in Israel, I believe that the call that was made will be answered, that the men who go out will be blessed abundantly, that the wives and the children who remain at home, in sacrifice that their husbands and sons may go out, will likewise be blessed and comforted, and that Zion and the world at large will be blessed by this call and the obedience that we shall give to it. When the call came, it seemed to me that I could see the army going out—an army to battle for righteousness, to battle against wickedness, an army which has no weapon save that of truth, an army devoting itself simply to the cause of truth. I am certain, my brethren and sisters, that we were all touched in our hearts when that call came from the lips of our President.

THE WORLD NEEDS THE LIGHT OF THE CHURCH

My own experience tells me that the world has need of such an army, waging the battle for righteousness in the name of the truth of Almighty God. It has been my duty, with the consent and knowledge of the First Presidency, to spend a part of this year in traveling over the Western states as an agent of a department of the government, which has given me intimate association with many men not of our faith. I have come out of this association and this labor with the conviction that the world now, as perhaps never before, needs the light that issues from this Church, and the truth for which we stand. We are indeed ready, as a world of God's children, for the army for which call has been made at this conference.

HIGH QUALITIES OF LEADERSHIP CAUSED BY PERFECT DOCTRINE

Not long ago in one of the states to the north of us, in the company of a local delegation, I called upon one of our branch presidents. The little branch numbered about a hundred people, had been organized only a few months ago, and was presided over by a young man who has been brought up in one of the stakes of Zion. After we had had a chat with this brother, as we left, the leader of the local delegation, who served as our guide, said to me: "We are keeping our eyes on this young man. He has been here less than two years, but he has in him the qualities of leadership. We believe that if we are not careful that 'Mormon' boy will soon be the leader of our community." Then he added: "Will you tell me why it is that so many of your people appear to possess such high qualities of leadership, that we must recognize them, even in so young a man as the one we have just left? Is it because of your doctrine, or is it because of your wonderful leaders, and their wise leadership, irrespective of doctrine?" I answered this man as best I could. My thought went back to a statement made by a modern prophet, President Brigham Young, when a similar question was asked him many years ago; and when he paraphrased the words of one of the ancient apostles:

"In conversation not long since with a visitor from the Eastern States, said he, 'You as a people consider that you are perfect.' 'Oh, no,' said I, 'not by any means. Let me define to you. The doctrine that we have embraced is perfect; but when we come to the people, we have as many imperfections as you can ask for. We are not perfect, but the gospel that we preach is calculated to perfect the people, so that they can obtain a glorious resurrection and enter into the presence of the Father and the Son.'"

A SYSTEM OF TRUTH LEADING TO PERFECTION

Here is a definition given by one of the great prophets of our Church. We do possess a perfect doctrine; and what a gift it is! I wonder if the Latter-day Saints are fully appreciative of the fact that they are in possession of a system of truth which, if applied and used, embraced and wholly consumed by man, may lead man into perfection. As I read human history, ever since the beginning of time, the great thinkers and leaders of the world have sought to formulate systems of government, doctrine or thought, to lead people into a perfect state of living. Thus, we have the great men of the ages: A Confucius, arises in China, in search of a perfect guide to human conduct and achievement. We have a Buddha in India; a Mohammed in Arabia, a Plato in Greece, and many others seeking for this one thing that we declare to all the world that we possess. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is a system perfect in itself, which, if used by human beings, may lead every soul into a perfected state of life, both on this earth and in the life to come. Perfection is the ideal of Latter-day Saints—nothing short of it. A tremendous ideal it is; smiled at by those who do not understand; nevertheless our ideal.

We live by our ideals, we die by our ideals. Nations grow large, or they dwindle, according to their ideals. A humble people, years ago, found the truth of God,—the only God, the living God, the personal God,—and Israel ever since its foundation has been a teacher of nations because of that high ideal. In our own day, within the memory of children in this congregation, a nation arose which formed as its ideal a godless superman, a man who would be like unto God, but without God; and as a result of that ideal came the bloodiest battles and the most destructive warfare recorded in history.

CAN PERFECTION BE ATTAINED?

Our ideal is perfection; but, no doubt, the question arises in the minds of every one of us: "Is it possible for man to win perfection? Do we have reason to believe that there lies in the gospel of Jesus Christ the power to lead us into a perfected state of existence?" As I have attended these conferences, these many years, I have often heard statistics read concerning the birth rate and death rate and other vital statistics, which point out that those who live the gospel of Jesus Christ are indeed being perfected. I had the privilege a short time ago to read the manuscript of a book written by Dr. Franklin S. Harris, the President of the Brigham Young University, in which he has taken the statistical facts concerning the Latter-day Saints, recognized by the world at large, and used them, according to the methods accepted by the world at large, to test out the fruits of "Mormonism." From chapter to chapter it is shown that the fruits of "Mormonism," when "Mormonism" is properly lived, are a condition of increasing perfection, or a perfected state of living.

AN AID TO PHYSICAL PERFECTION

Let me call your attention to one principle which has in it the power of producing physical perfection. More than ninety years ago the Prophet Joseph Smith was inspired to write for us the Word of Wisdom. We know by our own experience that physical perfection may be achieved in part—that we may at least be on the road to physical perfection—by obedience to the Word of Wisdom. It is interesting to note that, ever since that Word was given, men of science have discovered, and are discovering, evidence upon evidence confirming the soundness of the statements in the Word of Wisdom. Alcohol is no longer regarded as a good thing for the human body; and I am glad to know that our Nation is now a dry Nation, that we by acts of our Congress and Legislatures have declared that alcohol is not a good thing for man. Brother Ballard stated yesterday that the use of tobacco is increasing. Nevertheless, the findings of men of science, in their laboratories and studies, are to the effect that tobacco is not good for the human body. Likewise it has been shown that tea and coffee and all other stimulants are harmful and retard physical development.

SMOKING A CAUSE OF MENTAL DEFICIENCY

The last bulletin of Antioch College, one of the colleges in the East, has just reached me. This bulletin is devoted entirely to a study of the effect of tobacco on the students in that institution. I shall not take the time to read this to you, but only to quote the summary, on the first page, of the man who wrote it. Further on in the body of the bulletin he tells how very carefully the work had been done. He says:

"A careful study of smoking among men students at Antioch does not disclose any permanent effects of smoking upon blood pressure, lung capacity, or pulse rate; but a definite relationship is established between smoking and low scholarship. Among men students, 31.8 per cent of nonsmokers fail to maintain required grades, while 62.3 per cent of heavy smokers similarly fail. Inhalers fail most often. Before this study began the more susceptible smokers had been eliminated, since many more smokers than non-smokers had failed and been dropped from college."

And he concludes with this statement:

"With these figures before us, it is hard to avoid the conclusion that smoking is actually a cause of mental inefficiency."

A Latter-day Saint cannot read a statement like this without remembering the promise which is contained in Section 89, that those who obey this Word of Wisdom shall find "wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures of knowledge"—it seems to be a literal confirmation. So, in every field of Church activity, or teachings, whether with respect to the physical, mental or spiritual aspects of life, we find that within the teachings of the Church lie the germs and powers of achieving perfection on the part of human beings.

THE GOSPEL A POWER THROUGH WHICH PERFECTION IS ACHIEVED

Brother Stephen L. Richards spoke to us yesterday about the testimony that may be won by a correct approach and search for testimony. I thought, then, of the scientific equivalent of a testimony. In the laboratory the chemist may take an element and, by heat and pressure, change it completely in its physical properties. It is possible to take black amorphous charcoal and, under the influence of heat and pressure, to change it into transparent, crystalline diamonds. If lifeless, inert matter may be changed, a greater transformation may be expected in the souls of men, when, under God's influence, by the power that comes from the use of the truths that God has revealed to his children, men obey the gospel. Such a change, coming into human lives, is greater than that from the black charcoal to the luminous white diamond. The lives of Latter-day Saints, by the tens of thousands, attest that such a transformation is possible; that there lies in the gospel of Jesus Christ the power for man to achieve perfection, even in this life, physically, mentally, spiritually and in every way, if only he will give himself to the ideal of perfection.

The question uppermost in my mind is whether we as a people are using to the full the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ; whether indeed we are perfecting ourselves as we should. We dream of a great day, a day to come when Lord and Master Jesus Christ shall come to reign and rule upon the earth, when he shall be the King, and all shall bow to him. That is our great dream. We are here to hasten the coming of that day; to prepare the way for the coming of the Lord. The question with respect to myself and my fellows is always whether we are so living, so conducting ourselves, so approaching perfection, so strong in courage, so fearless that that work is being done in a manner to hasten the great day. The Lord uses us, men and women of flesh and blood, made in his image, possessing his eternal doctrines, to work out his purposes. We must qualify ourselves so that the Lord may work his purposes rapidly and well through us, men and women. What a tremendous responsibility we are under. We need to go out fearlessly and we can go out with courage, for we have the tremendous fund of knowledge and the irresistible power that come from a knowledge and testimony of the gospel of Jesus Christ. We must not hesitate to do that which lies before us, and which the Lord requires of us.

A NEWSBOY'S PROUD ANSWER

I like to recall my experience with a little newsboy. My wife and I stood at the west door of the Hotel Utah, in the company of a most distinguished American and his wife. We were talking about the gospel of Jesus Christ as taught by the Latter-day Saints. Somebody said something about the Priesthood, and mention was made of the fact that in this Church all men may make themselves worthy to hold the Priesthood. Someone remarked—perhaps my wife—that even the boys after a certain age held the Priesthood. Just then a little lad came along the sidewalk calling out the afternoon paper—"Deseret News! Deseret News!" On the spur of the moment I said: "Perhaps that little boy holds the Priesthood." I called him to me. He thought I was a tourist, about to buy a paper. I said: "Are you a 'Mormon,' my boy?"

He straightened up, put his heels together, looked me in the eye, and said: "I am."

I said: "Do you hold the Priesthood?"

He said: "Yes, sir, I hold the Priesthood."

I said: "What office in the Priesthood do you hold?"

The little boy gave me the salute of the Boy Scout and replied: "I am a Deacon, sir."

There was the fearlessness of the child, the pride of his possession, though understanding only as a child, dimly, the meaning, the spirit and the vastness of this latter-day cause. We who have grown to maturity, must possess, in a larger degree, the same fearlessness to conquer ourselves and to make ourselves worthy of the call which has come to us, to go out to teach the nations that which we have received. God bless us and be with us and make us the mighty Church which he designs we shall be, I ask, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER HYRUM G. SMITH

Presiding Patriarch of the Church

I desire very much to enjoy that same sweet spirit which has attended the remarks of my brethren. It is a very important privilege to associate with these men whom the Lord has called in this important day and time to proclaim and defend his work. In humility I wish to express my appreciation for the privilege that has come to me as one of the youths of Zion to take part in this important work, in the manner in which I have been called.

I have made some very remarkable observations, in my brief ministry as a worker in the Church. I have observed that we have some of the best people in all the world from the young men and women to the aged fathers and mothers, and grandfathers and grandmothers in the Church. I have observed also that we are living in just a little different time from that of our great-grandfathers, and perhaps the obstacles which were before them were not the same kind that are before us as young people today. While our grandfathers and grandmothers had their responsibilities, their trials and their struggles, I am sure we, as young people, today, have ours. But in my anxiety to discover the greatest support, the greatest help to battle with these trials, responsibilities and obstacles, I know of no other that compares in any way with the privileges and possibilities that come to us as young people to work in the Church of Christ. There are constantly being taught to us the principles of defense, the principles and powers that will aid and assist us to more fully enjoy our privileges and blessings in the great time and day in which we are living. It is true that we are living very near to the world. There was a time, perhaps, more than there is today when people could observe that we as so-called "Mormons" could be recognized by our attitude and our very appearance, but today we are so near to the world that sometimes it is almost impossible to tell by our physical appearance whether we are of the world or not.

As one of the youth of Zion called to stand upon her watch towers, I desire to express my faith and my belief in the fact that the Lord has not forgotten us, that his preserving and protecting care will continue to be with us, if we will only hearken unto the teachings and counsels which we have received. If we as young people will only observe the teachings of our parents in righteousness, to keep ourselves worthy of the great blessings which the Lord, for generations, has prepared to be administered unto the children of Israel in these the last days, we need not be disappointed.

I have observed this very important lesson. You have just heard Elder Widtsoe, one of our great students in the Church, declare that under certain conditions the crude charcoal could be made into the lustrous diamond. Under natural conditions oil and water will not mix. To make them mix they have to be treated by heat and other agents, but just as soon as you come back to natural and normal conditions again, the oil separates from the water and the water separates from the oil. While this is a crude example, I wish to bring it to you for this purpose. It is the best example I think of at the present time to explain the thought I have in view, that it is impossible under normal conditions for us, as members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, whether old or young, to enjoy the blessings of the Church, as they are designated to us through the teachings of the Church, and live in the world, as the people of the world live. If you or I desire to enjoy those precious blessings which the Lord, through his holy prophets, has been declaring from the early ages up to the present time, we must obey the principles, and the laws, which govern those blessings. We may go through the form of receiving them but unless our hearts are in tune with them, through obedience to the laws that govern them, we will not receive the blessings. Just as soon as we come to our normal condition in our conduct in life, we will be just like the oil and water when they are in their normal condition. They do not naturally combine. So let me urge upon you, my brethren and sisters, to be careful in your conduct, in your ways of living. Do not deceive yourselves that you can break the Word of Wisdom, known among us as members of the Church as the "law of health" and the word of God to us as a people. You cannot break those commandments and those laws and expect to get the blessings that are enjoyed by those who do not break the laws. The Lord is kind and merciful, but like any other parent, he cannot give us the blessings that he would like to give us unless we prepare to be worthy of them.

Through observations which have come to me, day by day and year by year, I am impressed more fully with that humble testimony that this is God's work and that he is ever blessing those who are laboring under his tuition and spirit to carry out his work, that he has been very mindful of his people. He has blessed us in our homes, in our fields and flocks and herds. I don't know when I have ever seen a more blessed year than this has been to the people of this intermountain country, and I do pray that the Lord will inspire, within the hearts of the people, a true devotion to the Giver of these blessings, that he will not be forgotten.

Already men are responding to the great call that has been made by the President of the Church. Men in business, men in the professions, are already beginning to arrange their affairs, and I am sure there will be a response of willingness and gratitude, in the midst of the Church, to go forth and express in work, and make a great defense of this work, that men of the world may discover that there is an important period in their lives in which the Lord has been mindful of his children, and that the Spirit of the Lord will be poured out in mighty power upon those who express themselves in willingness to turn unto God's work, and take part in it, to proclaim it, and defend it, both at home and abroad.

I pray that the Spirit of the Lord may be upon the members of the Church wherever they live, that they may express that appreciation of their blessings in right living, that they remember the Lord in gratitude and in thanksgiving and in proper conduct; and not be deceived by their carelessness and their indifference. Nephi, the great character of old, taught his people in his time that those who thought they could do a little here and a little there, telling a lie here and a lie there, or steal a little today and steal a little tomorrow, that they could forget the Lord today and remember him tomorrow, procrastinate and put off, that they would be deceived in the end, that the adversary who was lying in wait to destroy the faith of the people then, that adversary still lives and is still in wait to take advantage of the follies of the people, and to place barriers in their pathway. But I want to promise you, my brethren and sisters, that though he is alive and in waiting for the weaknesses and follies of the people, that if you will observe the teachings of your faithful parents, that if you will observe the teachings of the elders in Israel, if you will observe the laws of nature and the words of wisdom, as they have been taught unto you from the beginning of this Church, since they were revealed to us, that the God of heaven will give you power every day of your lives to defend yourselves, that you may keep yourselves worthy of the blessings that the Lord has in store for you, and that you will have power to triumph over these barriers, to live and enjoy this happy, wonderful testimony that God lives, that he is the giver of life, that he forgives sins, that he gives you power to overcome weaknesses, that he will spare your lives in usefulness, that he will bless the labor of your hands temporally and spiritually, that he will give you understanding through the quickening of your minds and your desires and your ability to see and to understand. I have faith that the God of heaven will hear your prayers and answer you, he will remember you in mercy and bless you beyond your power to appreciate your blessings.

I desire to express my appreciation for the blessings that the Lord has granted unto me, for my faith in and my knowledge of God and his works, for I know that God lives, that he does hear and answer prayers, that he does forgive sins unto those who honestly repent of their sins, forsake them and live in obedience to the teachings of Christ.

I pray God to bless the officers and members of the Church throughout its entire organization. May faith, knowledge and obedience increase among the people to the glory of the Lord and his work, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

A duet, "Hail to the brightness of Zion's glad morning," by J. R. Boshard and Mrs. Hugh Peterson, was sung.

ELDER BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Eastern States Mission

I thank God for music, and for these gifted sons and daughters of God who vocally and on instruments can produce it. If I could only preach the gospel as these gifted sons and daughters of God sing it, and could produce in the souls of men the thrills that come to me when the truth is set to music, and artistically rendered, I would ask no other wealth or gift from God.

When the sessions of our conference closed on Sunday afternoon I felt that if nothing more should be added, this conference would go down in history as of great importance, because of the treatment that had been already given upon great and fundamental principles, principles of highest importance, and especially at this present time, and in view of the waves of religious thought and irreligious thought that are sweeping over our nation, and I presume over other nations also. But when I stand before you to make my own very humble contribution to this historic conference, it is with a great deal of misgiving, and I approach that brief and humble task with much trepidation.

On my way home from the Eastern States I bought some magazines with which to while away the tedium of the journey, and in one of them I was attracted by this title: "It Is a Wise Father Who Can Answer His Own Child."

In the course of setting forth that thought the father who wrote the article describes how a son about eight years of age said to him one day:

"Daddy, why are people?" The father felt that "an armful" had been handed him, according to his own confession. So he stalled a little and replied to his son that that was a question that had been debated some five or ten thousand years, and it was not quite certain yet that anybody had found the right answer.

"Well," said the boy, "that's funny." Then, after a silence he said again: "Daddy, don't you think that is funny?" The father again stalled and he said: "Well, it is just possible that if we knew everything, life would not be so very interesting." "Well," persisted the boy, "I think it is funny. Now I have to go out and play ball the rest of the afternoon, and if you find out anything I would like to hear it at dinner."

Now of course that may be a strange way of presenting a great theme. It has been much thought of, and the question put in a more worthy form. I think perhaps the poet-prophet of Israel, King David, stated the question in a manner much more worthy, and I call your attention to it. It is very familiar to you, but I am sure it is worthy of your further consideration:

"Oh, Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth, who hast set thy glory above the heavens. . . .

"When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;

"What is man, that thou art mindful of him, and the son of man, that thou visitest him?

"For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honor.

"Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet:

"All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field;

"The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.

"O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!"

David here asks some very important questions. He does not answer them, however, either in this psalm nor in any subsequent one. St. Paul quotes this passage from David in his letter to the Hebrews, but he does not answer the questions. This passage brings up the question of the purposes of God in the creation; but these two prophets, David and Paul, do not give answers to the questions they ask. None of the philosophers outside of those cults that have been recognized as founded upon revelation from God have ever answered these questions in any authoritative way. It may seem like a bold statement, but it is true, nevertheless, that there is no answer contained in the Old Testament to these questions. In all the revelations that are given in the Old Testament there is no declaration made of the purposes of God in the creation. I am going to ask you to go one step further, and to bear with me while I say to you that neither in the New Testament is there any adequate declaration that satisfies the inquiring mind upon that subject. The only scripture that comes anywhere nearly touching it is found in the following:

"Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory and honor and power: for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created." (Rev. 4:11.)

That is the nearest, either in the Old or in the New Testament, in all that is written—the nearest approach to an explanation of the purpose of God in the creation. I think you will agree with me that that is not very satisfactory to you or to me or to mankind in general. God has created all things and for his pleasure they are and were created. All right, but where do we come in? And what explanation is that to us of the purposes of God in our creation?

I call your attention to the fact that this father to whom the lad propounded his question, confessed that he had been "handed an armful." He did not, however, regard the question of his boy as "silly." "On the contrary," said he, "it is so fundamental that it quite bowls one over." And then he adds this thoughtful remark:

"Think what it would mean to the human race to have an answer that every one of us would accept. That I should say would be quite a neat little achievement;" that is to give an intelligent, acceptable, and, I will add, an authoritative answer to the question, "Why are people?" Or in other words, what is the purpose of God in the creation of man? I have rather boldly said that you can find no answer in the Old Testament nor in the New Testament.

But now I will ask you to follow me for a few moments in some suppositions I am going to make.

Suppose that in some catacomb in Egypt, or some musty tomb of ancient prophets, a fragment of parchment could be found that could be well established as containing the very words of the great prophet Moses; and suppose that fragment should contain this statement:

"THIS IS MY WORK AND MY GLORY, SAITH THE LORD, TO BRING TO PASS THE IMMORTALITY AND ETERNAL LIFE OF MAN."

What would be the result upon the thought of the world if by human means such a fragment of parchment could be brought forth and established as undoubtedly the utterance of the great prophet of Israel, Moses? It would be regarded, I warrant you, as the most valuable utterance that had occurred among men. Aye, its value would be greater in giving enlightenment to men as to the purposes of God in the creation of man, than all else that is written in the Bible; and as a discovery it would be as important as the discovery of the original tablets on which were written the Ten Commandments would be.

Again I will ask you to suppose that under similar circumstances and by human means, another literary discovery was made that should read as follows—this is a second fragment that we will suppose has been discovered:

"Man is spirit. The elements are eternal, and spirit and element, inseparably connected, receive a fulness of joy. And when separated, man cannot receive a fulness of joy." * * *

"The elements are the tabernacle of God; yea, man is the tabernacle of God, even temples; and whatsoever temple is defiled, God shall destroy that temple.

"The glory of God is intelligence, or, in other words, light and truth."

That is to say, the light by which truth is discerned. I would like to make this addition to the foregoing quotation. It does not occur in this same passage, but I would like to make this addition to this scrap of supposed parchment, and have it included in our whole supposition:

"The body and the spirit is the soul of man, and the resurrection from the dead is the redemption of the soul."

Now let us add these statements together in these supposed parchment fragments, then put the two together—the one from Moses and this passage just quoted. We would then have:

"This is my work and my glory—to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man. . . .

"The elements are eternal, and spirit and element, inseparably connected, receive a fullness of joy. . . .

"The spirit and the body is the soul of man; the resurrection from the dead is the redemption of the soul."

Now I begin to see forming a marvelous, a splendid, a worthy conclusion, out of these discovered fragments—the purpose of God in the creation of man. It is the purpose of God to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man, because a union of spirit and element is essential to the fulness of man's joy. That immortality and eternal life is brought to pass by the indissoluble union of the body and the spirit of man, by which he becomes soul—one, united, inseparable, an entity indestructible, and put in the way of attainment of a fulness of joy. But the end is not yet.

I will ask you to suppose the discovery of another fragment of manuscript from ruined temple, from catacomb or from musty tomb, and yet its antiquity and its authenticity as going back to an inspired man of God—a prophet—may not be questioned. We will suppose this third discovered, sacred parchment should say this—I will ask you to mark the beauty of it:

"All things have been done in the wisdom of Him who knoweth all things."

Now that has in it the music of inspired poetry, to me. It also has a depth of philosophy that is quite wonderful.

"All things have been done in the wisdom of Him who knoweth all things."

Perfect wisdom can come only from perfect knowledge, and here you have the two combined,—perfect wisdom rising from perfect knowledge; all things ordained for the earth and the inhabitants thereof have been wrought in the highest wisdom, according to the declaration of this third discovered fragment we are supposing. And then the rest of the fragment must be read to get the full import of its meaning. I will read the two beautiful lines I have in mind together:

"All things have been done in the wisdom of Him who knoweth all things:

"Adam fell that man might be. Men are that they might have joy."

And thus these fragments of truth—we will say for the moment from ancient parchment just discovered—have enlightened the world on this great theme as no other utterances have ever enlightened the children of men. If they could only be discovered in the way we have supposed, it seems to me that there would rise up from all the hosts of men peans of praise to Almighty God, for this great light shed abroad upon the minds of men with reference to the purposes of God in the creation; and especially as to the creation of man.

Now we will drop the suppositions assumed. These three great utterances constitute the message of "Mormonism" to the world upon this great theme. The first comes from a fragment of the teachings of the prophet Moses, found not in musty tomb or ruined temple, but revealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith before this Church of ours was six months old. The second comes from a revelation from God to him, in the year 1833. The third contribution comes from our Book of Mormon, and is the contribution of sleeping nations once inhabiting the American continents, a message through their prophet leader to the modern world, and a contribution to the modern world for its enlightenment. How splendid all that is!

We are not quite through, however, with this magazine lad's questions yet; nor with David's sublime questions. We have learned a little about the purpose of God in the creation, but the other part of the question still remains: What is man that God is mindful of him? Or the son of man, that he visits him, and gives him dominion over his works?

Only just a moment can be devoted to the great theme. I quote the words of the Christ in that last prayer of his in Gethsemane:

"Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee."

I quote that scripture because without any equivocation it declares by the lips of the Christ himself the fact that he is the Son of God; and now he says:

"Father, glorify thou me with thine own self with the glory which I had with thee before the world was." Here the Christ proclaims both the pre-existence of his own spirit and the glory he had with his Father before he came to the earth. These doctrines used to puzzle those among whom he moved when in his earth life. In controversy with the Pharisees on one occasion, when they were boasting about Abraham being their father, he said:

"Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day: and he saw it and was glad." "Oh," said they, "you are not yet fifty years old, and hast thou seen Abraham?" And he answered, "Before Abraham was, I am."

Reference was made by President Ivins on Sunday to that most marvelous of all revelations on the pre-existence of the spirit of the Christ given to Moriancumer, the brother of Jared. So complete was that vision, so certain it was, that the Prophets as he beheld the finger of the Lord stretched forth, exclaimed: "I knew not that the Lord had flesh and blood." This view was corrected by the Lord, who said:

"This is the body of my spirit, and as I appear unto you in the spirit, so will I appear unto my people in the flesh." In other words, it was the spirit form of the Christ which Moriancumer beheld. It is the spirit that gives form to the whole man. The spirit out of the elements in this earth-life clothes itself with this beautiful garment, the human body, which in the providences of God shall be made immortal. This through the processes, first of birth into mortality—earth life; and after that, birth into immortality through the resurrection. Through these processes shall come forth those personages that shall be eternal—a union of spirit and element that shall be indissoluble. The mortal state is but a prelude to that immortal life, and to that "eternal life" which shall include with it an eternal union with God, a union that shall lead to the eternal progress and development of the divine intelligences that inhabit these bodies.

Now, Jesus Christ is the Son of God. All right, what is our relationship to him? He met Mary early in the morning of the resurrection, and when she would approach him and place her hands upon him in loving affection, he said:

"Touch me not, for I am not yet ascended to my Father." It seems he was reserving contact with his resurrected, immortal body, for the first embrace of the Father. "Touch me not, but go and tell my brethren," referring to the apostles,—"tell my brethren, that I ascend unto my Father, and to your Father, to my God, and to your God."

I know of no other scripture that so beautifully sets forth the relationship of brotherhood of man to the Christ than this passage; unless perhaps it might be this one:

"For both he that sanctifieth, and they who are sanctified are all of one, for which cause he is not ashamed to call them brethren." Showing that our origin is the same as the origin of the Christ. Now I understand Paul clearly when he says:

"We have had fathers of our flesh which corrected us, and we gave them reverence: shall we not much rather be in subjection unto the Father of spirits, and live?"

Now ask the question, David; "What is man that thou art mindful of him? Or the son of man, that thou visitest him?" The answer is: Sons of God, brothers to the Christ, sparks struck from God's own eternal blaze—parts of him—parts of God! Hence, God is mindful of man; hence he visits them, hence he places all things under their feet, and gives them the high mission to multiply and replenish the inhabitants of the earth, and to have dominion over it.

How blessed this doctrine! How high and lifted up it is above the notion that man has his origin in the slime of the ocean, and the protoplasm which rises from it, until it differentiates into the various forms of life, and man comes from some one or other of the many lines that lead out from this common source of life!

I have been thrilled in this conference by reference to that vision that the Lord gave to Abraham of the intelligences that were organized before the world itself was formed. In the great host before the throne of God there were many noble and great ones—noble and great ones! And God looked upon these spirits, "and they were good;" and he said to Abraham: "These I will make my rulers. Thou, Abraham, art one of them." I pray you note the characterization of these prominent spirits—"noble," "great," "good"! These are characteristics that embrace all other virtues. They include everything that could be desired in the way of character elements. How splendid that is! Of course we common men, doubtless stand far below that high level on which God placed these "noble" ones, and "great" ones, and "good," in the vision he gave to one of the noblest—Abraham. But how comforting it is, and how blest it must be to have the assurance that though far below, in excellence, these whom God has selected to be his rulers, we nevertheless are brothers to them; and in lesser degree possessing that which they possess, with the opportunity and privilege granted to us to approach if we may not attain to their excellence. Then to be brothers to him—brothers to the Christ; and brothers to that worthy host that has been chosen to be associated with the Christ in leadership of those things which make for the accomplishment of God's purposes with reference to the existence of man in the earth. That affords me much more comfort than to think of man as being related—even though distantly related—to the brute creation.

I close with this scripture:

"Behold, what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us, that we should be called the sons of God; * * * and it doth not yet appear what we shall be." That is, we cannot estimate the possibilities growing out of that truth, and that relationship—"it doth not yet appear what we shall be." Eye hath not soon, ear hath not heard the depth and height of the glory which God designs for his children. We may not fathom it upward or downward, "It does not yet appear what we shall be, but we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is. And every man that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as he is pure." (I. John 3:1-3.) God grant that it may be so, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER LEVI EDGAR YOUNG

Of the First Council of Seventy

I, too, sincerely pray that the Spirit of the Lord may be with me in the very few minutes that I speak. My heart, my spirit, my mind, have been raised to praise for the power of the Almighty God, and for gratitude that I am called to be one of his servants.

This conference has been impressive for the fact that our faith in God, more and more, has been expressed by every speaker; and not that I could carry on the great thought that has been expressed the last few moments to the end that we might be raised to still greater faith, but let me please add the thought that has impressed me during the morning session of this conference; namely, that in all history, in the story of the development of God's children to the present moment, we find that they who have had faith in him as the Creator of the heavens and the earth, they, the races, the peoples, the nations, the individuals who have been converted to the ways of Christ, and have been able to raise their voices in expression of the living faith in Christ,—those people and nations have been the ones who have made the great contribution to man's uplift, and have given the assurance to the human race of the meaning of life and of the destiny of man.

There is something great that we must contemplate in the mission of the Master. He did teach the glory of God, he did give unto us the teaching that man is divine and that the power of the intellect and of the spirit are not limited, but are unlimited. Another great thing that Jesus has left to us as an abiding testimony is that the kingdom of God, a literal kingdom, will be established upon this earth, a kingdom of God over which Christ Jesus will rule, and we shall be members of that kingdom, as we place our faith in God and know for a surety, from day to day, in the very living of our lives, in our contemplation and in our work, in those things shall we become members of Christ's kingdom.

It is a mistake, a great mistake, today, to lose sight of the fact that man can know God. In that masterful work The World and Life that was put out just previous to the death of Alfred Russell Wallace he did rise to an occasion, and when the pastor said in his previous book entitled The Place of Man in the Universe, "Man cannot know God," yet he did conclude in his latter work that "man can know God, but there is only one way, and that is by divine revelation which," said he, "man has not had." We Latter-day Saints give our testimony to the world that man may know God, and he knows God by revelation. It is our testimony to the world, it is the only true way, it is the only way in which we understand the relationship of ourselves to our Maker.

My brethren and sisters, there are two great sources that will make the world move onward to the Christ and to the kingdom of God. They are education and religion. Religion is the inner light. It is something within and not without. Our greatest power lies in the spirit, and it will be by the spirit that we will work out this problem. It must come from within. It is a condition of mind, a condition of spirit, this religion, this vision; and the trouble with the world today is that there is no vision, and the world is perishing for the want of it. We claim to have the vision, and we have, but that vision comes as an inner light, and our power is the inner light, and it binds us to our Maker. Now men do search for truth, and men will find out truth; and, continuing this theme of President Roberts, I think the words of Isaiah stand, then, as a fitting complement, if you please, to this great truth that has been uttered:

"Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of the Lord is risen upon thee."

And Luke, continuing this same great thought, says, in the first chapter of his writings:

... That comes "to give light to them that sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death" he comes "to guide our feet into the way of peace."

And we might add—truth and right and understanding. For the light and the glory of God will be understood as we come to place ourselves in a position to understand, and understanding comes through the condition of our spirits, and our spirits are cleansed, made clean, by righteous living and an attitude toward all mankind, showing that we love them. Truth expresses itself in love and happiness and joy and peace. For this reason the Latter-day Saints should not only be thankful for vision, they should be grateful for the happiness that has come to us, for the spirit of the gospel of Christ is one of happiness and joy and thanksgiving. We should be the most encouraged people in all the world. That God may grant that we may continue in the vision, that the vision may continue with us, one by one, each and every one of us, that the vision of the Father, the power of God and the establishment of his kingdom may remain in our hearts to lead and direct us, I ask, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The closing prayer was offered by Elder George W. McCune, president of the Los Angeles stake.

Conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

CLOSING SESSION

On Tuesday afternoon at 2 o'clock, October 6, 1925, the closing meeting of the Conference convened in the Tabernacle.

President Heber J. Grant, presided.

The congregation sang, "Guide us, O thou great Jehovah."

Prayer was offered by Elder W. Oriel Stephens, president of the Summit stake.

The hymn, "Redeemer of Israel," was sung by the congregation.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

PRESIDENCY OF THE PRIMARY ASSOCIATION REORGANIZED

We will now present the General Authorities and the general officers of the Church and of the auxiliary associations for your support. Before doing so, however, I wish to announce that Sister Louie B. Felt who, for forty-five years, has faithfully and diligently presided over the Primary General Board, has requested that she be released from those labors; and her counselors, Sisters May Anderson and Clara W. Beebe, will naturally be released with her. These sisters are released with our love and blessing and with our sincere thanks for their very splendid labors. Sister Felt not only has presided for forty-five years, with dignity and energy and for the benefit of these Associations, but she was also, as I remember it, the president of the second Primary Association organized in the Church, which was in the Eleventh Ward of this city.

Sisters Louie B. Felt and Counselors were released as the Presidency of the General Board of the Primary Association, with a vote of thanks.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Presented the General Authorities and the General Officers of the Church as follows. All were sustained in their positions and callings by the unanimous vote of the conference:

GENERAL AUTHORITIES OF THE CHURCH

FIRST PRESIDENCY

Heber J. Grant, Prophet, Seer and Revelator and President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

ELDER J. GOLDEN KIMBALL

Of the First Council of Seventy

I rejoice with you in all that has transpired and been said during this conference. I have never believed, since I have been active in the Church, that God gives to man fear. I know that God gives to you power and love and a sound mind when you are under the influence of the holy Spirit and have the spirit of your office and calling. I appreciate the fact, perhaps better than some men do, that it is very difficult to be understood. God's declarations to the children of men (it is self-evident from what has been said during this conference) are misunderstood by many of his children, and they misinterpret them. The Savior, the Son of the living God, came upon this earth and went through all his sufferings and did the things he saw his Father do, but he was not understood. He was misinterpreted, and some of his children did it conscientiously, no doubt, and some very wickedly, Joseph Smith, a prophet of God, a man whom I have honored all my life—I was taught it by my father in my childhood—see how he was misinterpreted! In the Southern states, when I was presiding over elders in that mission, I told them, "You want to make friends, but when under the influence of the Spirit of God, you testify that Joseph Smith is a prophet, it will bring you all the trouble you can endure." I found that true, but among God's children we found good people who would be willing to accept the gospel. All great men have been misunderstood. So I conclude that to be misunderstood is greatness; that is, if you speak the truth.

I want to tell you in a few words that there is nothing in the world that the wicked dislike so much as the truth, and if you will tell the truth under the influence of the holy Spirit you will have to have faith in God and realize that you are in his service. I have a paper here—I did not write it for this conference as I never like to read, but sometimes I have to do it in order to make myself clear—it is the impressions of J. G. Kimball. You ought to know who I am by this time:

"It is not difficult, in fact it seems to me natural—it is just as natural as water running down hill, to accept God's own declaration of truth as it has been revealed and to uphold and sustain the prophets as mouthpieces of God. It is not difficult for me, I do not know anything else. I have never been taught anything else. The very foundation of the Church of Jesus Christ is faith in God and in his Son Jesus Christ, and one of its chief corner stones is authority. The perfection of righteousness is implicit faith in God, in his revelations, in his disciples, and in their teachings. The very essence of goodness is not to doubt, as doubt is sometimes the very opposite of faith. It could not be otherwise, as it is easy and natural for Latter-day Saints to accept God's declaration, as given through Joseph Smith the Prophet, as the word of God, and to sustain all those who are mouthpieces for God. We make the further claim that the elder of the Latter-day Saint Church is also called of God, and his commission is from above and his position is eternal."

I set elders apart, assisting the brethren—almost every week. I never hesitate when placing my hands upon those young men, to say, "You have been called by divine authority through the presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." I try to impress them that they were not called by the bishop, or by the presidency of the stake, they were recommended and their names were sent in properly endorsed; but they are all called by revelation, just as I was in 1883, among a body of missionaries. I was the only one in that whole number of men who was not ordained a Seventy, as my first mission in the south was filled as an elder, I enjoyed the same spirit and the same blessings that the Seventies enjoyed because I was called by the same authority, and the spirit of my appointment went with me.

An elder is sent out not to represent his personal views or the views of the people, but to proclaim the truth as it is revealed. He is not chosen as a spokesman for the people, not just as a messenger, but the bearer of a message to the people.

We reach the final conclusion that this is the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the gospel of Jesus Christ restored through the Prophet Joseph Smith. The religion that we advocate is Christ's religion, not "Mormon's religion"; that is, it is the word of God. We do not teach for doctrines the commandments of men.

That is my testimony. I do not think I have to get myself all exercised and all wrought up and tear my lungs all to pieces to impress you, after forty years of labor in the ministry. Notwithstanding all my mistakes and blunders I have had this testimony from the beginning, and the beginning was in the Brigham Young Academy, under the teaching and instruction of Brother Karl G. Maeser. President Grant told us last evening of a spot of ground he will never forget. And it impressed me with a feeling which never can be blotted out—my experience as a pioneer in Bear Lake when I went into that log meeting house and heard Brother Maeser talk, and he was talking about the gospel, I shall never forget, though I have never remembered what he said, but I know how I felt, and my brother Elias and I, and our mother with us, made as great a sacrifice as I have ever made to go on a mission, when we moved from Bear Lake down through Evanston and through the deep snow by team, and not by railroad or auto. It took us three or four days to reach Provo. We went to school. I attended two years and my brother Elias went three. I am telling you this because I have felt, as I have not felt for a long time, the inspiration through the prophets of God when they concluded to send out a thousand missionaries; and it seems that some of our people did not understand President Grant, they got the idea that they were sending them all to South America. It is a mighty good thing that they did not do so because it would have created persecution. If you ever rush a thousand missionaries into a place I will tell you legions of devils will turn loose and drive them out. You have got to go in by degrees. I know that. That is what happened to Heber C. Kimball and those great missionaries in England, when they fell as if dead, and for one hour they laid there and had a vision and heard the trampling of feet of legions of devils or evil spirits. The devil always kicks up a row. I remember in President Roberts' day, when they began to persecute us and drive us out of the South—I remember when Brother Roberts was coming home with an emigration and I was left in the office. Letters came from all over the mission in 1884, one of the terrible years of the South, "What shall we do?" I wrote to President Taylor and asked him what I should do? He only wrote a few lines, "When they persecute you in one place, flee ye into another." I wrote that hundreds of times, when the mob was after the elders, "Flee to another place, and just as soon as you can, come back." But if they drive you out and tell you never to come back, if you do go back they will kill you just as they did the brethren in Cane Creek. They told them not to go back, but they needed a resting place, and they killed them. I know, I was in the mission.

Brethren, what I want to talk to you about a few minutes is my own experience. I know more about myself than any man living in the flesh. I am getting pretty well acquainted with myself. I am surprised sometimes at the things I do and say, more than you are. I remember after I went to school I came home and went to Bear Lake. I came down here on a little business which I happened to have with William C. Spence, of the President's office; he said, "Brother Kimball, President Taylor sent you a letter calling you on a mission, and he is disturbed because you have not answered." I said, "How could I answer it, when I never got it?" "Well, you'd better go in and see him." I went into the President's office, the first time since I was a young boy with my father, and I met that great and wonderful prophet. I said, "President Taylor, I never received your letter." "Well, Brother Kimball" (he was so kind, he thought so much of Heber C. Kimball and that made him think a lot of me), "you cannot go now." I had been praying for it, I had been asking the Lord why I could not go. My mother had been praying that God would send me out. I said, "President Taylor, give me one hour and I will give you my answer." I went out on the street, and the first man I met was Bishop Thomas Jenkins of the Seventh ward, who had been to Bear Lake and I knew him. I said, "Brother Jenkins, will you sign my note for a hundred dollars?" "You bet, I will." So we went down to the Deseret National Bank and he endorsed my note, and I came back to the office with one hundred dollars in my pocket, and I said, "President Taylor, I am ready." I went on that mission. No greater blessing has ever come into my life.

That is the first time I ever saw Elder B. H. Roberts. No greater favor ever comes to a man than to be called on a mission. I met a nephew last night, one of Heber C. Kimball's grandchildren. He said, "Uncle Golden, when I was a young fellow"—he is now a High Councilor in one of the stakes—"you came to me and said, 'Are you ready for a mission?' I answered you as I should not have done, but the greatest mistake I have ever made in my life was that I did not respond at that time and have you present my name."

There is a little story in connection with this that I want to impress you with.

I remember when we arrived at Chattanooga, Brother Roberts sent me and a son of an apostle into Virginia. When our visit in Chattanooga was over, and we had paid our expenses I had ten dollars. When we got to the end of the railroad I said to my companion: "Let's ride in a carriage, it will be the last time we will ever see one." I did not know that I was a prophet, but it came true. When we reached our field of labor we lay around there for about three weeks. I said to my companion, who was from the Brigham Young Academy, "Let us go up into the woods and see if we can sing," (I couldn't carry a tune, I never tried to sing in the Academy), "and let us go up and learn to pray." We did not have any audience, only those great big trees. And I said "Let us learn to preach." I would advise young elders to do that before they start out and not practice so much on the people; we practiced on the trees. So I prepared myself and occupied the time. My companion was prepared, and we sang. We made an awful mess of it, but after a while—and that is another testimony—God brought the tunes to us, and we could sing the songs that we had listened to in the Academy. Then I preached. God was kind to us and he loosed our tongues and we found we were able to express the things we had studied. I remember my companion was dismissing. We had our eyes shut and our hands up. I thought he would never get through; and when he said, Amen, we looked back, and there were four men standing behind us with guns on their shoulders. I said to my companion, "That is another lesson, from this time on in the South; I shall pray with one eye open."

So, I will conclude my remarks by saying that I filled that mission. Brother Roberts and Brother John Morgan are my witnesses that I completed it, although I was broken down with malaria. But I came home with an honorable release; it was in 1884 that I came home. I worked in the Mutuels, started in Bear Lake with the elders. I wound up as superintendent of the Mutuels. I traveled from Evanston to Soda Springs in snow and cold weather, and suffered. By the way, when I went on my first mission I told President Taylor, "If you will let my brother Elias stay at home, I can fill my mission." That put the idea in his head, and Elias was called right after I was, and we both went, we left our cattle and our horses and everything we had.

Then came my second mission. There was no noise about it, word just came, "You are called to preside over the Southern States mission, and Brother Spry will take you down and turn the mission over to you." He did, and he did it mighty hurriedly, too, and left me to preside. During my first year I came home with an emigration, and while I was trying to comfort my wife who was sick, Brother Roberts wired me to come down and be ordained as one of the First Council of Seventy. They never asked me, they never consulted with me, they just sent for me, and I have been in this Council thirty-three years. I filled my mission. One day Brother Reynolds and I came out of the Council meeting, and when we got to the gate, he said, "Brother Kimball, you are released, and your brother Elias is appointed." The two of us spent ten years in the south and when we came back we didn't have a thing but our families and our lives.

The Lord has been good to me. No man in the Church has been favored more or treated more kindly than I have. I have got all that I have deserved and a good deal more. My brethren and sisters, that is my testimony. I have been among the Seventies for the past year. My health was not very good last year. I have never allowed a Sabbath day to pass me, if I could make an appointment, that I have not been among the Seventies. I am acquainted with the Seventies. If you want Seventies to go on missions I can speak for them. If you call them they will go, but if you want them to stay home they will do so, and so will I. I will go on a mission if called. I am not just talking either, God knows it, and I know it. I would go if I were brought back in a casket, and I do not know but I would be tickled to death to have it come that way.

I have never been more greatly impressed than by Colonel Bryan, a man of the world who died fighting for God and testifying as far as his knowledge went. What more can any man do? That is the way I feel. I shall stay in this work. I uphold it. Inasmuch as you need a thousand missionaries for six months' missions there will be no trouble in getting them. I have asked hundreds of Seventies and had them stand on their feet and asked, "How many of you have filled missions?" (They would stand up). "How many of you have not filled missions?" "How many of you have never been asked to go on missions?" And I am astonished at the hundreds and hundreds of the Seventies who have never been asked to go. They may have been considered by the presidents of stakes and bishops. But if you want a man to go on a mission, call him.

I pray the Lord to bless you, to bless the authorities of the Church, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER RULON S. WELLS

I have been very greatly impressed during the meetings of this conference with the wonderful drama that has been enacted on the stage of this earth upon which we dwell. It has been said by a Latin scholar that history is the witness of time (Historia testis temporum est), and it seems to me that there is nothing that is more indelibly imprinted upon the history of the human race than the purposes of the Almighty, that there is a Providence over all, and he is guiding and directing the destinies of his children. I think it has been made plain that this history, if we are to properly understand it, begins before the foundations of this earth were laid; that we who dwell upon the face of the earth today, counted as we are by many hundreds of millions, and those who were before us, even from the very beginning of time, have at one time dwelt in that primeval world in the presence of our Father in heaven as his children; and the scenes that are now being enacted are in pursuance of the great plan that was evolved by him in the very beginning, in that primeval state that we read about in the holy scriptures, when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy. Then and in that pre-existent state, as it is now, there were differences among the children of God, there were some who were noble and great and good; there were some who were evil and had many weaknesses, and fell far short of doing the things that were necessary for their own progress and exaltation. But in the midst of all the children of God, when the plan was announced, there were some who fulfilled their first estate, not all in equal degree, but they were different, some of them were great and noble and were chosen to be the rulers among men. There were some who were choice, though in lesser degree, who were worthy of some distinction, and still others who were not so worthy, yet all of them having fulfilled their first estate were permitted to dwell in mortal life upon the earth, and they were known of the Almighty and he was interested in the welfare of them all.

Among the great ones, as we have been told, was Abraham. Abraham was a man whom God loved; and he, too, loved the Lord, and the Lord knew him. He knew that he would keep his statutes, that he would obey his commandments, and not only that but he would teach his own children after him. It is through that lineage that we today have the knowledge of the true and living God. It is through that lineage that a record has been preserved among the children of men, giving a history of the dealings of God with his children. Those that were more favored because of their faithfulness in that pre-existent world were the ones that were to come through the lineage of Abraham, for the Lord blessed Abraham and promised him that in him and his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. Those who were faithful to a marked degree in that pre-existent state were privileged to come in due course of time through that lineage, the children of Abraham. What greater privilege could a child of God desire than to be numbered among those whom God permitted to come through that lineage, that should bring into this world and preserve among the children of men a knowledge of the true and living God that they might be taught in his ways?

In the progress of this human drama the Lord delivered his chosen people out of their bondage in the land of Egypt, directed and guided by a great prophet of God, Moses. He brought them out into the wilderness and endeavored to eradicate from among them the idolatrous ideas they had imbibed in the land of Egypt. And the Lord took his servant, the Prophet Moses, up into the mountain and delivered unto him the word of the Lord regarding the plan of life and salvation. The tablets upon which it was written, when he came down from the mount and saw them worshipping the golden calf, were broken into pieces in the anger of that mighty man of God. He was called again up into the mount and brought back with him the law of carnal commandments, that men might repent of their sins and avoid the evils of the world and be schooled that they might disseminate among the inhabitants of the world a knowledge of those principles that had within them the power of God unto salvation.

And in further process of time, after having sent so many prophets, whom they stoned and persecuted, came the Only Begotten of the Father in the flesh, to restore anew that great law, the law of grace, the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, that the world might not be without it and the children of God might be saved, and might be brought to repentance and prepare themselves for that eternal glory that was thought out and planned from the very beginning. Notwithstanding the rebellious spirit that manifested itself throughout all these ages, there has been committed to that lineage a knowledge of the things of God, and of him who was indeed the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Great promises were made unto that lineage, and I am going to read just a little from the scriptures, to be found in the forty-ninth chapter of Genesis. Abraham was the father of Isaac, and Isaac the father of Jacob, whom the Lord named Israel, who became the father of the twelve tribes of Israel; and that great and mighty man, when his days began to draw to a close, called around him his twelve sons and bestowed upon each in their order his blessing, to be fulfilled upon their heads, and to Joseph he gave this blessing:

"Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall."

And later in that same blessing said he:

"Even by the God of my father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under."

I have oftentimes thought, what can these references mean?

Here is a family, a lineage, a seed scattered among the children of men, by which all the nations of the earth are to be blessed. That was the blessing that was given to Abraham, and the Lord gave him a promise, and led Moses into the promised land, which was to be the land of their inheritance, the land of Palestine, the land of Judea, the Holy Land. This was the land that was given unto the seed of Abraham to be an everlasting inheritance unto them. But here we have him pronouncing the blessing upon the head of Joseph: "Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall." What did it mean? Did it not mean that this blessing was being realized when father Lehi left the shores of old Arabia and crossed the great waters, even the mighty Pacific Ocean, and landed probably on the western coast of Chile in South America, in Valparaiso? One would almost think that father Lehi and his family had suggested the name, for that was the valley of Paradise. Surely they felt that under the guidance they had received they had come to the paradise of God, Valparaiso, the valley of Paradise. Here then, it seems to me, although vaguely stated, might be a fulfillment of this promise unto Joseph, whose branches, but not all of the house of Joseph, ran over the wall. Rather vague, perhaps, but let me read another paragraph following, wherein it says:

"Even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and the Almighty, who shall bless thee with the blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under."

Here then is another inference. What else could it have referred to than the land of America, standing as he was at that time in Egypt, saying that his branches should run over the wall, and that the blessings of heaven above and of the deep that lieth under should be given him. He seemed to have understood at that time that the world was round, and that that part (which is now America) that lieth under was to be the land of Joseph. Even this may be considered a somewhat vague reference. But let us read on. It would seem that there was a determination to banish all doubt from our minds when we read these words pronounced upon the head of Joseph, for it says here: "The blessings of thy father," (that was Jacob, called Israel) "have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors." Who were they? Abraham, and Isaac, the blessings that were pronounced upon them, and the giving to them of that land of promise,—Palestine, Judea,—to be an eternal inheritance to the seed of Abraham. But here was something above and beyond pronounced upon the head of Joseph. Said he:

"The blessings of thy father (Jacob) have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors, unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills."

O, how plain it would seem; the vagueness disappears; But that pertained to the house of Joseph: Let us read on:

"The blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills, and they shall be on the head of Joseph and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren."

And here we are in the land of Joseph; and through the interposition of the Almighty, his purposes are written in the pages of history, wherein he has sent the seed of Abraham all over the world, that all the nations of the world are to be blessed in his seed. The Jews are to return to the land of their inheritance, but Joseph must be gathered upon the land of Joseph, which is North and South America. And so we are gathering them from the countries of Europe. Those who came with father Lehi were mostly the children of Manasseh, the son of Joseph, but most of those who have been scattered in the different nations of the earth are the children of Joseph through his son Ephraim, and these are they who hear the voice of the good Shepherd and are being gathered to the land of Joseph through the ministrations of the elders of Israel in these days, and in whose veins flows the blood of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and of Joseph; for they belong to the tribe of Joseph. Have our patriarchs not prophesied upon our heads, O ye children of Israel, ye sons and daughters of Zion, have we not been told that we were the children of Abraham through Joseph and Ephraim? And so, I say, the children of Ephraim are being gathered upon the land of Joseph, a choice land above all other lands, extending from the north pole to the south pole in this great western hemisphere.

I rejoice therefore in having the opportunity of doing my little part in the bringing about of this great work, in carrying the message to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and in gathering into the fold the children of Abraham, by bearing the message of life and salvation, searching them out wherever they may be. I accept, as Elder Ballard did, the call that has come to me, and I rejoice in having the opportunity of playing a small part at least in the opening up of that great work in the southern hemisphere among the children of Lehi, and I hope and sincerely pray that the Lord will qualify me for that mission. I rejoice in the companionship that we have in Elder Ballard, an apostle of the Lord, a witness of the Lord Jesus Christ. How I feel to uphold and sustain him, and will endeavor to assist him with all my might that he may be able to accomplish all that the Lord would have him do in this great mission. I rejoice in the companionship of Elder Rey L. Pratt, whom I have learned to love as my fellow laborer in the Council to which I belong, and in my association with him. With the help of the Lord I desire to go and discharge myself of the duty that now lies incumbent upon me; and in this labor I hope and pray that we may have the faith and prayers of the Latter-day Saints, that the purposes of the Almighty may be furthered, and that in that continent where the gospel has not yet found a foothold, there may be an opening, that the children of Israel, the descendants of Abraham, the descendants of father Lehi, may be brought to a knowledge of the truth and rejoice in the blessings of the gospel of our Master, and I pray for this in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER CHARLES H. HART

Of the First Council of Seventy

I need the sympathy and faith of this audience and the blessings of the Lord if there is to be fulfilled during the short time that I stand before you the earnest prayer in which you joined this afternoon, that the spiritual feast might be continued. I trust that it may not be marred, but that if possible it may be added to.

John, in his first general epistle, uses this language:

"For the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us."

It has been made clear by the remarks of the brethren during this conference that there are two classes of witnesses, the first, the Divine witness, as spoken of very clearly by Elder Whitney, and also by other speakers during this conference, and human witnesses, mentioned particularly by Elder David O. McKay. The first great class is illustrated in the last chapter of Moroni, which is the last chapter in the Book of Mormon, wherein we are told that by the power of the Holy Ghost the truth of all things may be made known unto us, and the formula is given for obtaining the power of the Holy Ghost as that witness—by prayer to God the Eternal Father in the name of Jesus Christ, with a sincere heart, with real intent and with faith in Christ.

Human witnesses are provided for as shown by the twenty-seventh chapter of II Nephi. The importance of this class of witnesses is emphasized by the promise of the three witnesses and eight witnesses in support of the divinity of the Nephite scriptures. In the scriptures we have human as well as divine testimony to support the truth. I appreciate both classes of evidence. I am impressed with the testimony of Mary, the mother of the Master. Her testimony is recorded in holy writ in language that has always thrilled me when I read it. Of all the witnesses except the great testator, the Holy Ghost, it seems that Mary, the mother of Jesus, should know as well as anyone the divinity of her son. Her testimony is recorded in the first chapter of Luke, beginning at the forty-sixth verse, when she realized that she was favored above all women, as the angel had informed her. She exclaimed:

"My soul doth magnify the Lord and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Savior.

"For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden; for, behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed.

"For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name."

Elizabeth, her cousin, had the same witness. She knew that Mary was greatly favored above women. The same divine testimony came to Joseph, and he understood the honor that had been bestowed upon him and upon his espoused.

A little later, Simeon was privileged to perform the law, and when he takes the babe in his arms he feels that the honor is sufficient for him; that he is now ready to depart. He exclaims, "Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace according to thy word, for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which God hath prepared before the face of all people, a light to the Gentiles, and the glory of thy people Israel."

There was also the promised son of Elizabeth to testify to the coming of the Master, the voice crying in the wilderness, calling to repentance and announcing that there came one after him whose shoe latchet he was not worthy to stoop down and unloose, He who was to baptize with fire, as he, John, was baptizing with water.

Then there was Jesus' marvelous ministry. At twelve years of age, the boy in the temple asking and answering questions with the wise men. Later the matchless Sermon on the Mount, after hearing which the people were astonished because he taught them not as the scribes, but as one having authority. Then his wonderful ministry of which a ruler of the Jews, Nicodemus, could say to him, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a teacher sent from God for no man could do the miracles that thou doest except God be with him."

And yet after all testimonies of Jesus' ministry we have reached an age when study and scholarship seem to darken these great truths. Those of us who have accepted as a reality the introduction of the Son by the Father to the Prophet Joseph, the revelation upon which the restoration of the gospel is founded, can scarcely realize the darkened condition of the minds of some so-called Biblical scholars. I am not in the habit of repeating things that are not constructively helpful, but it is not enough to be satisfied ourselves, but we have the duty of assisting the world to come to a knowledge of the great truths which we rejoice in. There were published in some of the recent magazines of international value the remarks of a professor of one of our great institutions, upon this subject of the divinity of the Master—a man who had written a good deal concerning Jesus, and yet who seemed to become more darkened the more he wrote, because in an article in the Hibbert Journal, on Jesus, he asserted that the divine incarnation is alien to the teachings of Jesus Christ and to those of the original disciples, and that we cannot longer regard the teachings of Jesus as of unique authority or of permanent validity. These critics profess to give greater weight to the so-called synoptical gospels, Matthew, Mark and Luke, than to the writings of John or of Paul. Since reading this assertion of this professor I have re-examined the sayings of Jesus as recorded in some of the synoptical gospels, particularly Matthew, to see whether it was possible that I had been mistaken all this while in the thought that these gospels did give indication that Jesus proclaimed that he was the Christ. We have had some of these instances testified to during this conference. The answer to the question that he asked his disciples as to whom men said he was—the final answer of Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," and the reply of approval by the Master, when he said, "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jona, for flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven."

And yet in the light of such scriptures there are so-called professors who will declare that it is alien to the teachings of Christ that he claims incarnation, or to be the Messiah of the world.

I have noted many passages of scripture, particularly from Matthew, that indicate he was more than mortal. For instance, in the raising of the boy with the palsy, when he said: "Thy sins be forgiven thee," and then, reading the thoughts of the Pharisees, questioning that he had that power, he asked them whether it was easier to say, "Thy sins be forgiven thee," or, "Arise and take up thy bed and walk?" He performed healings under circumstances that one could not doubt that he had the power also to forgive sins.

When the mother of Zebedee's children came to him and asked the privilege for one of her children to sit upon his left hand and one upon the right, he told her that privilege was not his to bestow, but was the right of his Father.

He spoke of ascending in glory.

I shall not take time to refer to any considerable number of these instances, but just a few to illustrate how presumptuous and blasphemous it would have been for the Savior, had he been a mere mortal, to have assumed the authority and uttered the words that he did, in the authority of his high calling as the Messiah and the Redeemer of the world. He spoke of the time when the Son of man shall come in his glory and all the holy angels with him. "Then shall he sit upon the throne of his glory, and then shall the king say unto them on his right hand, Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world." Again, at the time of his crucifixion, "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" And then the circumstances of the administering of the holy sacrament to his disciples, and the concluding commission to them: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have given you, and lo, I am with you always even unto the end of the world." What presumption would it have been to so speak, if he had been merely human?

These professors shy at the teachings of St. John, although his gospel has been called the most influential book known to the literature of the world, a book, by the way, which is replete with testimonies pertaining to the divinity of Jesus. Let me quote a few of these:

"I and the Father that sent me."

"Ye neither know me nor my Father."

"That which I have seen with my Father."

"He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

"I am the Light and the Life of the world."

"I came forth from the Father, and have come into the world."

"The glory which I had with thee before the world was."

"The Word was made flesh."

"In whom dwell all the fulness of the Godhead bodily."

Many more expressions along this line, are found which time will not permit to call your attention to. But there is much, particularly in the writings of John, in support of his claim of Messiahship, which some modern writers, in the sterility of their learning, seem to take pleasure in denying. There is a type of mentality which seems to think it an indication of freedom and independence on their part to deny the most vital and well established truths.

The testimony of the divinity of Jesus by the Prophets of old, you are no doubt familiar with. The expression of Isaiah taken from the ninth chapter of this prophet: "For unto you a child is born, unto us a Son is given, and the government shall rest upon his shoulders, and he shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."

May the Lord help us to cherish this precious testimony which he has given unto us of the Prince of Peace, this Mighty God, our Savior and Redeemer, the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN WELLS

Of the Presiding Bishopric

This conference has been one of joy and pleasure to me, and I have listened with appreciation to the doctrines, teachings and instructions of my brethren. These meetings give us all new life, new vigor, a new outlook, new thoughts and new resolves; and I believe that we shall go home from this conference filled with the bread of life.

When President Grant announced the great missionary movement and the call for one thousand mature men to go on missions for short terms, it filled my soul with gladness. I saw these vigorous, mature men, able defenders of the gospel, accepting this call, coming to Salt Lake, being set apart under the hands of the servants of God; I saw them arriving in the various fields of labor, receiving counsel and advice from their mission presidents; then going forth to the villages, hamlets, and the great cities of this land, and perhaps of other countries, preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ and crying repentance to all people.

I saw these devoted men, and perhaps women, knocking at the doors of the people's homes, offering tracts, soliciting entertainment, sometimes being rebuffed and sometimes welcomed; delivering tracts which convey the gospel's message to those who will open their doors. I saw them on the street corners, addressing ever-shifting and changing congregations; in the civic centers, in the parks, upon steps of public buildings; and, in fact, wherever the police will permit them to preach. I saw these men, happy and thankful for the privilege of raising their warning voices once more to the inhabitants of this and other lands.

As a result of this preaching and tracting the hearts of some will be truly touched by the message of the gospel; some will stop and listen; others will invite the missionaries to call; still others will hear the message through their friends. A few words will sink into the hearts of some of the listeners, and they will want to hear something more of this work. They will attend the little meeting places, sometimes a rented hall, sometimes a small chapel owned by the Church, and now and again a nice building.

This work has been done by the bearers of the gospel thousands of times. Men will say to themselves and to one another: What shall we do? They will hear the message through the servants of the Lord, and some few will accept it and become valiant defenders of the truth in their own communities. They will receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands, and this will drive out of their minds, if they will but permit it, all sectarianism and dogmatism from which the world is suffering today.

Then I thought: It is probable that under the inspiration of the Lord our brethren have called this multitude of men to labor on these short missions so that our great nation may be once more warned. During the last few years there has been a slipping away from religious ideals and spirituality in the missions. Great controversies have been waging. Only recently this happened in Tennessee, and prominent men have shaken the people's faith in a living God and in the fundamental teachings of the Lord Jesus Christ and his atonement and the resurrection. Is the Lord sending out our brethren to warn these people to hold fast to the truth and to acknowledge the redemption and saving power of Jesus Christ?

So, in my opinion, a great mission will be accomplished. It will stand out as an epoch in the history of this Church because of the mighty effort that will once more be made to call all the inhabitants of this nation and other nations to repentance.

I had in mind this afternoon to say a few words concerning the poor, but time will not permit me to express all my thoughts. In Section 52 of the Doctrine and Covenants there is a statement given by the Lord, which startled me for a moment when I first read it: "And remember in all things the poor and the needy, the sick and the afflicted, for he that doeth not these things, the same is not my disciple." Is it possible that in our haste and hurry and in the rush of life we have not digested this thought? It may be that some have said to themselves that the poverty and misery people suffer is usually brought upon them by their own folly; but King Benjamin in giving his final message to the people of Nephi says this: "Perhaps thou shalt say: the man has brought upon himself his misery; therefore I will stay my hand, and will not give unto him of my food, nor impart unto him of my substance that he may not suffer, for his punishments are just." But that good man said unto them: "Whosoever doeth this, the same hath great cause to repent." It is a common habit for us to express ourselves in that way.

I will also quote you a favorite passage of Bishop Nibley's from the writings of the Apostle James in the New Testament: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world."

Then, our Lord and Savior, when talking to the lawyer, made two definite propositions: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy strength, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbor as thyself."

I hope we shall all go home, thankful to the Lord for the abundant harvest, for the way the land has been blessed, for the opportunity that has come to the people of the Lord to get out of debt; and with all these blessings we shall not forget the poor, the sick, and the afflicted. If only our people could remember that even ten cents a day each month would do so much and if each church member would give this amount, the bishops would have in their hands each month $50,000. Then widows could be provided with homes and some of the comforts of life, and we could give more intelligent service to the sick, the afflicted, and all those who need our help. We are not doing enough of this.

May the Lord bless us and help us to remember our responsibilities to live up to our privileges and to keep his commandments, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

INTRODUCING ELDER REY L. PRATT

If this were a picture show or some silly thing we could laugh at, we could stand it for two hours and a half and perhaps three, but if we should run ten or fifteen minutes over the time today I expect many of you would get up and go out.

Before the close of this conference I desire to hear the testimony of Brother Rey L. Pratt. I desire this grandson of Parley P. Pratt who was one of the greatest of all the great writers of inspired hymns in our Church, and one of the great preachers, to bear testimony to us before departing upon his mission to South America. And if there is anybody who cannot stay until Brother Pratt gets through, I would be much obliged to them if they would leave now.

ELDER REY L. PRATT

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Mexican Mission

I am very happy, my brethren and sisters, to have the opportunity this afternoon of standing before you here and bearing my testimony concerning the divinity of the gospel of our Lord and Savior, which has been restored to this day and age in which we live. I am indeed happy to have been deemed worthy to be the least of the three chosen to go into the land of South America for the purpose of establishing a mission there, and opening up in that land the work of the Lord for the preaching of the gospel to our Father's children who reside there. Particularly am I happy, my brethren and sisters, in the thought that the gospel is to be carried to more of our Father's children in the house of Israel, verily the Lamanite people, who reside upon this land of America; and my heart has been thrilled, my brethren and sisters, with the sure and faithful teachings of this conference.

I realize that I am going into a southland, that I shall pass over the tropics, that I shall go through the lands where monkeys dwell, and I rejoice in the testimony that has been given unto me that I do not have to consider them the cousins that I am going to preach the gospel to. I am of the house of Israel through Ephraim, according to the patriarchal blessing that I have received, in which I believe implicitly. The people that we go to preach to are of the house of Israel, of Joseph, through Manasseh principally, also with a sprinkling of the blood of Ephraim among them. They are our brethren and sisters, they are our blood relatives, they have an inheritance upon this land, they are heirs to the gospel. The Lord has foretold in words of plainness this day that has now dawned upon us, and for which I do most truly thank him.

If I may impose upon your time just a moment or two I should like to read from the Book of Mormon a number of predictions that to me seem to be fulfilled now. Of course, the work is all before us, and I do not undertake this work with my brethren in the thought that we are going down there to have particularly a good time, in the sense in which many deem it a good time, but I realize fully the responsibility of our call and the enormous amount of work that it will take to bring about the prophecies of the Lord that I should like to refer to here this afternoon. If you will turn to the first chapter of the 2nd Book of Nephi, you will find recorded the following:

"And now it came to pass that after I, Nephi, had made an end of teaching my brethren, our father, Lehi, also spake many things unto them—how great things the Lord had done for them in bringing them out of the land of Jerusalem.

"And he spake unto them concerning their rebellions upon the waters, and the mercies of God in sparing their lives, that they were not swallowed up in the sea.

"And he also spake unto them concerning the land of promise, which they had obtained—how merciful the Lord had been in warning us that we should flee out of the land of Jerusalem.

"For, behold, said he, I have seen a vision, in which I know that Jerusalem is destroyed; and had we remained in Jerusalem we should also have perished.

"But, said he, notwithstanding our afflictions, we have obtained a land of promise, a land which is choice above all other lands; a land which the Lord God hath covenanted with me should be a land for the inheritance of my seed. Yea, the Lord hath covenanted this land unto me, and to my children forever, and also all those who should be led out of other countries by the hand of the Lord.

"Wherefore, I Lehi, prophesy according to the workings of the Spirit which is in me, that there shall none come into this land save they shall be brought by the hand of the Lord.

"Wherefore, this land is consecrated unto him whom he shall bring. And if it so be that they shall serve him according to the commandments which he hath given, it shall be a land of liberty unto them; wherefore, they shall never be brought down into captivity; if so, it shall be because of iniquity; for if iniquity shall abound cursed shall be the land for their sakes, but unto the righteous it shall be blessed forever.

"And behold, it is wisdom that this land should be kept as yet from the knowledge of other nations; for behold, many nations would overrun the land, that there would be no place for an inheritance.

"Wherefore, I Lehi, have obtained a promise, that inasmuch as those whom the Lord God shall bring out of the land of Jerusalem shall keep his commandments, they shall prosper upon the face of this land, and they shall be kept from all other nations, that they may possess this land unto themselves. And if it so be that they shall keep his commandments they shall be blessed upon the face of this land, and there shall be none to molest them, nor to take away the land of their inheritance and they shall dwell safely forever.

"But behold, when the time cometh that they shall dwindle in unbelief, after they have received so great blessings from the hand of the Lord—having a knowledge of the creation of the earth, and all men, knowing the great and marvelous works of the Lord from the creation of the world; having power given them to do all things by faith; having all the commandments from the beginning, and having been brought by his infinite goodness into this precious land of promise—behold, I say, if the day shall come that they will reject the Holy One of Israel, the true Messiah, their Redeemer of their God, behold, the judgments of him that is just shall rest upon them.

"Yea, he will bring other nations unto them, and he will give unto them power, and he will take away from them the lands of their possessions, and he will cause them to be scattered and smitten."

My brethren and sisters, Lehi foresaw what would be the condition among his children if they would live in harmony with the commandments of the Lord that he had received for his children upon this land—that it should always be for them a land of security, the land of their inheritance, and that they should possess it unmolested by other people. But when they should turn away the reverse would be the case. History tells us that they turned away from the God of the land. They rejected Jesus Christ after his kingdom had been set up here, and behold the curse of the Lord has rested upon the land. I was in company with Elder Richard R. Lyman and Dr. George W. Middleton, only recently traversing the parts of Mexico where many important ruined cities lie, and it is marvelous to note the wonderful civilization that has once lived there, and it is marvelous to note how completely even the memory of them has been wiped out, and they are nowhere to be found. Were it not for the sacred volume of history from which I have read there would be no answer to the great riddle of those wonderful cities that were built with such wonderful architecture in that land. Huge stones that we measured and calculated would weigh more than twenty tons, fitted closely together, having been brought a distance of three miles, and the joints fitted without mortar. So close are they fitted that the pen knife which we carried with us could not be inserted between the joints. This bespeaks a people who were mighty. It bespeaks also the fulfilment of the word of the Lord in regard to the destruction of this people. Prophets of that time, particularly Nephi the son of Lehi, foresaw all these things as a consequence of neglect among the people. What greater fulfilment of the word of the Lord could we desire?

These prophets stated that they should be scattered and smitten by other people. Other prophecies in the book state that it should be the Gentile nations that should come in among them, that they should reduce this people to a remnant. The descendants of the builders of those mighty cities, my brethren and sisters, have verily been reduced to a remnant. Statistics given out by Jauregue, a statistician and historian of Guatemala, are to the effect that of all the native tribes south of the Rio Grande, since the coming of the Spaniards they have been reduced nine-tenths. They have become a hiss and a by-word, they have become the hewers of wood and drawers of water for the Gentile oppressors who have come in amongst them.

But I rejoice, my brethren and sisters, in the prophecy that I shall not take time to read, but merely to refer to, the word of the Lord that came to Nephi; you will find it recorded in I Nephi 13, wherein he saw all these terrible things that should befall his people, but he said that he saw that in the providences of the Lord he would not permit the Gentile nations to utterly overcome and wipe out the remnant of his seed, that should be among his brethren the Lamanites. Neither would he permit them to utterly overcome the seed of his brethren and wipe them out from the face of the land. If you will turn then to II Nephi 30, you will find wherein the Lord said that there should be a church established among the Gentile people, and a book should come forth. Many among the Gentiles should believe the words of the Book that was to be written, and they should carry it back to the descendants of those who wrote it, for their redemption, for it should contain the fulness of the Everlasting Gospel, and it should be preached among the descendants of those who wrote the book, and not many generations should pass away save they should become a white and a delightful people again.

Then if you will turn to III Nephi 21, you will find recorded there the time when we might look for the beginning of this wonderful work of restoration and redemption among that people who have been cursed of the Lord, and who have suffered so much and so long. Only those who have become intimately associated with them, my brethren and sisters, and have been touched by the ages of sorrow that they have wallowed through, know how they have suffered. And the Lord said that when these things should begin to come forth unto the seed of Lehi from the Gentiles to whom these things should be committed, and the seed of Lehi should begin to believe, then the Church, then the world, then all men might know that the Lord had set his hand to establish his work among that people, and to bring to pass his promises, and the great redemption that he had prepared for that people.

I bear you my witness, my brethren and sisters, this afternoon in all solemnity, that I know that this is the work of the Lord, and for nineteen years have I labored in the land of Mexico and we have hundreds and thousands of valiant, true, faithful Latter-day Saints who believe the message of the gospel as it has been restored. They have not only begun to receive it, but they are now receiving it in considerable number. I wish to call your attention to the fact that so far this year already in the Mexican mission many pure-blooded Lamanites have been baptized. Yes, even more than were baptized during the ministration of Moses Thatcher, as president of the Mexican mission, with those who succeeded him; namely, August Wilson, Anthony W. Ivins, Heleman Pratt, Horace H. Cummings, and Henry Eyring. More have been baptized this year than were baptized during the ministry of all those men.

So I have faith, my brethren and sisters, that the time has come, and I feel that our leader, under the inspiration of the Lord, has made no mistake in opening up the work in that land. I hope to play my part well. I have no desire other than to serve God by serving his children who need my services in that land or in any other land. I have dedicated my life to this work, I have given all upon the altar, and I have had to make sacrifices. As President Ivins said last night, we labor and we do sacrifice, and I have had it brought home to me that the Lord sometimes takes us at our word when we say we are willing to make sacrifices. I have cast my lot in that foreign land to sacrifice for this work, and I wish to continue faithful, my brethren and sisters, I wish to go with the faith and the prayers and the good will of my brethren. I know, as I stated in the beginning, that I only go as a helper. I am contented, I am proud, I am willing to go as an assistant in this great work of the Lord in that land. Oh, how my heart rejoices to think, as I picture now those great buildings that we visited the other day, that those who built them might now be smiling, they might now be rejoicing in the fact that God has moved upon his servants to call some others of his servants to go and bring the truth to their descendants, to call them out of their lethargy, out of their superstitions, out of the traditions through which they have wallowed all these generations, that there might come to them that faith, the greatest thing in all the world, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, upon which this work is builded, that it may be kindled in their hearts and burst into a flame, that they may become workers of righteousness.

I rejoice in this great work. I pray for the blessings of the Lord to be upon the Saints at home and to be upon us who shall go so far away. I have brethren come to me and congratulate me upon my call, which I accept gladly, and they have said: "I wish that I could go. I wish I were numbered among those who are going to that land." Let me give you just one little hint. If you really and truly mean it, prepare yourselves for the work, for I think I can see, as this work begins to open up, the necessity for the calling, not of one thousand men, but of ten times one thousand men, to reach all of our Father's children who yet need the blessings of the gospel. Prepare yourselves by study. Prepare yourselves by getting out of debt. Prepare yourselves by shaping your financial affairs so that when the time comes you can answer, "Aye, Lord, I am ready, take me, and do with me as thou wilt, in the consummation of thy great work among thy children here upon the earth."

May the Lord bless you, my brethren and sisters, and bless us all in his service. My testimony to you is that God lives, that I know he lives, and that Jesus Christ is his Son, and that I, even I, in company with all of you, am made in his image and in his likeness. Oh, how I rejoice to know these things; oh, how I desire to keep alive in myself the faith that I have in Him, and how I anguish and how I grieve when I think of the possibility of that faith being destroyed in my children whom I am obliged to leave to the mercies of the schools of the age, the Church schools and otherwise, and know that there are conditions and that there are men who, if it were possible, are anxious to destroy that faith in my children. I love them as I love my life, but more than anything else, I desire that they shall keep alive the faith that is the foundation of eternal life, faith in the Lord Jesus Christ. I bear you this testimony and invoke the blessings of the Lord upon us all, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

TESTIMONY OF MILANDO PRATT

"President Heber J. Grant, Beloved President: My bosom has swelled with exceeding joy in listening to the most interesting conference services over the radio, from my bedroom, where I have spent most of the time for the past nearly ten years, through a severe operation, followed by a prolonged, painful illness. I have heard distinctly all the tabernacle services, about three miles distant from my home. I am quite sure all the speakers were greatly inspired. Your brother in the Gospel,

"MILANDO PRATT."

Milando Pratt is a cousin of our last speaker, and a son of Orson Pratt who was one of the greatest writers and defenders of the truth that the Church has ever had.

Brother Roberts reminds me that way in the 50's the grandfather of Brother Rey L. Pratt, namely, Parley P. Pratt, first carried the gospel to the land of Chile, in South America.

ELDER JOSEPH BARLOW DEAD

I overlooked announcing that Brother Joseph Barlow, counselor to the President of the Raft River stake, has passed away since our last conference. We extend to the family our sympathy.

MISSIONS ESTABLISHED SINCE LAST CONFERENCE

There have been established since our last conference the North Central States mission, with John G. Allred as President; and the German-Austrian mission, with Elder Fred Tadge as President, formerly president of the Swiss and German mission.

NEW PRESIDENTS OF MISSIONS

Six presidents of missions have been appointed as follows since last conference: J. Howard Jenkins as president of the New Zealand mission; Herbert B. Foulger, acting president of the Tahitian mission; John H. Anderson, president of the Swedish mission; Hugh J. Cannon, president of the Swiss and German mission; and Ernest C. Rossiter, president of the French mission.

MISSION PRESIDENTS RELEASED

Mission presidents released since our last conference: Angus T. Wright, New Zealand mission; Ole B. Peterson, Tahitian mission; Hugo D. E. Peterson, Swedish mission; Russell H. Blood, French mission. All of these released mission presidents have our love and blessing and full confidence, and also those who have been appointed.

ABSENT

There have been absent from this conference, as you know, Elder Reed Smoot, of the Council of the Twelve, in Washington, and Elder James E. Talmage, of the Council of the Twelve, who is presiding over the European mission. The reports from Brother Talmage are very encouraging and very satisfactory, and he is thoroughly enjoying his labors. The newspapers keep us well posted on the very wonderful and magnificent labors that Senator Reed Smoot is performing in Washington. These brethren have our love and confidence and constant prayers for their success.

APPRECIATION AND GRATITUDE EXPRESSED

I feel to say on behalf of the Presidency of the Church that we are very grateful for the wonderful outpouring of the people during this conference. We are grateful for the light and inspiration of the Spirit of the Lord accompanying those who have spoken to us, and we give to the Saints the love and blessing of all of the General Authorities of the Church, and we echo the sentiment that has been uttered here, time and again during this conference, in the opening and closing prayers and in some of the remarks, that the inspiration and spirit of this conference may be carried by the people who have been here to the various stakes of Zion.

May God bless you one and all. May each and every one of us who have a testimony of the divinity of the work in which we are engaged, so order our lives that those who know not the truth, seeing our diligence, our faith, our humility, and our desire to serve God, may be led to investigate the truth that we have to bear to them. This is my prayer and desire, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A sacred solo was sung by Walter Wallace, "Lift up thy heart."

The congregation sang the Doxology.

The closing prayer was offered by Elder John M. White, president of the Yellowstone stake.

Conference was adjourned for six months.

Professor Anthony C. Lund conducted the singing, assisted by B. Cecil Gates. Accompaniments and interludes on the great organ were played by Edward P. Kimball, Tracy Y. Cannon, Alexander Schreiner and Frank W. Asper.

Stenographic reports were made in the Tabernacle by Frank W. Otterstrom, assisted by Joseph Anderson; in the Assembly Hall by Frederick G. Barker. Owing to no previous notification being made of the overflow meetings in Barratt Hall, no provision was made for reporters for those meetings, each speaker furnishing his own synopsis.

WHENCE THIS GOSPEL WE TEACH?

Read

"Restoration of the Gospel"

By OSBORNE J. P. WIDTSOE

"This book prepared by Elder Osborne J. P. Widtsøe, dealing with the important subject of the Restoration of the everlasting Gospel, should be read and its contents carefully considered by those who are seeking after truth. It treats the Restoration clearly, and places before the people many things that have not been generally considered heretofore. It will be a means of strengthening the faith of the youth of Israel and will impart information that is invaluable. May the spirit of truth accompany the work and rest upon all those who diligently read it with a desire to learn of and profit by the Restoration of the Gospel!"

ANOTHER NEW ONE THAT IS WORTH WHILE

The Fruits of Mormonism

FRANKLIN STEWART HARRIS and NEWBERN I. BUTT

Author of "Scientific Research and Human Welfare," etc.

This study grew out of a demand for the real facts concerning conditions among the Mormons. The authors have had the best possible opportunity for making personal observations in every part of Mormondom and they have spent a number of years gathering material for this book. No attempt has been made here to determine the truth or falsity of Mormonism as a religion. The authors have been concerned to discover the accomplishment and condition of the Mormons as regards social welfare and as compared with other peoples of the country. The chief sources used are the reports of the United States Census Bureau and the official reports of various state, county, and municipal agencies.

Successive chapters deal with the effect of the philosophy of Mormonism on the lives of its members; education and the development of leadership among the Mormons; the Mormons as colonizers; their attitude toward the government; their patriotism; their charities; their health; motherhood, marriage, and divorce; insanity and crime.

WHAT DID JOSEPH SMITH KNOW ABOUT SCIENCE?

Read:

Joseph Smith as Scientist

By JOHN A. WIDTSOE

"In the life of every person, who receives a higher education, in or out of schools, there is a time when there seems to be opposition between science and religion; between man-made and God-made knowledge. The struggle for reconciliation between the contending forces is not an easy one. It cuts deep into the soul and usually leaves scars that ache while life endures. There are thousands of young people in the Church today, and hundreds of thousands throughout the world, who are struggling to set themselves right with the God above and the world about them. It is for these young people, primarily, that this book has been written."

Ninety-Sixth Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

FIRST DAY

The 96th Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints convened in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah, Sunday morning, April 4, 1926.

President Heber J. Grant presided. The conference opened promptly at ten o'clock a. m., at which time every available seat was occupied and hundreds were standing in the side aisles and in the gallery. There was an over-flow meeting at the Assembly Hall, which building was also packed to capacity. The services in the Tabernacle were broadcasted by radio to the surrounding country, so that it is estimated that at least fifty thousand people heard the proceedings.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES OF THE CHURCH PRESENT

Of the First Presidency: Heber J. Grant, Anthony W. Ivins and Charles W. Nibley.

Presiding Patriarch: Hyrum G. Smith.

Of the First Council of Seventy:§ J. Golden Kimball, Rulon S. Wells, Joseph W. McMurrin, Charles H. Hart, Levi Edgar Young,||

OFFICERS AND OTHER AUTHORITIES PRESENT

Church Historian and Recorder: Joseph Fielding Smith, and the following assistants: Andrew Jenson, A. William Lund, Junius F. Wells.

Presidents of stakes with their counselors were well represented from the ninety-four stakes of Zion.

*Reed Smoot absent in Washington.

†James E. Talmage absent, presiding over the European mission.

‡Melvin J. Ballard absent in South America, engaged in opening a mission there.

§B. H. Roberts excused on account of engagements in the Eastern States mission.

||Rey L. Pratt absent in South America, assisting in opening a mission there.

The Priesthood Quorums, including the high priests, seventies and elders, and bishops and their counselors, from all parts of the Church, were in attendance; officers of the auxiliary organizations both of men and of women were present, and also members of the Board of Education.

Mission Presidents were in attendance, as follows: John H. Taylor, Northern States; Samuel O. Bennion, Central States; John M. Knight, Western States; Joseph W. McMurrin, California; Brigham S. Young, Northwestern States; Joseph Quinney, Jr., Canada; John G. Allred, Northcentral States; Charles A. Callis, Southern States; Benjamin Goddard, Bureau of Information, Temple Block, Salt Lake City, Utah, and Kenneth Haymore, acting president of the Mexican mission in the absence of Elder Rey L. Pratt who was in South America.

President Grant announced that Elder J. Golden Kimball would preside at the Assembly Hall overflow meeting; and that the music would be furnished by the Murray First ward and by Millcreek ward, of the Cottonwood stake. Appointments were also made for speakers.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn on page 198, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation."

Prayer was offered by Elder C. Clarence Neslen, bishop of the Twentieth ward, Salt Lake City.

The choir sang: "The morning breaks, the shadows flee."

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

This is a very wonderful gathering of Latter-day Saints, the Tabernacle being crowded to overflowing. It is certainly an inspiring sight, and bears witness to the interest and devotion of the Latter-day Saints. I humbly pray that while I stand before you this morning I may be able to say something that shall in some small degree fulfil my share of this conference, and which you can take away with you and feel that you have received some benefit by leaving your homes, some of you from Canada on the north to Mexico on the south, and from New York to San Francisco.

CAUSE FOR REJOICING

I rejoice in the growth of the work of God. I rejoice in the integrity and devotion and the willing self-sacrifice of the people. I am very thankful for all of the many blessings that have come to us as a people, from the time when that great pioneer, Brigham Young, and that wonderful band of men and women, one hundred and forty odd, first came to this valley. I am thankful for the blessings of the Lord that have attended the Saints, notwithstanding the drivings and the persecutions and the mobbings that they have had to endure during the 96 years since the organization of the Church.

It is generally expected that at the April conference of the Church something shall be given in the nature of statistics regarding the condition of the Church. Therefore, before making any special remarks, I shall give you a few items of interest.

CHANGES IN OFFICERS, AND CHURCH STATISTICS

Stake Presidents Honorably Released.

Mark Austin, Fremont stake; Peter M. Hansen (deceased), Bear River stake; Nelson J. Hogan, Idaho stake; Heber C. Austin, Idaho Falls stake.

New Stake Presidents

George S. Romney, Fremont stake; Milton H. Welling, Bear River stake; J. Fred Corbett, Idaho stake; Frederick A. Caine, Idaho Falls stake.

Mission Presidents Honorably Released

Albert R. Peterson, Norwegian mission; John S. Hansen, Danish mission; Charles S. Hyde, Netherlands mission; Herbert B. Foulger, Tahitian mission (acting).

Mission Presidents Appointed

Martin Christopherson, Norwegian mission; Joseph L. Peterson, Danish mission; John P. Lillywhite, Netherlands mission; Alma G. Burton, Tahitian mission.

STATISTICS

There are at present: stakes of Zion, 94; wards, 909; independent branches, 76; missions, 26; branches in missions, 716, making a total of 1701 wards and branches now in the Church.

There were less than twenty stakes of Zion at the time I was chosen to be one of the twelve apostles of the Church, 43 years ago.

Since our conference in 1925, 69 stake and ward meeting houses have been erected and 24 buildings in our missions, which makes a total of 93 structures during the year.

We have not yet completed the Arizona temple, but the expenditures up to the 31st of December, 1925, on that building were $540,000.

We rejoice in the wonderful growth of work in our temples. In the Salt Lake temple, I learn from brother Geo. F. Richards, we have had as high as 1800 people go through in a single day. Many companies go through there each day, laboring for the salvation of their dead.

In our Church educational system we have enrolled: in Church schools, 4,184; in Seminaries, 10,341; in Religion Classes, 57,000;

Total number receiving week-day religious education, 71,525.

This says nothing of religious education that is being given to 59,000 women in our Relief Societies, 100,000 in our Young Men's and Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement Associations, and a quarter of a million in our Sunday schools. And I am informed that the enrollment of our children in Primary Associations now reaches 100,000.

There were ordinances performed in the temples for the living and the dead last year, 986,321.

Number of people recommended to the temples, 55,695.

We have somewhat more than 2,500 missionaries in the field at the present time.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT

Following are the expenditures from the tithes of the Church for the year 1925:

Stake and Ward Purposes

There has been returned from the tithes to the stakes and wards for building construction, maintenance and operation, $1,486,351.81.

Education

Expended for the construction, maintenance and operation of Church schools, $958,440.67.

Temples

Expended for the construction, maintenance and operation of temples, $319,415.

Charities

For the care of the worthy poor and other charitable purposes, including hospital treatment, $172,352.74.

Missions

For the maintenance and operation of all the missions and for the erection of places of worship and other buildings in the missions, $769,926.79.

Making a total, which has been taken from the tithes and returned by the trustee-in-trust for the maintenance and operation of the stakes and wards, for the maintenance and operation of Church schools and temples, for charities and for mission activities, of $3,706,397.01.

Other Charities

In addition to charities paid from the tithes, as before named, there has also been disbursed the fast offerings, other charities and assistance rendered by the Relief Society, in the sum of $442,868.07, which amount, added to the $172,262.74 paid from the tithes, makes the total charity assistance rendered by the Church, $615,130.81.

There has been collected by the various wards of the Church and paid to missionaries to assist in their maintenance, $131,941.31.

STATISTICS REGARDING THE GROWTH OF THE CHURCH

Children blessed and entered on the records of the Church in the stakes and missions, 20,233.

Children baptized in the stakes and missions, 14,390.

Converts baptized and entered on the records of the stakes and missions, 6,373.

SOCIAL STATISTICS.

Birth rate, 32 per thousand; marriage rate, 15 per thousand; death rate, 6.7 per thousand.

Divorces—There was one divorce in every 20 marriages. Average in the United States is one divorce in every seven marriages.

Families owning their own homes, 73 per cent.

OBEEDIENCE TO LAW

There is at the present time an agitation going on in the United States against the enforcement of prohibition. Straw votes are being taken which show that the overwhelming sentiment of those who have seen fit to vote on this straw ballot are in favor of the repeal or modification of the present law.

There is also a wave of crime sweeping over the country. Perhaps there is nothing of greater importance, next to our spiritual growth, than a determination on the part of the Latter-day Saints to observe the laws of our country. I wish to quote from the immortal Lincoln:

LINCOLN ON THE SUBJECT

"Let every American, every lover of Liberty, every well wisher to his posterity, swear by the blood of the revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. As the patriots of '76 did to the support of the Declaration of Independence, so to the support of the Constitution and laws let every American pledge his life, his property and his sacred honor. Let every man remember that to violate the law is to trample on the blood of his father, and to tear the charter of his own and his children's liberty. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles in her lap; let it be taught in schools, in seminaries, and in colleges; let it be written in primers, in spelling books and almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, enforced in courts of justice. In short, let it become the political religion of the nation."

One of the Articles of our Faith declares that we believe in sustaining the law and supporting the rulers. So that not only should Latter-day Saints follow the advice of the immortal Lincoln, but they should follow the doctrines of the Church to which they belong.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT

Theodore Roosevelt has the following statements to make that would apply more or less to sustaining the law:

"In character we must have virtue, morality, decency and square dealing as the foundation.

"Any man who claims there can be liberty in spite of and against the law is claiming that anarchy is liberty.

"We need strong bodies; more than that, we need strong minds, and finally we need what counts for more than body or mind—character."

"The man who counts is the man who is decent and who makes himself felt as a force for decency."

THE WORD OF WISDOM A REVELATION TO THE SAINTS

The Latter-day Saints have a revelation from God regarding strong bodies. In that revelation it is recorded that tobacco is not good for the body. It is also recorded there that strong drinks are not to be taken internally, but are only for the washing of the body. We are told in this same revelation that hot drinks are not good for man. This revelation was given to the Latter-day Saints in 1833, only three years after the organization of the Church. Yet, there are many of the people who have never lived up to that revelation. But I am thankful that the great majority of the Latter-day Saints are observers of the Word of Wisdom—that tea, coffee, liquor and tobacco are let alone by the Latter-day Saints.

I have read to you that we have seventeen hundred wards and branches in the Church. In each of the wards of the Church there is a bishop and two counselors and a ward clerk, and in each of the independent branches there is a president and two counselors. There are sometimes three presiding officers in the branches throughout the missions, and sometimes only one. But we have an army of men presiding amounting to four or five thousand, and every one of those men must pledge his honor that he will observe the Word of Wisdom. We have now ninety-four stakes, with a presidency of three men, and a stake clerk, and we have twelve high councilors in each of these stakes. In addition we have many alternate high councilors. It will average, I am sure, twenty men to the stake, So we have an army of two thousand there, and every one of these leading men must obey the Word of Wisdom.

ON WOMEN AND SMOKING

I read recently in a paper published in our city:

"The woman smoker is the prominent professional and business woman in every community." I desire to broadcast all over the world that that statement is an absolute falsehood so far as the Latter-day Saints are concerned. Never in my life have I seen a Latter-day Saint woman or girl smoking a cigarette. This article states that last year there were 9,000,000,000 cigarettes smoked by the women of these United States, and that there were 7,000,000,000 cigarettes smoked by women the year before, an increase in round numbers of thirty per cent. The writer said that the woman smoker is "the prominent commercial and business woman in every community." I say: Leave out every Latter-day Saint community, because it is a falsehood.

"She is the wife of your local physician." She is not the wife of any physician in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints so far as I know. "She is the wife of the town banker, the attorney. She is the president of your parent-teacher club, your literary club." These statements are reputed to have been made by Cynthia Grey. I would not be a bit surprised if Cynthia Grey is but a newspaper name, and it is one of the tobacco trusts who furnished the article.

"In other words, it is stuff and nonsense, nowadays, to say that the women who smoke are scarlet ladies." We do not say that. So she has put that in to weaken the fight against this awful curse, cigarette smoking.

"Does nicotine harm the woman any more than the man, if it harms either?" Nicotine harms every man, woman and child that uses tobacco, and we as Latter-day Saints have the word of the Lord God Almighty, the Creator of heaven and earth, to that effect, this lady (or perhaps man), to the contrary notwithstanding.

"I am inclined to believe that even a woman smoker, quite firm in her conviction that she is doing the proper thing" [I do not believe that any woman smoker believes she is doing the proper thing] "would stop smoking, if any real authority could prove she was harming any possible future child of hers." The trained athletes of the nation are pretty good authorities on the harm to the physical body, and they are practically a unit that tobacco and liquor do harm the body. Some of the great baseball clubs of America, who have won championships, won't allow liquor or tobacco to be used by their men.

this country, announces that there is no prospect of success in the athletic line to the man who uses tobacco and liquor.

"But medical savants, when pushed to the wall, seem not much alarmed." When they are not pushed to the wall, the great majority of them acknowledge the harmful influence of these things.

"The president of the Association of Railway Chief Surgeons is quoted as saying 'Fags help men work out problems. Why not women?'"

A whip helps a horse to go a little bit further, but it does not add any strength to the horse, and no narcotic or stimulant that creates an appetite for itself is good for man or woman. And thank the Lord we have his word to that effect.

I will not take any more of your time reading from this article, for it is "rot."

COMMENTS ON SUSTAINING THE LAW

I meant after reading Lincoln's wonderful appeal to sustain the Constitution, to read the following:

Gladstone said, speaking of the Constitution of the United States: "It is the greatest document of its kind that ever sprang from the mind of man."

The faith of the Latter-day Saints and the teaching that I have had since I was a child at my mother's knee, as well as from this stand, is that the Constitution of our country was written by men inspired of the Lord God Almighty. Therefore we, as Latter-day Saints, more than any other people, ought to be supporters of the Constitution, and all constitutional law.

I read a clipping from a great financial paper, as follows:

"Pride goeth before destruction and a haughty spirit before a fall" is as true today as it was 2,500 years ago. The indications of surface conditions are not satisfactory. A crime wave is sweeping the country; hope is necessary to give a thrill in the movies; temperance and self-control have become a joke; observance and respect for law are considered old-fashioned; honest labor is looked upon as something to be avoided; too many are trying to get something for nothing and are going into debt for needless luxuries and harmful pleasures."

LATTER-DAY SAINTS WARNED AGAINST DEBT AND WEALTH

Right here let me warn the Latter-day Saints to buy automobiles and to buy the ordinary necessities of life when they have the money to buy them, and not to mortgage their future. I have heard of people over in England who regularly mortgage their Sunday clothes Monday morning and take them out of "hock" the next Saturday night. I want to say to you that those who discount their future, who run in debt for the ordinary necessities of life and for the luxuries of life, are laying burdens upon themselves that will come back with compound interest to cause them great trouble and humiliation. To quote again:

"Nasty magazines are building up great circulations, while the colleges are closing up their chapels and opening up smoking rooms for the women students."

Again let me say that that cannot be found in any of the Church schools or seminaries. Once more, please leave out the Latter-day Saints.

"I sincerely hope that these things are merely a phase and that the American people are still a God-fearing race. If not, these things are a tremendous indictment of schools and colleges as well as parents. Yes, America has every material blessing at the present time and if we will keep our feet on the ground, the present era of prosperity should continue for years. On the other hand, all wealth is a mere tool which can be used either to upbuild or to destroy. Everything depends on the motives, ambition and tastes of the people who have this tool in their hands."

Wealth is leading to folly and almost to that which would be counted as sin. Pope says:

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As, to be hated, needs but to be seen;
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

AVOID SERVING THE GOD OF FASHION

I am ashamed, as I walk the streets of our cities, at the lack of modesty in the dresses, not only of our young people, but our mothers and even grandmothers. I will rejoice when there shall come over this land again an increased respect for the sacredness of the body and a willingness on the part of our good, pure, upright ladies to dress themselves in a more becoming manner. I shall rejoice when the Latter-day Saints shall endeavor to find out that thing which will bring to them and to their posterity peace and comfort of body and of mind. The Lord said that he was a jealous God, and that we should serve no other God before him. So we should not serve the god of fashion. When our Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement Associations were organized they were organized under the title of the Young Ladies' Retrenchment Associations, and one of the purposes was retrenchment and more modesty in dressing; and I shall rejoice if the Lord will inspire the Latter-day Saints to set a better example in the future than they are setting at the present time.

I want to announce that I shall be glad if we will quit giving notices to the papers of what is termed "teas" that are being held in our homes. I read of a "tea" being given in the home of President Heber J. Grant, and of the "tea" table being decorated. There is no tea table in the home of President Heber J. Grant. There has been no tea served either to our friends or visitors, in the home of Heber J. Grant. I would like us to change that name in our newspapers, at least so far as Latter-day Saints are concerned, and have it a "social gathering," or a lunch, or anything you have a mind to call it, and quit calling it a "tea" when every Latter-day Saint is asked by the Lord to leave tea, coffee and tobacco alone.

PROMISE OF GOD TO OBSERVERS OF THE WORD OF WISDOM

And for fear I forget it, I want to read to you one of the most marvelous and wonderful promises that God has made to every Latter-day Saint that keeps this Word of Wisdom. The Word of Wisdom was given, as stated, only three years after the Church was organized:

"All grain is ordained for the use of man and of beasts, to be the staff of life, not only for man but for beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven, and all wild animals that run or creep on the earth;

"And these hath God made for the use of man only in times of famine and excess of hunger."

It is being acknowledged by the great doctors today that an excessive use of meat is not good for humanity, and the Word of Wisdom teaches us that:

"All grain is good for the food of man; as also the fruit of the vine; that which yieldeth fruit, whether in the ground or above the ground—

"Nevertheless, wheat for man, and corn for the ox, and oats for the horses, and rye for the fowls and for swine, and for all beasts of the field, and barley for all useful animals, and for mild drinks, as also other grain."

Now listen, all ye Latter-day Saints, to the word of the Lord and the promise of the Creator of heaven and earth:

"And all Saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their navel and marrow in their bones;

"And shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures;

"And shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint.

What a marvelous promise! And as there is no promise made by the Lord only upon the condition that we fulfil the law upon which that promise is predicated, the law of life and health to the Latter-day Saints is to obey the Word of Wisdom.

THE SUPPORT OF HOME INSTITUTIONS

Generally at these conferences I have made just a few remarks about supporting our home institutions, I thought I would simply read what I said once before:

"The support of home institutions is the main foundation of any state's prosperity. The support of home industries keeps money at home, furnishes employment, reduces cost and insures prosperity. If all the people of Utah and the other intermountain States would adopt the principle of buying the product of the factories of the Intermountain territory, most of our industrial problems would vanish.

"From the earliest days the people of Utah have been taught to support home industries, and to keep money at home. Where the advice has been followed prosperity has resulted. Now, more than ever, the people of the Intermountain country should stand together and support the institutions which are assisting in the up-building of the territory."

APPEAL TO FARMERS ON THE SUGAR INDUSTRY

I want to say a word to the Latter-day Saints regarding the beet sugar industry. The credit of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was utilized to the extent of something over $3,000,000 a few years ago in borrowing and loaning money to the sugar industry, to keep it from going into the hands of the receiver. This industry was established by the Church running in debt to secure the money to build the very first factory that was ever built in the United States of America with American machinery, for the manufacture of beet sugar, and the Church has always fostered the industry.

I appeal to you farmers, every one of you, in all the various parts of Utah and Idaho, and in Canada now—wherever a sugar factory has been established—to support those factories by planting a goodly portion of suitable land in beets which may be manufactured into sugar. A great many of the farmers seem to feel that they are under no obligation whatever to support these factories, some of which have been built upon the earnest solicitation and upon the absolute pledge of the farmers that they would furnish so many thousand acres of beets for each factory. Several of these factories have had to remain idle. Why? Because these pledges have not been fulfilled.

Our Lord and Savior said:

"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind.

"This is the first and great commandment.

"And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

As one of your neighbors, who has labored diligently and invested all he had originally, and lost every dollar of it, in establishing this great industry, I appeal to you farmers to love me and others who established it. My personal stock amounts to very little, I could not sell it today for $500, but the Church has invested several million dollars in establishing and maintaining this industry for the benefit of the farmers. Therefore, I appeal to you to have no idle beet sugar factories in your communities; and by supporting these factories you will bring additional money into your communities, and will be fulfilling the second great commandment; to love your neighbors.

WHAT THE CHURCH REQUESTS AS TO CARD PLAYING

By the way, I hear that card playing is becoming very, very popular, and that the Church must be in favor of card-playing because the Church authorities never say anything against it. From the time I was a child and read the Juvenile Instructor, published for the benefit of the people, I have read nothing except condemnation of card-playing and the wasting of your time in doing something that brings no good, bodily, intellectually or in any way, and sometimes leads your children to become gamblers, because they become expert card-players. The Church as a Church requests its members not to play cards. I hope you understand me, and I want you to know that I am speaking for the Church when I ask the people to let cards alone.

SUSTAIN THE DESERET NEWS

Again I am speaking for the Church when I ask Latter-day

Saints to sustain the newspaper published by the Church. I have gone into the homes of bishops and other leading families in this Church, and have failed to find The Deseret Evening News. We desire the support of The Deseret News because it is your paper. We are the Church and the Church owns The Deseret News, and if you make it a great financial success you will be sharing in that success because it is your paper. And I want to say to the Latter-day Saints that there have been a score or more of speeches published in The News in the past year, nearly every one of which to my mind was worth the price of The Deseret News. I called up an influential man the other day and asked if he had read one, two or three of those sermons. He said no. I want to tell you that a sermon by one of the greatest educational minds in Utah, (I doubt there is a superior one) Dr. Joseph F. Merrill, over the radio and subsequently enlarged upon from this stand, was published in The News. I would not take a fifty dollar bill for it if I could not get it again.

We are here—for what? For the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and we get it in The Deseret News. I will say to you that one of the finest sermons on Priesthood that I have listened to—(by the way, I did not listen to it; but I read it in The News)—was by one of the great lawyers of America, one of the international lawyers, a man honored by our country to be called to Washington in the great conference on disarmament, J. Reuben Clark. You did not read it if you do not take The News. It was a splendid talk. I want to say to you that the talks by Adam Bennion and by Milton Bennion are worth the price of The News for a year. I will have to stop talking about The News, or I won't get through with the other things I want to say.

AUTHORITIES ABSENT FROM CONFERENCE

There are absent today of the General Authorities, Elders Reed Smoot, James E. Talmage, and Melvin J. Ballard of the Council of the Twelve. Elder Reed Smoot, as you all know, is a Senator from Utah, and thank the Lord for such a senator, a man who has gained for himself a national and an international reputation for his honesty, for his integrity, and for his great and wonderful ability, and he stands today at the head of the greatest committee in the senate of the United States. I remember when ex-President Taft was here he said, with that little chuckle of his that made us all laugh, "And to think that when he first came down to Washington nearly everybody tried to keep him out of the senate. Now I have come all the way to Utah to plead with the people to be sure and send him back again."

Elder James E. Talmage is doing a wonderful and splendid work in the British Isles as president of the European mission. Elder Talmage, as you know, is a Fellow of the Royal Society of Edinburgh, and the distinction of being a member of one of the greatest scientific societies in the world has enabled him to get favorable articles into the newspapers, in such a way as we have never been able to do before in the British Isles.

Elder Melvin J. Ballard is opening a mission, as you all know, in South America, and is meeting with some success.

Elder Brigham H. Roberts of the First Council of Seventy, has appointments in the East, and on account of the death of his wife and having to come here to her funeral, he has been excused from this conference. He is accomplishing a remarkable and wonderful labor in the Eastern States.

Elder Rey L. Pratt of the First Council of Seventy is with Brother Ballard in South America.

Elder Rulon S. Wells of the same council went to South America, as you all know, but on account of ill health had to return.

Splendid missionary work is being done by all those who are engaged in the different missions in the United States and all over the world, for which we are grateful.

CALLS FOR MISSIONARIES

We have calls for missionaries from every quarter of the globe—more missionaries, more missionaries. The lady missionaries, we want it understood, are called to labor only in the United States. There are requests coming constantly that we send lady missionaries to other parts of the world, but we feel it is a mistake to send our sisters further away.

A very remarkable and splendid work has been done by the short term missionaries that were sent out. We regret that the call came so late, and many of them have only been able to stay in the field three months, some of them four and some of them five months. We hope we can have more short-term missionaries, and that they will be able to spend the full six months in the mission field. Some of the accomplishments of these men have been very remarkable. Men of experience, men of testimony, and of undying faith in the gospel have brought many souls to a knowledge of the truth. Perhaps some of our school teachers during their vacations can volunteer and will be willing to do missionary work.

AN EASTER GREETING

This is Easter, and I wish to read to you a greeting that was published in The Deseret Evening News for Christmas and I believe it is equally as appropriate for Easter Sunday:

Greetings from the First Presidency of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints:

As Christmas tide approaches our minds revert to that never to be forgotten night when shepherds who were watching their flocks on the hills of Judea were startled as the glory of the Lord shone round about them, and the angel of the Lord stood before them and said: "Fear not, for behold I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

"For unto you is born this day, in the City of David, a Savior which is Christ the Lord.

"And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly hosts, praising God and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men."

It was a night which was distinct from all other nights which had come and gone since the creation of the earth.

The birth of Christ our Lord was more than an incident, it was an epoch in the history of the world to which prophets had looked forward, of which poets had sung, and in which angels joined their voices with mortals in praise to God. It was the day decreed and foreordained by our Father who is in heaven when he would manifest himself to his children, who are here upon earth, in the person of his Only Begotten Son.

Whether or not the 25th day of December is the proper date of the birth of Christ, our Lord, matters little. We join with other Christian people in celebrating it as such and if we observe it in the true spirit of the Master, renewing the covenant which we have made that we are willing to take upon us his name, and keep the commandments which he has given, our offering will be accepted.

He came that man might see and know God as he is, for he bore witness that whoever had seen him had seen the Father, for he was the express image of his person.

He came to teach us the character of God, and by example and precept pointed out the path which, if we walk in it, will lead us back into his presence. He came to break the bands of death with which man was bound, and made possible the resurrection by which the grave is robbed of its victory and death of its sting.

After his crucifixion and the death of the apostles whom he had chosen, who suffered martyrdom at the hands of those who were opposed to the truths which he taught, it appeared that his mission and ministry had been a failure; but as time passed, and the doctrines of Christianity became better understood, thoughtful men turned to him as their source of light and strength, thus preserving faith in his mission and ministry, with the result that Christianity became the dominant influence in the civilization and development of the world.

As time passed dissensions occurred in the primitive church. The laws governing the church established by the Redeemer, were transgressed, the ordinances were changed, the everlasting covenant was broken. Men began to teach for doctrine their own commandments; a form of worship had been established which was called Christianity, but was without the power of God which characterized the primitive church. Spiritual darkness covered the earth and gross darkness the minds of the people.

Then there came another epochal period in the history of the world. The time had arrived, fore-ordained by the Lord, and foretold by his prophets, when another gospel dispensation was to be ushered in, when the gospel of the kingdom was to be restored, and preached in all the world, as a witness unto all people before the end shall come.

Again the heavens rejoiced, again heavenly beings communicated the will of the Father to his children who are here upon the earth, and men were made glad as the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times was ushered in.

Joseph Smith was the agent through whom the Lord saw fit to begin the great latter-day work. To him the Father and Son appeared in heavenly vision, upon him the keys of the everlasting priesthood were conferred, with authority to transmit them to others, with the promise that the priesthood should never be taken from the earth again, until the purposes of the Father were accomplished.

Under his direction the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was organized on the 6th day of April, 1830, and the command given to its members to bear the gospel message to all people, calling them to repentance and faith in Christ, the Only Begotten Son of God in the flesh, with the promise that whosoever should repent and obey would know, by the gift of the Holy Ghost, that the message which they brought was true.

As the result of this message many thousands of people have been gathered out from the various nations where the gospel has been preached and brought to Zion, the place designated by the Lord as the gathering place of Latter-day Israel. The desert has been made glad because of them, and has been converted into fruitful fields. Springs of living water have broken out to moisten the thirsty land, and cities have sprung up where before was only desolation and wilderness. Music and the voices of children are heard in the streets where silence had reigned supreme.

It is the Lord our God, through his Only Begotten Son, who has done it. To him be the praise and glory forever.

We exhort our brethren and sisters of the Church, wherever they may be, to remain steadfast in their faith. Hold fast to the word of the Lord, which is the iron rod that will lead us to the Tree of Life.

To the people of the world we appeal to come unto Christ, through whom redemption cometh to all those who take upon them his name, and keep the commandments which he has given. We bear witness that the fulness of his gospel has been restored, that his Church is established, and will continue to spread until peace shall prevail among men, and his kingdom come and his will be done upon earth as it is done in heaven. O Lord, hasten that glorious day.

HEBER J. GRANT,
ANTHONY W. IVINS,
CHARLES W. NIBLEY,

First Presidency.

God bless you. Amen.

PRESIDENT ANTHONY W. IVINS

I sincerely desire, my brethren and sisters, during the few moments of time that I may occupy, that I may have the benefit of your faith, exercised in my behalf. I appreciate fully the responsibility which I assume, as I stand here professing to teach the doctrines of our Lord, Jesus Christ.

THE ADVICE OF GAMALIEL

The scripture which I am about to read I have often quoted before, but it appears so appropriate to the subject which I desire briefly to discuss that it will bear repetition. The apostles who had been chosen by our Lord had been imprisoned by those who were opposed to the doctrines which they taught, and had been arraigned before the Jewish high priests, by whom they were accused of violating the law. When opportunity was granted them to speak in their own behalf, Peter stood up and said:

"The God of our fathers raised up Jesus, whom ye slew and hanged on a tree.

"Him hath God exalted with his right hand to be a Prince and a Savior, for to give repentance to Israel, and forgiveness of sins.

"And we are his witnesses of these things; and so is also the Holy Ghost, whom God hath given to them that obey him.

"When they heard that, they were cut to the heart, and took counsel to slay them,

"Then stood there up one in the council, a Pharisee, named Gamaliel, a doctor of the law, had in reputation among all the people, and commanded to put the apostles forth a little space; and said unto them:

"Ye men of Israel, take heed to yourselves what ye intend to do as touching these men. * * *

"For if this counsel or this work be of men, it will come to nought: But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it."

NORWAY DECIDES THE "MORMONS" ARE NOT CHRISTIANS

During the past ninety-six years the restored gospel of Christ has been preached in both the old and the new world without serious governmental opposition, or objection on the part of the people at large.

From the time of its introduction into the Scandinavian, and other countries of Europe, people who appear to have been prepared for the gospel before they heard it have joyfully accepted the message which the elders of the Church have carried to them, and the converts who have been gathered out from among those nations have become a pillar of strength to the Church.

To our surprise and regret the friendly relations which have so long existed have recently become greatly disturbed, because of the fact that our missionaries have been refused admittance to Norway, where, before, they had enjoyed the privileges accorded to other religious organizations. Upon inquiry regarding the reason for this changed attitude we were informed that representatives of the Christian churches of the country, in convention assembled, had passed resolutions to the effect that the "Mormon" Church is not a Christian organization, and consequently we were not entitled to the privileges, and protection under the law which we have hitherto enjoyed.

Our protest against this ruling was answered by the statement that the only means by which it could be modified would be for a conference of churches to assemble, and officially declare that the jury which, without having given us an opportunity to be heard in our own behalf, had decided that we were guilty, must meet and reverse the decision which they had rendered, a court before which we could expect no more of justice than was accorded the Redeemer of the world, when arraigned before the Jewish Sanhedrin.

From the published account of the proceedings of the general assembly of a convention of representatives of one of the great churches of our own country, held during the year just passed, I quote as follows:

"The American Islam. Thus has the 'Mormon' area often been characterized. It is an apt figure of speech. Those who live and labor in the atmosphere of this Islam of America, know what it means to go up against a stone wall, with scarcely ever feeling it give a little. The 'Mormon' has, to date, been far more zealous to convert the Christian, than the Christian has to convert him."

Islamism, as you are aware, is the religion of Mohammed. In one respect it is a good religion, for it at least teaches faith in, and service to a living God, the God of Abraham, but it does not recognize Jesus Christ as the Redeemer of the world, or as the Son of God.

From the foregoing, my brethren and sisters, you will observe that the Church of which you are members is declared, both in the old world, and here in our own country, to be an un-Christian organization, and as a consequence you are declared to be not Christians.

BOTH DECLARATIONS INEXCUSABLE AND UNTRUE

Had statements such as those been made ninety-six years ago, soon after the organization of the Church, when means of obtaining information was limited, and the history and accomplishments of the Church were before it, and not behind, there might have been some reason for the exercise of charity towards the persons responsible for the publication of such statements to the people of the world, but now, after the lapse of nearly a century, after the doctrines of the Church have been expounded to the people of all civilized countries, after millions of publications setting forth the doctrines of the Church have been distributed, such statements can only be regarded as the result of either inexcusable ignorance or wilful desire to deceive the people, by statements which are known to be untrue.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A CHRISTIAN?

The situation suggests the question: What constitutes a Christian Church, a Christian community or individual, and by what rule, or tribunal is a question of such vital importance to be decided?

I suppose the general answer would be: A Christian is one who professes faith in, and follows the teachings of Christ, and that a body of people, organized as a worshiping assembly, professing faith in the Redeemer, would be regarded as a Christian church.

During the earliest history of the Primitive Church its members were not referred to as Christians, but as brethren, disciples or saints. It was at Antioch, as I remember, about ten years after the crucifixion, that the followers of the Redeemer were first called Christians, a name applied to them in derision, or contempt which they accepted very much as we have accepted the name "Mormon," because we accept the Book of Mormon as a divine revelation from the Lord.

The first use of the word church, applied to the followers of Christ, so far as I am aware, was by the Redeemer himself when he declared to Peter that upon the rock of revelation he would build his Church, and that the gates of hell should not prevail against it, a very significant statement, a plain declaration that revelation is the foundation upon which the Church must rest.

We are told that the apostles, as they traveled from place to place, preaching to the people, ordained elders in every church, and after commending the converted members to the Lord passed on to other fields. Thus the entire body of converts became known as the Church of Christ, he being declared to be its head, the Church being subject to him in all things.

THE ANSWER GIVEN IN THE WORDS OF OUR LORD AND HIS DISCIPLES

I know of no better authority on the question than the words of our Lord, and those of his disciples, who followed after him.

Before an organization could be formed which could be designated as a church, it was necessary that converts be made to the divinity of the Redeemer, and the importance of the message which he brought to the people of the world. His doctrine, or as he taught, the doctrine of his Father who sent him, as he expounded it in his memorable sermon on the mount, teaches us the manner of life we should lead in order that we may be worthy to be called Christians.

He taught us to overcome the evil habits of the world, its pride and selfishness, becoming humble in spirit, and promised that by so doing we should inherit the blessings of the earth. He taught us that we are to be peace-makers, if we are to become the children of God. That our example should be such that others seeing our good works, would be led to glorify the name of our Father who is in heaven. That, as we hope for mercy, we should be merciful. That we should not sit in judgment upon others, for by the judgment with which we judge, so shall we be judged. That we should not seek to exalt ourselves, for he who exalteth himself shall be abased. That we should be charitable, but admonishing us that if we give alms to be seen of men, for our own glory, it availeth us nothing.

His entire doctrine was one which requires that men withdraw from the ambition, selfishness and strife of the world, and dedicate themselves to the service of the Lord, and their fellow men, and he covenanted that if they will do so the necessary temporal blessings shall be conferred upon them, as a reward for righteousness.

He declared another doctrine of great importance in that remarkable discourse, that not all who say Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he who doeth the will of our Father who is in heaven.

Therefore he said, whosoever heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them, I will liken him to a wise man who built his house upon a rock. And the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it fell not, for it was founded upon a rock. And he who heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not shall be likened unto a foolish man, who built his house upon sand, and the rains descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew and beat upon that house, and it fell, for it was founded upon sand, and great was the fall of it.

The acceptance of these first principles of the gospel were indispensable, but not sufficient to entitle one to be called a Christian. He must manifest his faith by accepting the ordinance of baptism, an ordinance which was administered to the Redeemer himself by John the Baptist, an ordinance without which our Lord declared a man cannot enter the kingdom of heaven.

Nor was baptism alone sufficient. John declared that his baptism was with water for the remission of sin, but that one who would come after him would baptize with fire and the Holy Ghost.

THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH DEFINED

When Paul came to Ephesus he found certain disciples and asked if they had received the Holy Ghost. They answered we have not so much as heard that there be any Holy Ghost. Unto what then were you baptized, he asked, and they replied unto John's baptism. They were then baptized in the name of the Lord Jesus, and when Paul had laid his hands upon them they received the Holy Ghost.

Those who believed, and subjected themselves to the administration of these simple first ordinances of the Church became Christians. They had manifested their faith in Christ, in his divinity, his death, and above all his resurrection from the grave by being buried in the water of baptism, in similitude of his death, and coming up from it with their sins washed away, born to newness of life, as he arose to newness of life, with his glorified, resurrected body.

Then came the climax, when, by laying on of hands by those in authority the Holy Ghost was conferred upon the baptized believer: The Holy Ghost, which takes of the things of the Father and manifests them unto man, which bears witness of the Father and the Son, not in a voice audible to our ordinary sense of hearing, but at the same time more potent and convincing than any words the human voice can utter; the Holy Ghost which leads us into all truth and is an unfailing source of strength, wisdom and knowledge so long as we permit ourselves to be guided by its unerring counsels.

Such a person became a Christian, and an association of such people became a Christian church.

That a church may be brought into existence and endure it must be properly organized, with officers to preside over it and direct the conduct of its affairs, and these our Lord provided through the Twelve Apostles whom he chose, and the quorums of the lesser priesthood with their helps in government, an organization complete in every detail, conferring upon the men chosen the keys of authority which belong to the priesthood, and which authorize them to act in the direction of the affairs of the Church.

That any group of persons may associate themselves together as a worshiping assembly, and call themselves a church is conceded, and they are at liberty to choose any name they may desire by which their organization shall be known. For all the good which such an organization may accomplish the Lord will give them credit, and they will be rewarded for their efforts to establish faith in the hearts of people, I believe far beyond their expectations, for everything that is good, and persuadeth men to do good, cometh from God. The Latter-day Saints wish all people who are thus striving God-speed.

CALAMITIES THAT FOLLOWED

After the crucifixion of the Redeemer, and the death of the apostles whom he had chosen, all of whom suffered violent death because of their faith, with the exception of John the Revelator, many different religious sects came into existence, numbers of them professing Christianity, but teaching doctrines at variance with those taught by the Redeemer and his disciples.

Prior to his crucifixion, our Lord plainly outlined to his disciples that the time was approaching when he would be offered up, when he would leave them, but promised that at a future time he would return and consummate the work which he had commenced. Upon one occasion, as he sat on the Mount of Olives, his disciples came to him and asked when these things should be, and what would be the sign of his coming and of the end of the world.

The Redeemer outlined the conditions which would prevail at the time when he would come in glory, in the clouds of heaven, with such detail and accuracy that one who lives at the present time may read as he runs, and know that he lives in the day to which Christ referred. Read the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth chapters of the Gospel according to St. Matthew, my brethren and sisters, if you desire to know more of the tremendous importance of the dispensation in which you live.

Upon this occasion he said to his disciples: "Take heed that no man deceive you. For many shall come in my name, saying, I am Christ; and shall deceive many." For there shall be false Christs and false prophets, who if it were possible would deceive the very elect. And they shall deliver you up to be afflicted, and you shall be hated of all nations for my name's sake, and, most important of all, this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, as a witness unto all people, and then shall the end come.

The Prophet Isaiah says: "Behold the Lord maketh the earth empty, and maketh it waste, and turneth it upside down, and scattereth abroad the inhabitants thereof. The land shall be utterly emptied and spoiled."

THE REASON FOR APOSTASY AND CALAMITIES

Why are these dire calamities decreed? The prophet makes the reason clear, it is because both priest and people have transgressed the law of the Lord, changed the ordinances of his Church and broken the everlasting covenant. Our Lord gave us the key by which we may know the voice of the good Shepherd when this time of confusion and distress is upon us. When his disciples asked him whither they should go, or look, he replied: "Wheresoever the carcase is there will the eagles be gathered together," and, wherever the true Church of Christ is, there will the fruits of his gospel be manifested in the lives of the people.

WHY THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS IS A CHRISTIAN CHURCH

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a Christian Church in the fullest sense of the word, the declarations of the so-called Christian churches of the world to the contrary notwithstanding. In its establishment and accomplishments the words of the Redeemer, and the declarations of the prophets who lived before and after him are fulfilled. In justification of this declaration permit me to make the following statement, briefly, because a subject of such tremendous importance can only be touched upon in one brief discourse.

BRIEF STORY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE CHURCH

One hundred seven years ago, Joseph Smith, at the time in his fifteenth year, lived with his parents at Manchester, in the state of New York. While a great religious revival was being held in the neighborhood he found himself in doubt as to which of the contending sects he should join, for there was great rivalry among them in their efforts to secure converts.

Profoundly religious he had never conceived the idea that all were wrong, neither could he believe that all were right, because of the great difference in doctrine and organization which existed. Familiar with the scriptures he knew that the Lord had promised wisdom to all who lacked it, if they would go to him in faith, and believing that the question which he was not able to decide would be answered by the Lord, he retired to the woods and engaged in earnest prayer.

While thus occupied a vision was unfolded in which he saw two glorious personages, whose brightness and glory, he says, defied all description. One of these personages, pointing to the other, said: "This is my beloved Son, hear him."

The Person referred to told Joseph that he should join none of the existing churches, that all were wrong, that they drew near him with their lips, but their hearts were removed far from him, and they taught for doctrine the commandments of men.

Nothing of importance occurred in the life of Joseph Smith, except that he was persecuted and ridiculed because he maintained that he had seen this vision, until three years later, when, while engaged in prayer in his bed room, Joseph says that a light began to appear, which increased in brilliancy until the room was brighter than at noon-day, when a personage appeared at his bedside, clothed in a robe of exquisite whiteness.

This personage said that he was a messenger sent from the presence of God, and that his name was Moroni, that the Lord had a great work for Joseph to do, and that his name should be known for both good and evil among all nations, that among some it would be held in honor, and among others in reproach. He also told him that there was a book deposited, written upon gold plates, containing the history of the ancient inhabitants of this continent, and that it also contained the fulness of the everlasting gospel, as it was delivered by the Savior to them, and that there was also deposited the Urim and Thummim, by means of which the characters engraven on the plates could be translated. This was the Book of Mormon, which was later delivered to Joseph Smith, translated by him and first published to the world in 1830.

While engaged in the work of translation, assisted by Oliver Cowdery, Joseph observed the importance which attached to the ordinance of baptism, and desiring greater light he and Oliver went to a secluded spot, on the bank of the Susquehanna River, and engaged in prayer. While thus occupied they bear witness that a messenger from heaven descended in a cloud of light, and laying his hands upon their heads said: "Upon you my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah I confer the Priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels, and of the gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins, and this shall never be taken again from the earth, until the sons of Levi do offer again an offering unto the Lord in righteousness."

This messenger told them that he was John the Baptist, that he acted under instruction from Peter, James and John. That the Aaronic Priesthood, which he had conferred had not the power to lay on hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost, but that the keys of the Melchizedek Priesthood would be later conferred upon them. This latter priesthood was conferred upon Joseph and Oliver at a later date under the hands of Peter, James and John, who ordained them to the Apostleship, and committed to them the keys of the kingdom, and of the Gospel Dispensation of the Fulness of Times.

It is upon this authority that the Church assumes to speak and act in the name of the Lord.

THE CHURCH NOT A FACTION, BUT THE RESTORED CHURCH OF CHRIST

The Church is not a protestant faction which has broken away from the mother church, or from any other religious body. It is the Church of Christ, our Lord, restored to earth as he and the prophets declared it should be, restored for the purpose of gathering the outcasts of Israel, that the way may be prepared for the coming of the Redeemer of the world, and the consummation of the purposes of the Lord, in so far as they pertain to the present generation of mankind, who occupy the small portion of the universe, which we call the world.

WE DO NOT BELIEVE IT, SAY OBJECTORS

Yes, says the objector, if this story were true your authority would be sufficient, but we do not believe it. We do not believe that Joseph Smith, in vision, saw and communed with the Father and Son. We do not believe that heavenly messengers visited him, nor that the keys of the Priesthood were conferred upon him by John the Baptist, nor by Peter, James and John. These men died more than a thousand years ago, and the dead do not return to visit the living. Visions and the visitation of angels have long since been done away with, there are no such things in the age in which we live, Joseph Smith was either a visionary dreamer, and these imaginings were the result of a disordered mind, or else he was a wilful impostor.

Neither did the people believe the words of the Redeemer of the world. They declared him to be an impostor, a disturber of the peace, that he was guilty of sedition, and was a blasphemer, because he declared himself to be the Son of God, and it was upon these and other similar charges that he was condemned to death upon the cross. The people did not believe that Moses and Elias appeared to Peter, James and John, at the time of the transfiguration of the Redeemer, they had long been dead, and could not return.

Nor did they believe Paul when he declared to King Agrippa and Festus, that as he journeyed toward Damascus, at noon day a light brighter than the sun descended from heaven which caused him, and those who were with him to fall to the earth. That a voice called to him declaring that it was Jesus of Nazareth who spoke, telling him to arise, and stand upon his feet, and said: "I have appeared unto thee for this purpose, to make thee a minister and a witness" to the people, especially to the Gentiles, "to open their eyes, and to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of satan unto God." The Redeemer had been crucified, declared dead, and Festus, who could not understand how he could appear to anyone, cried out: "Paul, thou art beside thyself; much learning doth make thee mad." But Paul answered, "I am not mad, most noble Festus; but speak forth the words of truth and soberness."

WE BEAR WITNESS OF THE RESTORATION

So do we in soberness and truth bear witness to the people of the world today, to king and subject, to patrician and plebeian, to rich and poor, to Christian and heathen; that Joseph Smith was divinely called to be the instrument in the hands of the Lord in the restoration of the gospel of Christ; that the keys of the Priesthood were conferred upon him as has been stated, and have come down through his successors to the present. Another thing to which we bear witness is that all men may know the truth of the testimony which we bear by asking the Lord for it in faith. It is not by the words of men that you have been converted, my brethren and sisters, but by the gift of the Holy Ghost, which has borne witness of the truth of these things, and this great congregation of people would arise and testify to the truth of what I say if requested to do so.

WHAT WE BELIEVE

We believe in the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary, and that the Child born at Bethlehem of Judea was in very deed the Son of God, the Only Begotten of the Father in the flesh. That he is our advocate with the Father, the medium through which we reach the throne of grace.

The foundation of the Church is laid in God the Eternal Father, his Son Jesus Christ and the Holy Ghost, which constitute the Godhead. No person can become a member of the Church until he has taken upon him the name of Christ, and entered into the covenant that he is willing to serve him, and keep the commandments which he has given, to the best of his ability. He must accept the ordinance of baptism, which is administered in the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, in other words he must accept Christ as the Redeemer of the world, without reservation.

The members of the Church meet together once each week and partake of the sacrament in remembrance of the body and blood of our Lord. Every ordinance of the Church, every act performed, is administered in the name of Christ.

BUT WHAT ABOUT THE BOOK OF MORMON, SAY OBJECTORS

But, says the objector, you accept the Book of Mormon as a revelation from God, thus bringing a new Bible into use when there can be but one Bible, and this we cannot accept. Even if such a record were to be brought forth, would the Lord undertake to accomplish it through the medium of an unlearned young man, when we have many profound scholars among us?

Our reply to that objection is, he did choose Joseph Smith to accomplish it, and that should be sufficient answer. It is the same question asked regarding the Redeemer: "Is not this the carpenter's Son? is not his mother called Mary?" and are not his brothers and sisters all with us, whence hath this man all of these things?

Why do Christian people reject the Book of Mormon? It is the strongest corroborative evidence of the truth of the Bible, and the divine mission of the Redeemer that exists in the world, and should be welcomed by all Christian people. It is of special value to America, and particularly to the people of the United States. It is the Holy Scripture of the American continent, and it outlines the establishment and destiny of our nation, asserting that our government was established by inspiration from the God of the land, whom it declares is Jesus Christ, and warns us that if we turn from him, and cease longer to recognize and serve him, his protection will be withdrawn, and the great promises which he made in regard to our destiny will be of no effect.

ALL THE "MORMONS" ASK IS PERMISSION TO BELIEVE AS THEY CHOOSE

The Latter-day Saints recognize and appreciate the great work accomplished by the Christian churches of the world since the Reformation, in breaking down kingcraft, and priestcraft, thus preparing the way for the establishment of free government, freedom of worship, and the coming of our Lord Jesus.

When brought before the Jewish high priests, Peter speaking for the Twelve declared that God had sent his Son to bring salvation to Israel. Hearing this truth they took council to slay them.

So it is with us today. The world says if you will renounce this fable regarding visions and heavenly visitations to Joseph Smith, we will accept you as Christian people. Like Peter and Paul we answer: This we can never do, because it is the truth, and the experiences of the past teach us that it is dangerous to ignore the truth.

All that we ask is to be permitted to believe as we choose, and we grant all men this privilege. We ask the people of the world to rely upon the words of Gamaliel, which have been quoted, for they are as true today as they were when uttered. If this work is of men it will come to naught, but if it is of God you cannot overthrow it. Like the primitive church, being defamed we entreat, being ridiculed we revile not; being persecuted we patiently submit, knowing that error must eventually yield to truth, and that time is the friend of innocence. We submit our cause to the Lord, our God, to whom be glory and praise and honor, through Jesus Christ, his Son. Amen.

The choir sang an anthem, "O blessed be the Lord," with music by B. Cecil Gates, and the solo by Delores Seal.

Closing prayer was offered by Elder Joseph B. Keeler, of Provo. The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock.

AFTERNOON SESSION

At 2 o'clock the congregation was asked by President Heber J. Grant, who presided, to sing with the choir the hymn, "How firm a foundation, ye Saints of the Lord." The hymn was sung with spirit and earnestness.

Elder Winslow Farr Smith, president of the Ensign stake of Zion, offered the opening prayer.

The choir sang the hymn, "An angel from on high," the duets being sung by Mrs. Alfred W. Davis and Hyrum Christensen, with sympathetic interpretation.

PRESIDENT CHARLES W. NIBLEY

I read from the twenty-fourth chapter of Luke, beginning at the first verse:

CHRIST'S RESURRECTION

"Now upon the first day of the week, very early in the morning, they came unto the sepulchre, bringing the spices which they had prepared, and certain others with them.

"And they found the stone rolled away from the sepulchre.

"And they entered in, and found not the body of the Lord Jesus.

"And it came to pass, as they were much perplexed thereabout, behold, two men stood by them in shining garments:

"And as they were afraid, and bowed down their faces to the earth, they said unto them, Why seek ye the living among the dead?

"He is not here, but is risen: remember how he spake unto you when he was yet in Galilee,

"Saying, the Son of man must be delivered into the hands of sinful men, and be crucified, and the third day rise again.

And they remembered his words."

DOUBLE ASSURANCE OF THE RISEN LORD

Throughout the Christian world today this event is celebrated, the theme discussed, the thought memorized, and appropriate words are spoken upon this and kindred scripture concerning the resurrection of our Lord. Our flowers here, these Easter lilies, symbolize that thought, and we, members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, believe every word of the scripture which I have read. We accept it literally. We believe that the same body which the Lord Jesus had in his mortal life was resurrected and became a glorified body of flesh and bone. We have evidence of this in addition to that contained in the New Testament; for as Latter-day Saints we believe that this same Jesus, who was crucified and who rose from the dead, did in these latter days appear and reveal himself to the Prophet Joseph Smith, and taught him how to lay the foundation of this great latter-day work.

So we have a double assurance, not only the assurance of the scriptures which Christians generally accept, but the further assurance that the same Jesus has come to earth in these latter times and has established the same Church, the same doctrines, the same principles of salvation, with the same power and authority which he instituted in the meridian of time, before his crucifixion and after.

PRINCIPLES AND DOCTRINES THE SAME AS CHRIST TAUGHT

He has given to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in these days the same authority and principles and has empowered it to perform the same work which he instructed his apostles and disciples to perform in former times, namely, to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. It is the same doctrine, without any change. The Savior commanded his disciples to go forth and depend not upon themselves, but upon the Lord, and he promised that he would feed and clothe them and take care of them. In other words, they were not to ask: "Is there a salary connected with it? How much are we going to get?" In the olden time, as you read in the scriptures, he said nothing of salary, but on the contrary, his instructions were that they should go without purse or scrip, and depend upon the Lord.

THE SAME DOCTRINE

The same doctrine is preached today by the Church of Jesus Christ; and as we heard from President Grant this morning, over 2,500 of our missionaries are out in the world today, doing that very work and doing it in the very same way. They maintain themselves, they depend upon their own efforts. The Church does not hire them. There is no hiring in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in that sense. It is true that when a man is asked to devote the whole of his time to Church work, he must be supplied with sufficient to live on. The people among whom the elders labor in the missions of the world usually take care of them where they can. If they cannot, and converts or friends cannot assist them, then these men are expected to furnish the means themselves and make that much of a sacrifice for preaching and teaching and delivering this wonderful message to the world.

THE WORK IS DONE WITHOUT PAY

Here at home our bishops are called to act as fathers to the people in their wards. Are they paid any salaries? No. It is true that they are allowed a little, the general average of which amounts to 50 cents a day, for taking care of the tithes and for being responsible for the money, but not for presiding over the ward, and not for administering in the authority of the priesthood. It is given for the special work he performs as bishop—that of taking in the tithes, looking after the hay, the butter, the eggs, or whatever is turned in on tithing. For this particular work a meagre allowance is made which amounts to about 50 cents a day per bishop; but no salary is paid to our bishops.

Then there are others, such as the men on this stand, and mission presidents also, who are called to devote their entire time to the Church. They have no time to look after temporal affairs of their own; they must work and go where they are sent. They are liable to be called to go to this mission or the other mission, even to the ends of the earth, any day, any hour, and they are expected to comply, and do comply. So they have no time to provide means for their families, or to speculate in this or the other. It is necessary, therefore, for the Church to provide for them. But even they do not receive "salaries," because a salary is what a man receives when he hires himself out. Over there in the office of the Short Line Railroad company, or in any of the big offices or stores, men are hired for certain amounts, and if they do well, the salary is increased. A man may go from one job to another, and do the best he can for his family and for himself, and that is all right; he is entitled to do it. That is working for hire, or for a salary. But could you get one of the mission presidents to leave the Church work and hire himself out for money? No. Could you hire any of these seventies, the presiding bishopric, the apostles, the presidency of the Church? Not one, not one. Of necessity, when a man has not the means to support himself, the Church must support him, so that he can continue his work.

Such men as I have mentioned, therefore, who are devoting their entire time to the Church, receive an allowance, though a very meagre one in comparison to what is usually allowed men of that kind in other walks of life. There are men on this stand, and throughout the Church, who, by devoting their entire time to their own affairs, could double or treble or quadruple the small allowance that is given them by the Church for their support.

So I can safely say that in this Church, as in the primitive church, there is no hireling service. The same spirit of sacrifice that the Lord then required obtains now in his Church. Our parents sacrificed for this work in coming to this land and redeeming it from the desert it was. Our missionaries go out now and sacrifice. It is essentially a work of sacrifice. They give the best years of their lives for the work of the Lord without any thought of compensation. There is a continual stream of missionaries coming and going. What for? To deliver this message to the world, namely: that the Lord God of heaven—this same Jesus Christ of whom I have read who was crucified and put to death, and who obtained through the keys of the resurrection power over death and the grave; for he said: "I am the resurrection and the life"—has established the same kind of a Church in this day, and has restored the same gospel as was preached in his day; and he expects us to deliver that most important message.

THE MOST IMPORTANT THING FOR THE WORLD TO KNOW

Now let me tell you, my brethren and sisters, the most important thing for the world to know today is that God lives, and that Jesus is indeed the Christ, the Son of the living God, and that he has restored his work to the earth through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith the Prophet. The same doctrine of faith is here today that was in the primitive church. The same doctrine of repentance is here. The same doctrine of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins is here. The same doctrine of the laying on of hands for the reception of the Holy Ghost is here. The same power of the Holy Priesthood is here. The power of God unto salvation is here today in this Church as strong, as powerful, and as potent as it was in the days of Jesus Christ, when he dwelt here in the flesh. The same principles are advanced—love, patience, integrity, sacrifice, everything that makes for righteousness and the well-being of mankind. Every principle, every ideal, every thought that makes for the betterment and the salvation of mankind is here in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints today, as it was nineteen hundred years ago in the primitive church. And the beauty of it all is that you know it! You are not deceived.

THE CHURCH BUILT UPON THE ROCK OF REVELATION

We would be foolish to try to deceive ourselves. We know by the same power that Peter knew; and what was that? "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" the Savior asked. And they said: "Some say thou art John the Baptist; some Elias; and others, Jeremias, or one of the prophets." The Savior said: "But whom say ye that I am?" Peter answered and said unto him: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the Living God." And the Savior answered, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: [as much as to say, it is a fine thing to have that testimony, that knowledge] for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven * * * * and upon this rock [this rock of revelation] I will build my Church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it."

We are built upon the same rock of revelation. We have the knowledge of God. The key to the knowledge of God is in this Church. The power of the Priesthood is here, the same power as formerly, to lead the people, and the people know it. It is written here in the Book of Doctrine and Covenants that it shall come to pass that God's people shall come to know who are the servants of the Lord, and who are not, and they shall judge all things, and so forth.

This individual testimony, this positive assurance which is given to every Latter-day Saint through revelation, by the power of the Holy Ghost, is the same testimony and spirit that our fathers and mothers received when they joined the Church in the old countries. And every man and woman in all the world may receive it if they only will. There is a challenge here in the last chapter of the Book of Mormon, which is to all people, that any man who, with real intent, not half believing, but believing fully, shall say in his heart: "Oh, God, show me thy way, thy truth, thy light, the right path, and I will follow it, no matter what its name is or how discredited it may be by the world," will receive in his heart a testimony, if he so ask of God.

FOR A TESTIMONY, GO TO THE LORD

So all we say to our friends, our neighbors, our brethren and sisters everywhere, is: Take it to the Lord. You need not take our word; go to the Lord in prayer, but in the true spirit of faith, for no other spirit will avail, and you have my word for it, and the word of ten thousand Latter-day Saints here assembled, that you will receive the same testimony, for the Lord does not fail.

My brethren and sisters, I rejoice in being permitted to labor in this great cause. I have been at it for more than sixty years, and more and more I see the splendor of it, the glory of it, the power of it, the strength, the salvation that is in it. I know it is true, it is of God. You cannot fail, my brethren and sisters, if you but put your trust in him. And if we have erred or done ought amiss, that blessed principle of repentance which he has implanted in his Church is here to save us if we will but correct our error, forsake evil, and cleave to that which is good.

Where can we find anything like it? Where else in all the world is there such an organization. There is within it that power, that impelling force that brings you and me and Latter-day Saints everywhere, in joy, in gladness, in pleasure, to serve the Lord. It brings us to respect the Priesthood—the apostles, the bishops of the wards, the presidencies of stakes, each in his order and in his place, because the Lord has called them, by that same power and spirit that I have spoken of, namely, by the power of revelation. How are we to acquire that? If you will read the eighth section of the Doctrine and Covenants, the Lord tells you this, if you will pray about it:

“Behold, I will tell you in your mind and in your heart, by the Holy Ghost, which shall come upon you and which shall dwell in your heart.

“Now, behold, this is the spirit of revelation; behold, this is the spirit by which Moses brought the children of Israel through the Red Sea on dry ground.”

This is the spirit that he gave to all his ancient prophets and apostles.

I testify that this is the same spirit and influence that he gave to President Young in his ministry, and to every succeeding president. It is the spirit that he gives to President Grant today in his ministry, and he receives it in the same way, by prayer, by faith, by righteous living, by being worthy to receive it. That counts for a lot, I want to tell you. “Worthy art thou, O Lord,” it was said of him, “to sit on high.”

THE SPIRIT OF SACRIFICE IS THE SPIRIT OF THIS WORK

The president of the Church today gives us, by counsel, by advice, by the inspiration of the spirit, that admonition which is for our salvation. After the president talked this forenoon and after President Ivins' splendid discourse, I was going over all these items in my mind and I thought: “What sane man—I don't care what his religion is, or if he has no religion—what sane man anywhere could object to the teachings of these brethren?” Now put that question to yourselves, my brethren and sisters and friends. Were they not good, were they not wholesome, were they not for the betterment of mankind for the best that is in men, for good government, for good order, for good citizenship? The gospel of Jesus Christ is intended to make me a better husband, a better father, a better citizen, if I will only obey its laws.

Let us, my brethren and sisters be willing to sacrifice for the Lord, for his work. There is a great work yet to perform in all the world. As we have heard from the president, missionaries are called for from every quarter. We have had volunteers, and many who have been called, who have gone and have done a splendid work. I recall now one of them, and I am going to mention his name: Brother A. A. Hinckley. He wrote to the presidency sometime ago and said: “I see that there has been a call for missionaries to go out for six months.” And he further said: “The Lord has blessed me very much, I ought to be very grateful, and I am very grateful;” and he went on to mention the blessings, for the spirit of gratitude was in his heart. “Now I am willing to go, I am willing to stay, I am willing to do whatever you want me to do." With tears in my eyes, I listened as the president read that letter, and I thought, "God bless such a man."

THE SPIRIT OF SACRIFICE

There is the spirit of this work, there is the spirit that makes this thing go, that holds me and holds you—the real spirit of sacrifice. Willing to go on missions? Yes, anxious to go, to let everybody know that God has spoken, that we have the knowledge of God, the testimony of it, the same Christ our Lord that was crucified, whose resurrection the people in all the world are celebrating today. He has put into our hearts the knowledge that the greatest thing that we have to do and that his Church will forever have to do, so far as I know, is to proclaim this gospel, to spread this truth, to bring people into the same way of thinking, the same spirit and power that is in the priesthood and in the Church, the same happiness, the same joy, the same blessing, the same salvation. That is the greatest work that is before you and me, and we ought to be anxiously engaged in such a work, and not wait until we are commanded in all things; for he that waits until he is commanded, and does nothing until he is commanded, the same is a slothful servant and unworthy.

MAY THE LORD GLORIFY HIS WORK

I pray, my brethren and sisters, that the Lord will magnify and glorify his work. We can't do it; but he will do it through us,—through you, through me, and men and women like you and me; for it is his work. It is by his power, as President Grant read to you, in that greeting this morning. It is the Lord we say who has done it. As stated in the Holy Bible (Psalm 100): "It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves," so it is he that hath made this work and brought it to pass, and put the power and the spirit in it, which no man can do; but with that spirit in us we can conquer the world for righteousness, for peace on earth, good will toward all men, which I humbly pray he will hasten, in his time, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

Following the sermon by President Nibley, the choir and congregation sang, "The Spirit of God like a fire is burning."

ELDER ORSON F. WHITNEY

APROPOS OF EASTER DAY: "WE STAND FOR AN INDIVIDUAL TESTIMONY OF THE DIVINITY OF JESUS CHRIST"

The adoption by the Mutual Improvement Associations of this their latest slogan was most opportune. For it comes at a time when the question of Christ's divinity is being widely agitated. Someone has wittily said that the automobile is fast resolving the human race into two great classes—the quick and the dead. Even so, though in quite another way, the controversy over the divinity or non-divinity of Jesus of Nazareth is dividing the Christian world into two opposing militant camps—the Fundamentalists and the Modernists, so-called.

FUNDAMENTALISTS VS MODERNISTS

The Fundamentalists, with whom I class myself and all Latter-day Saints, in a general way, are those who adhere to the old and established belief that Jesus Christ was the very Son of God, born of a virgin mother; that he was the author of the resurrection, the giver of eternal life, and withal a worker of miracles. We verily believe that he walked upon water, turned water into wine, healed the sick, cast out devils, gave sight to the blind, caused the lame to walk, and did many other mighty and marvelous works, all by virtue of the divine power within him.

The Modernists, who regard themselves as advanced thinkers, as the intellectually "quick," while their opponents are the spiritually "dead," look upon Jesus as a good and great man, the wisest and noblest teacher that the world has ever known. But they scout the idea of his being a miracle-worker, or the author and giver of eternal life. They do not positively deny that he could have worked a miracle, had he been so minded; they are simply not convinced that he could or did. This I believe is a fair statement of their position.

Many years ago, when I was a ward bishop in this city, a Primary Association conference was held one Sunday evening in the ward chapel. One of the sisters, gathering the little tots around her on the stand, told them the story of Jesus feeding the multitude in the miraculous manner set forth in the New Testament. Going home that night, one of the mothers, anxious to impress the lesson upon the mind of her little son, asked him certain questions concerning it. "What did Sister Blank tell us this evening?" The boy replied: "She told us how the Savior fed the people." How many people?" "Five thousand." "And what did he feed them with?" "Five loaves of bread and two fishes." "Well, now," said the mother, "how do you suppose he could do that?" The little fellow mused a moment, and then blurted out: "Well, I don't believe those in the middle got any."

He was a Modernist. He did not believe in miracles. He did not realize that it was by divine power that this marvelous deed was done. His child mind could not allow for the difference—the vast difference between the omnipotence of Almighty God and the puny strength of mortal man. And that's the trouble with many grown up children at the present time.

They who doubt the divinity of Jesus Christ can hardly be expected to believe in the wonderful works wrought by him. But they who accept him as the Son of God can accept his miracles also, the problem resolving itself into a simple question of cause and effect.

"NATURAL SUPERNATURALISM"

Men say that they do not believe in miracles because they are contrary to the laws of nature. "What are the laws of Nature?" asks Carlyle, and answers his own question thus:

"To me perhaps the rising of one from the dead were no violation of these laws, but a confirmation, if some far deeper law, now first penetrated into, and by spiritual force, even as the rest have all been, were brought to bear on us with its material force.

"'But is it not the deepest law of Nature that she be constant?' cries an illuminated class. 'Is not the machine of the universe fixt to move by unalterable rules?' Probable enough, good friends * * * And now of you, too, I make the old inquiry: What those same unalterable rules, forming the complete statute book of Nature, may possibly be?

"'They stand written in our works of science,' say you; 'in the accumulated record of man's experience.' Was man with his experience present at the creation, then, to see how it all went on? Have any deepest scientific individuals yet dived down to the foundations of the universe, and gauged everything there? Did the Maker take them into his counsel, that they read his ground-plan of the incomprehensible All, and can say, This stands marked therein, and no more than this? Alas, not in any wise!

"To the minnow, every cranny and pebble and quality and accident of its little native creek may have become familiar; but does the minnow understand the ocean tides and periodic currents, the trade winds and monsoons and moon's eclipses, by all of which the condition of its little creek is regulated, and may, from time to time (unmiraculously enough) be quite upset and reversed? Such a minnow is man; his creek this planet earth; his ocean the immeasurable All; his monsoons and periodic currents the mysterious force of Providence through aeons of aeons."—Sartor Resartus.

MIRACLES, THE FRUITS OF FAITH

I need but add to this masterly philosophic defense, that it were indeed a pitiful begging of the question for any one to say: Because I cannot do a certain thing, therefore it cannot be done; I cannot work a miracle, consequently no miracle was ever wrought. Miracles are the fruits of faith. Nobody claims that unbelief can perform them.

Time will not permit me to pursue this subject further, nor is it necessary that I should do so. Before sitting down, however, I would like to touch upon another topic, suggested by Carlyle's pointed question: "Was man present at the Creation?"

WHEN MORNING STARS SANG TOGETHER

A similar question was once put to a righteous man named Job, whom God answered "out of the whirlwind," saying: "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? declare if thou hast understanding * * * When the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy?" (Job 38:1-7.)

Job does not seem to have answered the question. Perhaps he did not have sufficient "understanding," and, unlike the "illuminated class" mentioned, would not assume to know what he did not know. But another righteous man named Abraham, who lived four centuries before the time of Job, had virtually answered that question; and his answer slept for two thousand years in the wrappings of a mummy in the catacombs of Egypt, awaiting the hour when Joseph Smith would give to the world his translation of the Book of Abraham. Therein the Father of the Faithful says:

ABRAHAM AND PRE-EXISTENCE

"Now the Lord had shown unto me, Abraham, the intelligences that were organized before the world was; and among all these there were many of the noble and great ones;

"And God saw these souls that they were good, and he stood in the midst of them, and he said: These I will make my rulers; for he stood among those that were spirits, and he saw that they were good; and he said unto me: Abraham, thou art one of them; thou wast chosen before thou wast born.

"And there stood one among them that was like unto God, and he said unto those who were with him: We will go down, for there is space there, and we will take of these materials, and we will make an earth whereon these may dwell;

"And we will prove them herewith, to see if they will do all things whatsoever the Lord their God shall command them;

"And they who keep their first estate shall be added upon; and they who keep not their first estate shall not have glory in the same kingdom with those who keep their first estate; and they who keep their second estate shall have glory added upon their heads forever and ever." (Abraham 3:22-26.)

How majestic! How sublime! And how wonderfully comprehensive! Surely the Book of Abraham bears testimony to its own divine origin. The sublimity of its doctrines and the spirit accompanying them are proof positive that they came right down from heaven.

BISHOP SPALDING AND THE SPEAKER

I bear in mind a conversation that I had with the late Bishop Franklin S. Spalding, of the Episcopal Church, whose untimely accidental death some years ago we all deeply deplored. He had attacked the Book of Abraham in a published commentary, and was answered by a number of our brethren through the press. Soon afterwards I met the Bishop, with whom I was quite well acquainted, and he said to me: "Why have you not answered me?" "I have," was my reply; "I have been answering you all over the country, but it hasn't gotten into the papers." "Oh, indeed, and what have you been saying?" he inquired. "I have been saying this:

" 'Truth is truth, where'er 'tis found,
On Christian or on heathen ground.'

"And whether it be taken from an ancient hill in North America, as was the Book of Mormon; or from the catacombs of Egypt, as was the Book of Abraham, if it's true, it's true, no matter who translated it, or how many supposed flaws appear in the translation. The character of the content and the spirit that goes along with it, determines better than all else its truth, its authenticity. We know Shakespeare's writings by the very sound of them—they have the Shakespearean ring. Literary experts can tell the difference between those writings and all others. We recognize Milton's poetry by the Miltonic ring; the poetry of Byron and Tennyson by the Byronic or Tennysonian ring. Then, if God speaks, why should it not have a Godlike ring, something that no man can counterfeit, nor any but a spiritual expert fully appreciate?"

Bishop Spalding agreed with me. Not as to the Book of Abraham, but as to the best way of testing any book. "I am one with you," he said, "in the belief that the highest evidence of the truth of any work is the spirit that it breathes and the wisdom that it inculcates." "Then," said I, "this Book of Abraham needs no defense from me, nor from anyone else. It speaks for itself; it defends itself. By the majesty of its language, by the sublimity of its teachings and by the Spirit that permeates them, it proclaims itself divine."

A GRAMMATICAL ERROR

Prior to that time I had a conversation with another would-be censor of our sacred books. He accosted me on the street with the question: "Bishop Whitney, do you believe the Book of Mormon to be the word of God?" "I certainly do," said I. "Well, can't God speak grammatically?" "Of course he can." "Then why was this grammatical error left in the Book of Mormon?"—and he quoted it. "Do you really want to know?" "Yes," he said. "Well, I think that was left there just to keep you out of the Church."

He seemed surprised: "Doesn't God want me in his Church?" "No," I said; "he only wants honest seekers after truth; and if you think more of a grammatical error than you do of your soul's salvation, you are not fit for the kingdom of heaven, and the Lord doesn't want you."

He was astonished. It was something he hadn't thought of. He felt very much as Goliath did when the stone sank into his forehead—such a thing had never entered his head before.

THE CREATION TWO-FOLD

Back now to the Book of Abraham: "And then the Lord said, Let us go down. And they went down at the beginning, and they, that is the Gods, organized and formed the heavens and the earth."

The creation was two-fold, firstly, spiritual; secondly, temporal. All divine creations have a spirit, even the trees and the flowers. In other words, they are souls, spirit and body combined. A learned man who was a chemist set himself to the task of making a grain of wheat, in imitation of one produced by the God of nature. Taking such a grain, he separated it into its component parts, finding that there was so much lime, so much silica, so much of this element and that, in its composition. Then, taking just such proportions of each element, he brought them together by his chemical skill and created a grain of wheat, so exactly similar to the natural grain, that the eye could not detect the difference. But there was a difference—a vast difference. He planted the two grains, and the one that God made sprang up, while the one that man made stayed down. God's wheat grain had a spirit; the other had none.

"There is a spirit in man, and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth it understanding." There is a spirit in all of our Father's creations. They were made "for a wise and glorious purpose," and will be perpetuated in the great hereafter. The poet Byron, in a cynical epitaph on the monument of his favorite dog, wrote: "Denied in heaven the soul he held on earth." But "Mormonism" teaches no such doctrine. Joseph Smith declared that not only the human race, but the lower orders of the animal creation were designed for eternal felicity. And John the Revelator teaches the same doctrine in the sublime symbolism of the Apocalypse.

PURPOSES OF EARTH LIFE

This earth was created, not out of nothing, as antiquated theology asserts; but out of eternal spirit and eternal element; and it is but one of millions like it that have been created, peopled and redeemed by the same All-wise God, who has placed his children here, primarily to give their spirits bodies, that they might become souls, capable of endless increase and advancement; also that it might be seen whether they would do all that the Lord requires at their hands.

We are here for education and development, through joy and sorrow, through smiles and tears, through pleasure and pain, bitter and sweet, light and darkness, enduring the vicissitudes and contrasts of mortal life, that we may become wise and gain a glorious experience. And if we now walk by faith, as we once walked by sight, and keep this second estate as we kept the first, or spirit estate (and were "added upon" for so doing), we shall reap the promised reward and "have glory added upon our heads forever and ever."

CARLYLE ANSWERED

Yes, Carlyle, man was present at the creation—but not with his mortal experience, nor yet with his mortal blindness. With clear, unclouded vision we looked on while the foundations of the earth were laid; and it was because we could see past the gloom to the glory that lay beyond, that "the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

ELDER DAVID O. McKAY

"Wherefore of these men * * * must one be ordained to be a witness with us of his resurrection."

THE GREATEST OF ALL MIRACLES

The greatest of all miracles is being celebrated by the Christian world today in the world-wide festival called Easter. Elder Whitney has referred to the reasonableness of the miracles of Jesus Christ. I say the greatest of all miracles is his resurrection from the dead; professed followers of the risen Lord are celebrating, in form at least, this great miracle. We have heard today that many people reject the reality of the resurrection of the Lord. They believe, or profess to believe, in his teachings, but do not believe in the immaculate conception, nor in his literal resurrection from the grave; yet, this latter fact was the very foundation of the early Christian church. The passage I have just read in your hearing is contained in the first chapter of Acts, and is accepted as being the testimony of Peter, the chief apostle on the occasion when the eleven had met to choose one to take the place of Judas Iscariot. It always interests me to study about the class of men that surrounded the apostles at that time, from whom the apostles chose this special witness. They were men who had been "witnesses" of the resurrection. Only such a one was considered eligible and worthy to be chosen one of the Twelve Apostles. I read further:

"This Jesus hath God raised up, whereof we all are witnesses.

"Therefore being by the right hand of God exalted, and having received of the Father the promise of the Holy Ghost, he hath shed forth this, which ye now see and hear."

Peter then continues:

"Ye men of Israel, hear these words; Jesus of Nazareth, a man approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as ye yourselves also know:

"Him, being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and by wicked hands have crucified and slain:

"Whom God hath raised up, having loosed the pains of death."

THE REALITY OF THE RESURRECTION OF JESUS CHRIST

There seems to have been no question about the reality of Christ's resurrection in Peter's mind when he spoke to the very men, some of whom at least, had been witnesses of Jesus' death. Prior to this, as I have said, Peter had declared to the eleven that "we must choose from among those who are such witnesses, one who will stand by us as eye witness of the Lord's resurrection." There is no doubt, so far as the first chapter and the second chapter of Acts are concerned that the resurrection of Jesus Christ was a reality. No Christian can read it without being convinced that these early apostles, were firmly convinced that the resurrection of the Lord was real. Jesus their Lord was as real to them after his resurrection as he had been prior to his crucifixion, a man among them, though divine.

Later another man testified to the same thing. He was Paul, known as Saul of Tarsus. In his early life Saul did not believe that Jesus Christ had risen from the dead. When he was sitting at the feet of Gamaliel, studying the philosophy of the times, he undoubtedly would have ridiculed the idea. To that extent, Paul was a modernist in every sense of the word. Just before his conversion he not only ridiculed the idea, but secured papers that authorized him to punish all who did believe in the resurrection of Christ, and yet Paul was a Pharisee, the members of which sect believed in the doctrine of the resurrection. However, there came a wonderful change in this persecutor's life. This same Jesus who had been crucified and who had risen from the dead, appeared to Paul when he was on his way to Damascus with papers in his pocket to arrest the saints who dwelt in that old city.

"Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?" said the voice. "Who art thou, Lord?" "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest. It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." "What wouldst thou have me do?" "Arise and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do." Later Paul wrote that testimony, and we have it today as the oldest authentic written record testifying to the literal resurrection of the Lord. That oldest written testimony is not the one I have just read in Acts, it is not found in Matthew, the first book in the New Testament, it is not in Mark nor Luke nor John, but the first epistle to the Corinthians. If you will turn there to that epistle you will find a wonderful array of testimony to the reality of the resurrection of Jesus Christ. In the Fifteenth Chapter I read the following:

"For I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures;

"And that he was buried, and that he rose again the third day according to the scriptures:

"And that he was seen of Cephas, then of the twelve;

"After that, he was seen of above five thousand brethren at once; of whom the greater part remain unto this present, but some are fallen asleep.

"After that, he was seen of James; then of all the apostles.

"And last of all he was seen of me also, as of one born out of due time.

"For I am the least of the apostles, that am not meet to be called an apostle, because I persecuted the church of God."

WITNESSES TO THE RESURRECTION

Some may say: "If we knew that these testimonies were the direct testimonies of these men, then we should give full credence to them." "But," say the critics, "we do not know that Peter's testimony as recorded in Acts is as he gave it, because he did not write the Acts of the Apostles." True, but we do know that Paul and Luke and Mark and other writers of the New Testament did communicate with Peter as the chief of the apostles. We do know from this authentic record from which I have read that Paul communed with some of these five hundred men, at least our inference that he did is justifiable. He watched them so closely that when one of those eye-witnesses died he evidently took note of it as much as to say: "There is another of the eye witnesses to the resurrected Lord gone to the other side." What else can you read in that phrase, "but some have fallen asleep?" Mark, Luke and Paul conversed with Peter. We have that testimony from Paul's own writings; and what would be the nature of their conversation? "Peter," Paul would say, "did you really see the resurrected Lord?" Peter's answer was affirmative, because here Paul says: "He was seen of Cephas" or Peter. Paul in another place says: "I conversed with James," who was then presiding over the branch in Jerusalem. There can be no doubt that Paul would say: "James, did you see the risen Lord?" James' answer is found in the fifteenth chapter of Corinthians.

What can we do if we cannot accept such irrefutable evidence? To me their testimonies mean but one thing, and that is that Jesus Christ who was born of the Virgin Mary, who preached the gospel after his own name, who sought the lost ones, whose life as we know it, even from the fragmentary accounts thereof, is an inspiration and has been an inspiration to millions, for two thousand years, who was crucified in ignominy and who was buried; that this same Jesus Christ arose from the grave literally, and that the early Christian church was founded upon that divine fact.

THE GREAT AND COMFORTING MESSAGE

Marvelous miracle it is! but oh, what a message to your soul and to mine! If he, Lord and Savior, conquered death after having taken upon himself mortality, then we have the divine assurance that our spirits shall transcend that thing which we call death. We have the assurance that our loved ones who have gone before, now live, for death cannot touch the offspring of God, the spirit which is divine. That is the message.

As was stated here on another occasion, we have witnesses nearer to our day than Peter, Mark and Paul and the others. This vast congregation is assembled on this Easter day because of witnesses in this dispensation, of the reality of Christ's resurrection, and the integrity of these men is unquestioned, too, by all honest persons who have studied the characters of these witnesses. Those who misunderstand it are those who in ignorance or through wilfulness desire so to do.

A LATTER-DAY WITNESS

The latter-day witness is this: that Jesus Christ, the resurrected Lord, appeared by the side of his eternal Father who introduced him in this dispensation as follows:

"This is my beloved Son, hear him;" As the Christian church in the meridian of time was founded upon the reality of the living Christ,—not merely upon the teachings of the Great Teacher—so the Church of Jesus Christ in this age was founded upon the reality of Christ's existence and upon the reality of his appearance in this dispensation to the earnest seeking boy, Joseph Smith.

OTHER CORROBORATIVE WITNESSES

Other witnesses corroborate the testimony of the reality of Christ's appearing, and also to the reality of the appearing of resurrected beings, which confirms the reality of the resurrection from the dead. Christ's personality, as his divinity, persisted after death. This being true, then God is beyond all doubt a resurrected personal being.

"It is the eye of faith that sees the broad horizons, the color and the gleam. Religion standing on the known experience of the race, makes one bold and glorious affirmation. She asserts that this power that makes for truth, for beauty and for goodness is not less personal than we." [And that is the declaration of the Church of Jesus Christ, that he is not less personal than we, and that his Father, the eternal Father, is a personal God.] "This leap of faith is justified because God cannot be less than the greatest of his works, the cause must be adequate to the effect. When, therefore, we call God personal, we have interpreted him by the loftiest symbol we have. He may be infinitely more. He cannot be less. When we call God a spirit, we use the clearest lens we have to look at the infinite. As Herbert Spencer has well said: 'The choice is not between a personal God and something lower, but between God and something higher.'"

So wrote Charles Dinsmore of Yale.

WHERE THE L. D. S. CHURCH STANDS ON THE QUESTION

So, the Latter-day Saints declare to the world that God is a personal God, not just a power, and force, he is that and more. He is all that because of his divine and eternal personality, and the Church stands on the reality of the resurrection of our Lord and Savior, Jesus Christ.

AN APPEAL TO THE YOUTH OF THE CHURCH

Fellowworkers, young men of Israel, standing on that platform, having in our hearts the testimony that Christ lives, and that this is his Church, I ask you how can we turn an indifferent ear to the appeal made this morning by the President of our Church to defend, to honor the laws of our land, to labor by example and by precept to establish in all our communities, a determination to keep the communities pure from the contaminating influences of alcoholic beverages and tobacco. I should like to see the application of this testimony, the reality of Christ's resurrection and belief on his gospel, made manifest in a high moral and spiritual condition that would radiate righteousness from the individual lives and the communities of those who make that profession. Latter-day Saints, a message was given this morning in an appeal to sustain the Eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and I hope we shall never hear of officers in the stakes or in wards, nor of young men, nor young women who are led astray by the propaganda that is now being spread over this country with the avowed intention to bring about a modification of the prohibition law. If you have the testimony of Jesus Christ, if you know that the principles he has revealed are true, then you will obey the Word of Wisdom, and also stand by the prohibition laws of this country. Knowing as I do that the gospel of Jesus Christ is true, I pray God to help me and mine and my friends to be true to those principles, which we all know Christ will be pleased to have us incorporate in our lives. Amtn.

ELDER JOSEPH FIELDING SMITH

I will read a verse or two from the fifth chapter of the Gospel according to St. John:

"For the Father loveth the Son, and sheweth him all things that himself doeth; and he will shew him greater works than these, that ye may marvel.

"For as the Father raiseth up the dead, and quickeneth them; even so the Son quickeneth whom he will.

"For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son:

"That all men should honor the Son, even as they honor the Father.

"He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent him.

"Verily, verily, I say unto you, He that heareth my word, and believeth on him that sent me, hath everlasting life, and shall not come into condemnation; but is passed from death unto life."

CHRIST THE FIRST FRUITS OF THE RESURRECTION

During this conference we have had presented the evidence from the scriptures that Jesus Christ arose from the dead and was the first fruits of the resurrection. The witnesses of this wonderful occurrence cannot be impeached. In this day the tendency of the religious world is away from this fundamental truth, and ministers and teachers are denying that Jesus is the Christ, the Only Begotten Son of God. I have read this passage to show that the Savior taught that no man can testify of God and reject his Son; and that no man can deny that Jesus Christ is the Redeemer of the world and believe in the Father who sent him. We must honor the Father through the Son, and he who rejects the Son and denies the power of the resurrection knows not God. Again the Savior said:

"He that believeth on the Son hath everlasting life, and he that believeth not the Son shall not see life, but the wrath of God abideth on him."

This does not mean that those who reject the Son shall not come forth in the resurrection, for all shall be raised from the dead, but the unbeliever shall not partake of eternal life in the kingdom of God where dwell the Father and the Son. It is, however, the purpose of the Father to extend the power of the resurrection to all men, through the atonement of the Son, and thus give immortality to all his children. The fact remains, however, that we cannot be in fellowship with God and not accept the Sonship of Jesus Christ and believe in his power to redeem us from the grave. Therefore all who reject the authority of the Son have the wrath of God abiding on them.

WHY THE RESURRECTION?

At this point the question arises in my mind: Why the resurrection? That it is a fact we know, that is, we who are Latter-day Saints, for the Lord has revealed it unto us, and the scriptures on this truth are clear. We know that Christ appeared to his disciples after his resurrection and they have testified of his appearance unto them. Now, why should there be a resurrection and the promise made that all men shall come forth from their graves? A great many people believe that the mortal body has served its purpose in this life and will not come forth from the dead, but that the spirit rises to dwell with God. Then why did Jesus Christ come into the world to die? Was it because the plan that the Father had arranged in the beginning had been frustrated, or destroyed, through the fall of man? Adam had a body before death came upon him and his fall was a part of the great plan of man's salvation. Mortality, and consequently death is due to the fall, and Jesus Christ came into the world to make reparation and to give man, through the resurrection, immortality and eternal life. In the Book of Mormon we are informed that man partakes of mortality that he may obtain experiences that could not come to him in any other way, and that through his obedience to the gospel of Jesus Christ, which is based on the infinite sacrifice of the Son of God, he may obtain salvation and exaltation in the presence of the Father and the Son.

Surely the Lord understood the end from the beginning, and it was perfectly understood in the councils in the heavens before the world was made, that Jesus Christ was to come into this world to die and thus repair a broken law and again restore life to mankind that they might have it more abundantly. Peter testifies of this in the following words:

"Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers;

"But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot:

"Who verily was foreordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you."

So Peter has testified that Christ was called and foreordained to come into the world to bring to pass the resurrection and the redemption of man through the shedding of his blood; and this is according to a plan devised before the foundation of the world was laid. Moreover, the Lord, speaking to John on the Isle of Patmos, says:

"Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory and blessing."

Then again in the same vision it is written:

"And it was given unto him (the beast) to make war with the saints, and to overcome them: and power was given him over all kindreds, and tongues, and nations.

"And all that dwell upon the earth shall worship him, whose names are not written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

By these scriptures we are informed that Christ was chosen before man was on earth to make atonement for death and sin in this world and thus give to man immortal life through the resurrection. This doctrine was fully understood by the prophets of old. The Redeemer, himself, while walking along the road with his two disciples after his resurrection instructed them in these things, as follows:

"And he said unto them, O fools and slow of heart to believe all that the prophets have spoken:

"Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and to enter into his glory?

"And beginning with Moses and the Prophets, he expounded to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself."

EXISTENCE IN MORTALITY MOST IMPORTANT

After this conversation he met with the eleven apostles and again repeated these prophecies and later sent his disciples forth as witnesses to testify of him in all the world.

When men deny the resurrection of Christ and the coming forth from their graves of all mankind, it is a confession on their part that they are ignorant of the work of the Lord regarding the destiny of man. Our existence in mortality is most important. It is not accidental. It was never intended that we should pass through this life without coming in contact with sin, without temptation, without mortality. Adam was sent into the world to perform a mission including the bringing to pass these very things that we in the mortal state might obtain experiences by coming in contact with all the vicissitudes of mortal life. In this way we receive an education that could not be obtained in any other way. So mortality came through the will of God, and through the fall of man death has passed upon all men. Through the atonement of Jesus Christ life is restored again and death is overcome and destroyed. Immortality and eternal life constitute the great work of the Father and the last enemy to be destroyed, we are informed, is death. When Christ has destroyed death by bringing to pass the resurrection of all mankind from the grave, he will have finished his work and then he will deliver up the kingdom to his Father.

MAN'S RESURRECTION ASSURED

These bodies which we have received are not to be laid away in the grave never to be taken up again. Those who believe such a doctrine have no understanding of the work of salvation. These bodies were given us that the spirit might dwell in them, and after passing through this mortal life, and death, they will be brought forth in the resurrection, spirit and body inseparably united—"Never to be divided"—and in this condition the righteous shall receive a fulness of joy. Those who have not been righteous and have failed to heed the counsels of God shall then receive such rewards as they are entitled to receive according to their works, but even they shall die no more the temporal death.

The great work of the Lord is to bless all men and to do by them the very best that he can; but our Father in heaven is governed by law, as his children are subject to law, and he, therefore, will measure out to each man that which he is entitled to receive according to his works.

Without these bodies a spirit could not be made perfect, for it is incomplete. The body without the spirit is dead. It takes both the spirit and the body to constitute a perfect soul. We came here to this earth to obtain the greatest boon that could be given, physical bodies to clothe our spirits. The punishment of Satan and his angels is that they were denied the privilege of mortal existence in bodies of flesh and bones because of their rebellion. The spirit of man, clothed in a tabernacle of flesh and bones, as Jesus Christ was after his resurrection, will have power through obedience to the laws of the gospel to advance in righteousness, truth, wisdom and power, to the fulness, and thus become a son of God.

So, we see, our lives here in the flesh, where we endure all the ills and the joys of mortality is not accidental, but a part of the great plan of eternal progression according to the decrees of our Father in heaven before this world came into being. Here we are proving ourselves through our free agency for a place in eternity. If we are faithful and live in keeping with the laws that govern in the kingdom of God, accepting the mission of our Lord, Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of all mankind from the grave, and, on condition of our repentance, our Redeemer from our individual sins, we shall be counted worthy of a place in the Celestial Kingdom of God.

May we as Latter-day Saints be faithful in the discharge of all obligations, commandments and principles that pertain to our salvation, that we may obtain these great blessings which are promised by the Father, through his Only Begotten Son, and which cannot be received only through obedience, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

We have received somewhat more than seventy telephone calls since the meeting started, announcing that people are listening in at various places. I received one from a nephew-in-law of mine, Edward W. Spencer, of Evanston, in which he said: "I got every word of your opening address over the radio."

I remember being ridiculed because I believed in the Book of Mormon, because an alleged absolute impossibility was recorded in that book, namely that the Savior's words were heard all over the land. I remember saying to the professor (I was a young, unmarried man at the time), that I believed in a God who could arrange, if he saw fit to do so, that the words of Jesus Christ could be heard all over the world. I remember reading recently of a man who heard a song nine thousand miles over the radio. He was in a house with the doors closed, and the song was sung in a house or station with the doors closed, nine thousand miles away. Thank the Lord for faith as a boy, in the truths that are being demonstrated, which were miracles beyond all belief in early days! Thank the Lord for the testimony of Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon:

"And now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him: That he lives!

"For we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father—

"That by him, and through him, and of him, the worlds are and were created, and the inhabitants thereof are begotten sons and daughters unto God."

Following the announcement of the general Priesthood meeting to be held in the Tabernacle on Monday evening at 7 o'clock; the Sunday School Union conference meeting to be held at 7 o'clock on Sunday evening; and the special Priesthood meeting to be held Wednesday morning, April 7, the choir sang the "Hallelujah Chorus."

The conference adjourned until Monday morning, at 10 o'clock, April 5.

FIRST OVERFLOW MEETING

An overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 10 o'clock a. m., Sunday, April 4, 1926.

Elder J. Golden Kimball, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

The combined choirs of Murray First ward and Mill Creek ward, of the Cottonwood stake, W. F. Robinson directing, Tracy Y. Cannon at the organ, provided the music.

The choir sang the anthem, "Come, dearest Lord, descend and dwell."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Nicholas G. Smith, bishop of the Seventeenth ward, Salt Lake City.

The choir sang, "In our Redeemer's name."

ELDER J. GOLDEN KIMBALL

Of the First Council of Seventy

As I approached the door of the Tabernacle this morning, though I had ample time if I could have gotten in, I was caught in a jam and I could not get one way or the other; and finally I heard my name announced by President Grant. I was to take charge of the meeting in the Assembly Hall. I did not take time to find out who was appointed with me; my difficulty was to get out. You know, sometimes you cannot get in and other times you cannot get out; that was my case his morning. So I rushed over here, but was somewhat disturbed, as it is a little unusual for me to preside over any of our general conference assemblies. Brethren and sisters, I do not know much, but what I do know, I know well; I am a well-trained soldier; I have been laboring in the Church under the direction of the general authorities for over 35 years; I have seen a whole council of the Twelve fill their missions and pass over, and still live, and I know from my missionary experience in the world and at home, that we are the servants of the living God; that we hold divine authority; that every member in this Church, from the least unto the greatest, is entitled to revelation and inspiration and the spirit of prophecy for his own guidance. If it is otherwise, the only answer we have is that since the Holy Ghost was conferred upon you by the laying on of hands, you have not had faith and kept the commandments of God. That is the inspiration that gives life to this Church, and as long as the members of this Church, together with the general authorities, are under the inspiration of Almighty God, there is no use of being non-plussed or overcome, for God will put it into our mouths what to do, what to say, and will guide and lead us into all truth. I thought I would like to say that to you good people. Several of the brethren named by President Heber J. Grant to speak at this meeting have failed to receive word of their appointment. Up until now only three of us have arrived. But we are here, and we are dependent upon the Lord to guide and direct us. I would like to ask you good people if you are in the habit, in our assemblies and places of worship, of offering a few words of prayer in your heart for those who are to speak to us? Very few know just who is going to be appointed; and I am a believer that our people are very careless about those things and place the whole responsibility upon the speaker. My experience has been that there is a great responsibility resting upon the Saints, and that we need to call in the wanderings of our minds and centralize them upon God the Father and upon his Son Jesus Christ, in behalf of God's servants—not only to pray for them, but to ask God to give them inspiration, so that they will open their mouths and use the talent which the Lord God has given every one of us. I am getting somewhat timid myself, because once in a while I make a mistake. But if God ever created a man, aside from the Savior, who has not made any mistakes, I would like to have him pointed out. We make mistakes, hence, when we speak in the name of the Lord and when we prophesy, we need the Spirit of God.

I saw an old gentleman yesterday whom I met way down in Arizona, years and years ago, when our people were in poverty and were about to disorganize the stake, because everything had gone to pieces for the time being; and he said, "Brother Kimball, I want to call your attention to something that happened years ago. You were in the little one-horse town, as I called it then, with the presidency of the stake, and you were there alone representing the brethren of the Church." The presidency of the stake presented the name of a man to be bishop of that ward. I said to them, "That bishop will not remain long." "Well," they said, "Brother Kimball, whom would you choose?" "Well, if I were choosing, I would choose that fellow over there sitting on the end of the seat; he will make you a good bishop." But they put the first man in, and he did not hold out two years, and afterwards they put in the other man, whom I suggested, and he is one of the best bishops they have had. I merely speak of this to impress you that God can inspire his servants, and they can prophesy and it will come true.

Now, brethren, pray in your hearts; you need not make any to-do about it, but ask the Lord to inspire his servants to say things that will answer the questions and doubts that are creeping into the hearts of God's people; for doubt and uncertainty is creeping into the hearts of a number of our people. I want to say to you, in the name of Israel's God, that if we do not live the right life and keep that light burning in our hearts as a living fire, so that you may know always that Jesus is the Christ, we may lose that knowledge on the morrow or during the year—if we are careless and indifferent. My father said before he died, and kept saying, "O the test, the test, the test; who will be able to stand?" He came to his home on the Kimball block at the south door, where my mother lived, and where I was born, and said, "O the test, the test, the test; who will be able to stand?" It was but a very short time after repeating this statement that he was stricken with paralysis and never spoke a word afterward. My mother said, "Brother Kimball what is the test?" and he said, "I don't know, but only those who know that Jesus is the Christ will be able stand."

Now, brethren, you can judge yourselves. Do not bother about me. Be concerned about yourselves, and I will get along the best way I can. If I do not make it, there is no reason why you should not; and if I can make it, anybody can make it. That is my personal idea. I do not know whether that is an encouragement to you or not.

ELDER JAMES H. ROBINSON

President of the South Davis Stake

I feel very humble, my brethren and sisters, and very much dependent upon our heavenly Father. This is the first time in my life that I have been called upon to address the people of God in one of our general conferences, and I can assure you that, while I feel very grateful for this opportunity, I feel very humble and very dependent upon our heavenly Father. I realize most fully that we are engaged in the work of our Father, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, and the Father of our spirits; and I know, too, that to speak to his people, who have listened to the servants of the Lord and obeyed the promptings of the spirit, who have embraced the faith and are endeavoring to carry out the work of our Father upon the earth—to feed you people—a man must be inspired of our Father. This is his work, and we know and understand the things of God only through the Spirit of our Father. It is not the elegant words spoken by masters of the English language, or the learning of men that can send that prompting and that inspiration and conviction to the hearts of God's people. It can only be sent there through the inspiration of our Father. And while I know, too, that we as individuals are not permitted to have inspiration or revelation for the Church, I know by experience that we are entitled to that revelation and that inspiration for our own guidance, and to help us in the discharge of all the duties and responsibilities that rest upon us. And if we are not in communion with that spirit, it is because our receiving instrument is out of tune; for our Father in heaven will never neglect his people, will never fail to do his part; and if I am not receiving the inspiration of the Father, it is because of some act in my life or some neglect, or something, that has gotten the instrument God has given to me in his Spirit out of tune with the sending instrument of our Father. Our Father has told us, through the Prophet Brigham Young, that every spirit is born pure into the earth, and it becomes contaminated only as the spirit is subject to the tabernacle of flesh in which it is encased; for our tabernacles are earthy, and made up of the earth and are subject to death. And just as our spirits are overcome by the weaknesses of that body, are we out of harmony with our Father.

I know that this work is true; I know that the Prophet Joseph Smith was indeed a prophet of God; and I know that the Savior is the Son of God; and that this work has been established in the earth in these last days never again to be thrown down or given to another people. And I realize, too, that simply to be a member of this Church does not mean exaltation; for just as surely as the Lord has given us our free agency, just so surely must we exercise that agency in the right direction. Joining this Church and doing nothing in it will not bring us salvation or exaltation; for the Lord has given us the plan, and he has given us the knowledge that he lives and that this is his work, and then he has left us to work out our own salvation. And we have a mighty responsibility resting upon us as Latter-day Saints; for we not only have to live the gospel at home, but it is our mission to take it to every nation of the earth. And when we consider the few Latter-day Saints that there are, compared with the numerous hosts of the whole world, we can understand to a small degree the responsibility that this is. When the beloved John was cast upon the isle of Patmos and he was permitted to look down through the stream of time; when he saw that angel flying through the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach to all the inhabitants of the earth, he saw our day, and we are living in fulfillment of that revelation that was given to John the divine, for that angel has flown from the midst of heaven, and has delivered this message to the inhabitants of this earth through the Prophet Joseph Smith. We are carrying out that vision and that prediction that was made by our beloved prophet when he saw these things.

I pray, my brethren and sisters, that we may be able to live up to all of the duties, obligations and responsibilities that rest upon us. We sometimes speak of its being our duty to do the things in this Church that we are called upon to do, but I take it that it is more of a privilege. We ought to assume it as one of the highest privileges in our lives that we are permitted to hold the Priesthood of the Son of God, that we are permitted to act in the name of our Father in heaven and to be his ambassadors upon the earth to carry out his work. This is a privilege of which we ought to be proud and glad to receive and glad to carry out in our lives. I pray that we may be loyal and devoted to this cause, spending our energies and efforts and all that we have and are in helping to establish God's work in the earth, I pray, in Jesus' name. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH R. MURDOCK

President of the Wasatch Stake

My brethren and sisters: I certainly desire an interest in your faith and prayers, that the Spirit of the Lord may be with me during the few minutes that I may stand before you. Of myself, I have always felt a great timidity in speaking on the things pertaining to the kingdom of heaven in the presence of my brethren and sisters, feeling my natural weakness. It is not because I dislike to meet with them and listen to the remarks of my brethren and sisters, but rather it is a timid feeling about attempting to address them. It is easier for me to listen to good things than it is to say them. But I have a testimony of the truth just the same. I had a little witness of that this morning. In our meeting of Religion Class officers, in one of the buildings near the Bishops' Building, I was very much pleased with the remarks of a young lady, who told us of her experience in training the boys, impressing upon us the necessity of doing individual work with the boys and girls and not with the people as a whole so much. I have felt that the same thing may apply to our older brethren, to our men and women, who necessarily, it seems, have to be encouraged individually; and the great truths and principles of the gospel which we have embraced give us an opportunity from time to time to explain, expound, encourage, and build up one another in the great work in which we are engaged.

She gave some very nice illustrations of her work, which time will not permit me to repeat further than to impress upon you, or those of you who were not present at that meeting in the Barrett Hall, that there is such a work going on in this Church as Religion Class work. I do not know how many of you have ever attended the Religion Class in the respective communities from which you have come, or how many of you encourage your boys and girls to attend, that they may get the spirit of this work early in life. I want to encourage you, if there are any who do not, that you take this up. It may seem to some to be the least important work, but I want to tell you that it is not least in the Wasatch stake of Zion. More than 90% of our boys and girls who attend the district schools are attending Religion Class; and in our seminary work, nearly that percentage of those in the high school attend our seminary and are instructed. And of that group, practically all of our missionaries from the Wasatch stake, numbering between twenty and thirty of the long-time missionaries, nearly 90%, are young men and young women who were in the seminary and were taught in the Religion Class. In the Religion Class the foundation was laid; they received their faith in the principles of the gospel, and such information as they should receive at the age when they attend. I do not know of any other work that has been of greater result and benefit in the Wasatch stake than the Religion Class work and the seminaries. I want to endorse most heartily the Religion Classes and to encourage the brethren and sisters in the respective communities to uphold the teachers, to recognize their work. It would not be amiss to say a kindly word to those who are teaching your Religion Class in your respective wards and ask them how your boys and girls are getting along, whether they are truant or whether they are remaining for Religion Class.

It was told to us today that some parents thought their children were attending Religion Class, and when they received the report, they found they were not there half the time. Whose boys and girls are they, and what are they worth to us? Without our boys and girls, it would seem to me that we have accomplished practically nothing in the world. If we have permitted them to slip away from us and lose faith in the gospel and in Jesus Christ, in this great latter-day work, I would like to know what we have accomplished! We have made a living; may have accumulated wealth, which we do not take with us; but those of our loved ones are of the treasures of this earth which, if they are saved in the kingdom of heaven, thieves will not steal from us, moth and rust will not corrupt. They are the most important of all the treasures and of all the work that we may accomplish in this life. So I want to endorse with my full heart and support the work of Religion Class and seminary. It is no fifth wheel. It came in the due time of the Lord, when we needed that kind of instruction, and it should be carried out, and no doubt is in other stakes, if I got the spirit of that meeting this morning.

Another speaker, Brother Bennion, said he was reminded of a question that one of our noted authors, Elbert Hubbard, had proposed and answered. He asked, "Is a lady as good as a man?" and he answered, "She is, if she is." Our ladies are just as good as our men, if they do just as well in accomplishing the work to which they are assigned; and they have a most splendid opportunity in Religion Class work, because we have so many sisters who are school teachers. I am pleased to report that the school teachers in the Wasatch stake are not adverse to teaching Religion Class.

Attending the meetings on this occasion reminds me very much of a meeting I attended about fifty or sixty years ago as a boy upon this block. In a recent issue of the Improvement Era I read an article in which reference was made to the conversion, if you please, or the second conversion or bringing to these valleys, of Martin Harris, a witness to the Book of Mormon; how one of our elders found him in the world and brought encouraging words to him of the gospel and asked him why he left the Church. He said he did not leave the Church, but the Church left him, and I guess that was true. He remained in that country for a great many years, and finally through the encouraging words that were carried to him, he came to Zion. The thought occurs to me: How many are there of our brethren and sisters who are slack in their duties, probably negligent, doing nothing in the Church, as he had been doing for so many years, only bearing his testimony as one of the witnesses to the Book of Mormon? Are there any other men of his age who need an encouraging word? Are there any of us who are willing to give it? Are we interested in their salvation? Next to our own immediate families, I do not know of anybody we are going to encounter in the next world who will bring to us the joy and satisfaction that our friends will bring, and especially those who have given us encouraging words in this life and who have helped us to set aside the cares of this world and turn our attention unto the things of heaven. I was particularly impressed with his testimony which I read in the Era, because it was my great pleasure, as a boy about ten years of age, to sit and listen to the testimony of Martin Harris, that an angel of the Lord showed him the records from which the Book of Mormon was translated and declared to him that they were true and were translated by the gift and power of God. It was a great encouragement to me at the time I heard it. It has been a great encouragement to me from the time I heard it up to the present time that this man, Martin Harris, was alive and testified in my presence on these grounds. I cannot remember which building it was in. But he testified that the angel of the Lord appeared to him.

Did the angel of the Lord appear to him? Undoubtedly he did. It was his testimony, and the testimony of those of his associates, that the angel of the Lord appeared to them, which carries to me the most convincing evidence that Joseph Smith actually saw the Father and the Son. If Martin Harris saw an angel of the Lord, and the angel testified to him that this book was translated by the power of God, then it is not unreasonable to suppose that Joseph Smith actually saw the Father and the Son. And how important that is in this day of skepticism, when even the Christian world is denying that God is a personal being and that Jesus Christ is his Son, that faith might not depart entirely from the earth, but that there might be those who still believe in the divinity of the mission of Jesus Christ and that he was divine; that God truly created us in his image; that we are his offspring, and that Jesus Christ is our elder brother; and that as he is, we may become.

To my mind it was a great encouragement to me as a boy, and I thank the Lord that I believed it, and that the Lord has given me a believing heart in the testimony of the brethren. I have never heard a brother speak from this stand, or any other in this Church, but my heart seemed to respond to the statements that he made and I believed them; and it has not hurt me. It has strengthened my faith in God and made life tolerable and desirable even in times of trouble. It has strengthened my faith that this life is not all of the mission which our Father in heaven has set for us. If God lives and Jesus Christ is the Son of God, he was truly resurrected, though the Christian world today do not generally accept it.

I have listened to a most beautiful sermon—so far as words are concerned—in one of our picture shows here in Salt Lake. It was said that an able speaker was going to talk, and I attended to hear what he said. He told us nothing about the Father, because he did not know anything about him, his personality, nor even the image in which he is. He could not believe the Bible, that God created man in his own image. He told us nothing about Jesus Christ nor his resurrection, because he did not believe it himself, and he did not understand and did not know. But he made a most sympathetic appeal and a speech which brought tears to the eyes of many of those who were in the congregation, speaking of the great labors and work that had been accomplished in the great world war and of our great nation and its achievements. But he did not have the testimony that there ever was a resurrection, that Jesus Christ was resurrected from the dead. The world, even the Christian world—not as a whole, possibly, but individually—has denied that great accomplishment or work of our Father in heaven upon which, to my notion, all our hopes and faith are centered. If there be no resurrection, what will there be for us when we pass from this earth? Some may claim that we will still have an existence in the spirit world. "We will go back where we were before we came here," may be their argument, "as spirits, and be able to dwell on the top of a topless throne, or in the clouds of heaven; we will be retrogressive, going backwards instead of forward." But the Almighty intended that the spirit should be united with the body and assume the responsibilities of this life, which are many. We have all seen that we can take care of and accomplish the things in this life, learning of those things which we cannot learn so well in the eternal world, because the knowledge which we acquire in this world goes with us; and the memory of our first estate is taken from us, that we may be absolutely free to act, relying upon our own agency and doing what is in our hearts and what we desire to do. And if our hearts are inclined unto righteousness and we love the works of God more than we love evil, we will become righteous; and if we overcome evil with good and serve God and keep his commandments, it will be largely through our own efforts and desire and love of the truth. So without the resurrection, it would be retrogression, going back into the spirit world whence we came—which may possibly be the lot of some—but I trust it will not be the lot of the Latter-day Saints. I trust that we will go on, having received our bodies again, and become as the Savior was after his resurrection, when he said, "Handle me, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as you see me have." He was handled, he was seen, after his resurrection, by many of his disciples, his apostles, and nearly five hundred on another occasion, in this life; and then again upon this continent, with a body such as we expect to receive in the eternal world, and not as a spirit without a body.

May the Lord enable us to understand and appreciate the great blessings that we enjoy, and be able to grasp the encouraging things which he gives; the testimony of the prophets, of Joseph and Hyrum, and of those who have succeeded them in the presidency of the Church, in the visitation of those brethren and the testimony of the witnesses. And may faith grow in our hearts and a testimony of God and of his purposes; for it is impossible, says the prophet, for us to be saved in ignorance; we must grow and obtain understanding of the mind and of the purposes of the Lord and develop the mind which God has given us, which is the most wonderful part of the human soul. It is after the order of God, the eternal Father, and as no man can comprehend all that man can do or may do in their day, it appears to me that there are none of us who comprehend what we can do, how faithful we can be, how many testimonies of the gospel we may have and what may be our lot, even in this life, if we strive for it; or what shall be the blessings which God has in store for his faithful sons and daughters in the eternal world. May God enable us to strive and to continue to do his will and keep his commandments all the days of our lives, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, the risen Redeemer and our Savior. Amen.

ELDER NEWELL K. YOUNG

Of the L. D. S. University Faculty

I feel very keenly my unworthiness and lack of preparation. Pray with me that I may be blessed to respond to the call of the servants of the Lord to say something about the resurrection of the Christ.

First, I would tell you of the witnesses of that resurrection, the people to whom the Master appeared on that Sunday morning nearly 1900 years ago—for this is Easter Sunday, the anniversary of that great day.

But may I say a word of preface, that I would rather speak of Jesus Christ and his life, his self-sacrifice, his love, his manliness, his divinity, and of his death and resurrection than of any other theme in all the world. His death was voluntary, he gave his life, laid it down of himself, declaring that plainly, as found in the tenth chapter of John, in the sermon of the Good Shepherd. He had the power and authority from the Father to lay his life down and take it up. No man took it from him. I believe that I can say without error that in the last fifteen years I have scarcely had a waking hour, day or night, that my mind and thought and my heart have not turned for at least a minute or two to him, and many days I spend hours and hours thinking of him. In these fifteen years I have lain awake much at night with bodily pain, and my thought of him, my communion with him—not to him—his communion with me, and the touch of his presence and Spirit, have turned hundreds of nights of pain and restlessness into benedictions and blessings to be remembered forever with gratitude and joy.

I should like first to speak of the facts or incidents connected with the resurrection, and then say something of its meaning and significance.

The first to see Jesus resurrected was Mary Magdalene, with whom he spoke and to whom he revealed himself. In her joy, she hastened to embrace or take hold of him, and he said, "Touch me not; for I am not yet ascended to my Father."

The second appearance was to a number of women, and as he spoke to them, he told them to tell his brethren that they should go into Galilee, and there they should see him. That ought to be a comfort to mothers and wives and women, that the first message of the risen Lord to his brethren was sent by these anxious, devoted, eager women, who were first to the tomb in memory and reverence of his pierced body.

During that day he appeared to two of the disciples who were walking from Jerusalem to Emmaus, and walked with them and conversed with them without their beholding or understanding who he was. They were astonished when he asked them what it was they were talking about as he approached, what the thing was that was in their hearts; and they asked if he was a stranger in Jerusalem. They thought no man could have been there these last days without knowing, and told him of his own crucifixion and of his own burial in the tomb, and that certain women had been there with two of the brethren, who were Peter and John, and found the tomb empty. And then they said, "But we trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel."

That same day he appeared to ten of the apostles in an upper room, talked to them, ministered to them, let them see the nail prints in his hands and feet. Thonias was not with them; he was away. Judas, of course, had gone.

A week from that day he appeared to the eleven, including Thomas. In the mean time, Thomas had said, that he did not believe it. Thomas thought it was an illusion. Thomas thought their senses had deceived them. Thomas was a man who had to have, it seemed, the tangible evidence of the senses, and he said, "I shall not believe, except I see with my eyes and feel with my hands." When Jesus appeared, he said to Thomas, "Reach hither thy finger, and behold my hands; and reach hither thy hand, and thrust it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing." And Thomas came and did so and dropped on his knees and said, "My Lord and my God." Then Jesus said, "Thomas because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." He does not say, "more blessed," though I think perhaps they are.

I am grateful with all my heart that it has been easy and natural for me to believe, but I do not want to be unsympathetic with men for whom it is not so easy. I want to have the patience that Jesus had and the willingness to give them all the evidence there may be.

After that he appeared to seven disciples, five, at least, of whom were apostles, these being Peter, James, and John, and Thomas and Nathanael of Cana in Galilee, at the Sea of Galilee, and ate with them. He had fish roasting on a fire of coals. They were fishing. That is the occasion on which he asked Peter three times if he loved him, and Peter answered, yes. And I do rejoice in the last time, when he almost seemed to question Peter's answer, that Peter could look him—the risen Christ, the Son of God in the face—and say, "You know I love you." Blessed is the man who can face those eyes that can see the secrets of the heart and yet say he loves or he believes! There were seven there.

He visited Peter alone, the Apostle Paul tells us. No one knows what took place in that meeting. I believe we are warranted in believing that no meeting after his resurrection, perhaps, was more vital.

We do know that his four brothers did not believe in him during his ministry, but he visited his brother James after the resurrection. That is also given to us by Paul. And James believed and later presided in the Church at Jerusalem, the Christian Church, Christ's Church, after his brother had departed, for many, many years, and is believed to be the author of the Epistle of James, a letter of advice and inspiration to the Hebrew Christians of that day. Here he wrote that piece of advice that sent our believing boy prophet into the woods to pray. This prayer opened the heavens for the Father and Son to come.

At a later meeting he visited five hundred men in a mountain in Galilee, almost all of whom were living when the Apostle Paul bore his testimony.

Some time after, he visited the eleven and some others; on the mountain, called Olivet, when he ascended in glory; and the witnesses from heaven said that as he ascended, in like manner should he come again.

At a later time, he visited Paul and called him to the ministry and started him out upon that great mission of his.

Then we must record the visit to the Nephites, when he came day after day. There is only time to mention this.

And then his visit to our own prophet, in our time, with his gracious, humbling, chastening ministry to us; for I do not know how you men of Israel feel, but if there is one time when I do not want to speak in a loud voice, if there is one time when I am chastened and when I am sobered, and when I am humbled, it is when I center my consciousness on the fact that we are commissioned through the Priesthood to stand before him and for him in the midst of men. That is no testimony to bear lightly; that is no testimony to shout in thoughtlessness; it is a testimony full of awe, full of responsibility, and a testimony that should be borne in great reverence.

There is not time to say the word or two I meant to say about the significance and meaning of the resurrection, except this, that for the last year of his mortal life, or nearly that, he was trying to get his apostles to understand that his mission was not to set up an earthly kingdom. He was not to be a Jewish Caesar and set up the Jews to rule the world as Rome had ruled it. They could not understand it. We have evidence and plenty of it. After his death, Peter said, "I go a fishing." And the others said, "We also go with you." The two on the way to Emmaus revealed it; "We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel." When he was arrested, the brethren went to safety. He said, "Take me and let these go," and they went. They were in gloom; they were despondent; they had hoped it was the Christ; but to them the evidence that he was the Messiah was for him to establish a kingdom, with the Jews as kings. That is what they looked for; that is what their fathers had looked for; that is why they were so fearful, so despondent. But when he rose, when he came back to the Sea of Galilee, where Peter had gone to his nets—not for a day's vacation, not for an hour; if it had been that, he would not have fished all night. He went back to become a fisher of fish, because he was disappointed and thought, with his brethren on the way to Emmaus, that he was not what they had hoped he should be. When he arose, when he visited them, it was far more to them than the sign that one shall rise from the dead. They believed in the resurrection. It was far more to them than to know that their Master lived; it gave them the testimony, borne witness to, and made secure, by the gift and power of the Holy Ghost, that he was the very Christ, the Son of God. That was the great significance of it—not only that he lived but that he was what he had tried to get them to understand that he was; and borne testimony that he was. He was all they had hoped for, and a thousand times more, because he was Lord of life and King of kings, the Redeemer, the Savior, the Son of God, the Revelator of the Father.

On this Easter morning I am glad to remember these things with you; somehow I feel that every Easter morning, early, out of doors if I could, just as the sun rose, I should like to meet with a band of responsive men and women and spend an hour or two hours in memory of his rising. For that is what it means to us—not only that there is no death; not only that the grave lost its victory and death has been robbed of its sting; but also that he was and is the Christ, the Son of God, the Redeemer and the Savior, and that we are his brethren, children of our Father. I plead that in our wanting to know our Father we may approach him as Father. That is the only way to know him. He is Father, and we are his children. I bear record here, in memory of my faithful mother, my father, my grandparents, my people—I bear record that I know that God lives and is our Father, caring for us, watching over us; that it is his work and his glory to bring to pass our immortality and eternal life, and that Jesus is the Christ, and we are commissioned to represent him, in helping in that work and that glory. May God help us to be true, I ask, and I leave with you my love, and pray our Father's love and blessing upon you, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The combined choirs sang, "An angel from on high."

ELDER ELIAS A. SMITH

Of the High Council of Liberty Stake

My brethren and sisters: If anyone ever needèd the sustaining power of our heavenly Father, I do at the present moment. I have had no intimation whatsoever that I would be called upon to stand before you this morning and speak to you a few moments regarding those things which are dear to my heart and to your hearts. I thank my heavenly Father daily that I was born of parents who, in the early days of the Church, embraced the gospel and remained faithful and true to the end of their days. Brother Kimball says his father impressed upon his family the saying, "Are we able to stand the test?" Are we able to endure? I think that is the vital question with all of us. I take it for granted that everyone here has a testimony of the divinity of this work. We absolutely believe that the Prophet Joseph Smith, in answer to his prayer, was visited by the Father and by the Son, and that he conversed with them face to face; and that they made known unto him that he was to be the instrument in their hands in the re-establishment of the Church of Jesus Christ here upon earth. If there is any one of us who doubts that fact, he cannot in any manner believe in what is termed "Mormonism." That is the foundation stone of this Church, the Prophet Joseph Smith's declaration that the Father and the Son did appear unto him, and made known unto him just what they expected him to do in the establishment of his Church here upon the earth. Neither you nor I can save any one except ourselves. It is our duty while we live upon earth to obtain and retain a testimony of the divinity of our heavenly Father, and unless we do have that testimony, we are always in danger of slipping and falling by the wayside. The gospel, as I understand it, is a gospel that we must live day by day—not Sunday nor Monday, but every day of the week—seeking and striving to the best of our abilities to store up knowledge and get information and better our lives, and to assist others to live in a way and manner that they may obtain a testimony and better their lives. None of us can be independent of the other; each one of us is dependent upon our brethren and sisters to live in a way and manner that is acceptable to our heavenly Father. The biggest task I have on earth is to live in a manner that is satisfactory to me, and if I can do that, I know that I can satisfy my brethren and my sisters.

As Brother Kimball says, I am a member of the Liberty stake High Council. In that way I am endeavoring to do my duty. I believe it is incumbent upon all of us when we are asked to do a thing to do it to the best of our ability, whatever that task may be. A great many of us say that it is a task; possibly we should say, like Brother Robinson, that it is not only a task but a privilege to work in the Church in every way in which we are called. In doing that we get more out of it than any one else. We are the persons benefited, and receive added testimony to what we already have; as I know whenever I am called upon to do a duty and do it to the best of my ability, I am benefited; the Lord makes known to me his approval, if I have done it in a way that is acceptable to him. And I bear you my testimony, my brethren and sisters, that if we will perform our duties as members of this Church day by day, as the leaders of this Church expect us to do, living in a manner that those with whom we associate may say to one another, he is endeavoring to live his religion; he is endeavoring to be an honest, virtuous, truthful man; that we will get joy and satisfaction out of our labor. I pray my heavenly Father that he will bless me, that I may be able to live in that way and manner; and that he will bless you, and that each and every one of us may obtain a testimony of our Savior; that we may have that testimony burning in our hearts; that we may be Latter-day Saints wherever we go, upholding and sustaining those who are called to preside over us and endeavoring to do, to the best of our ability, what the Lord would have us do. May this be our lot, I pray in the name of Jesus. Amen.

It may be considered unfortunate that some of our brethren who were appointed by President Grant failed to learn of their appointment and have not put in an appearance. Only three of us, as we are informed, have arrived—President Robinson, President Murdock, and myself. We appreciate the fact that we hold the Melchizedek Priesthood, and believe that whenever we are appointed by those having authority, we are fully qualified to perform every duty and responsibility to which we have been appointed. I have had some experience, along with my brethren in the Church, and while I may not have accomplished everything that I was appointed to do to the very best advantage, I desire to say to you that I have never been appointed to do a single thing in this Church but that, when I got the spirit of my appointment, I was qualified and fitted to assume that responsibility.

When I was an elder in the missionary field and was sent out in the woods—for that is about where we went in the years 1883-4; we did not go in cities, they were not a safe place to go; we went to the woods, among the poor people, and preached the gospel, and we were sent forth without purse and without scrip—all it cost me to fill a mission was to get to my field of labor. I paid for that myself, and it was up to me to get back home as best I could. That is about all the money I had, with enough to buy a few clothes, and I remember they were rather poor. At one time I was up in the Blue Ridge mountains of Virginia, in the winter, with a straw hat and a duster on. It was not very suitable; it was not very warm. We could not wear overcoats; could not carry them in that country. All we carried was an umbrella. We never were at a loss to know what to do, my companion and I, when we had the spirit of our calling. We heard that voice—not very often, not as often as we should have done, but we heard it—behind us saying, "This is the way, walk ye in it, when ye turn to the right and when ye turn to the left." I stand before you as a witness for God that he never forsook us. I walked—and I am a very poor walker; I am not built for it—hundreds and hundreds of miles, and I never lay outdoors but twice, though I want to confess to you I hustled. There is nothing I dreaded worse than lying outside on the ground. I prayed, and my companion prayed, and then we got up and moved on. I guess we would have starved to death if we had kept praying and had not hustled; the Lord doesn't help people who do not hustle and move, after they pray, and do their duty.

Brethren, I want to read to you. I do not read very often except to myself. When I find a good idea—which is not very often, for very few of us do—I write it down. When you get an idea, write it down. That is what the Prophet Joseph tried to teach this people. When the Lord gives you a sudden idea, write it down, and then watch it; and if it comes from God, through his Spirit, it is inspiration; and when it comes true, that is revelation. Try to remember that. I am not going to read anything to you that has come to me, but I am going to read to you something that I have tried to make work—though I am not making very great progress. I have written it down partly because I have a poor memory, like my father. The Prophet Joseph Smith told father, when he tried to teach him grammar, "Heber, if you don't repeat that, I'll whip you." Father said, "Well, brother Joseph, you will have to whip me; I can't repeat it." Joseph said, "I would just as leave whip a child as you." The quotations I am about to read are such that I might repeat them a million times, or a multimillion times and never live up to them, and I am afraid some of us Latter-day Saints read a good deal, but do not think and put it into our every day life:

"He that seeketh the Lord early shall find him, and shall not be forsaken."

No wonder we are trying to teach our children. Some of us did not seek the Lord until we became old. It is a mighty good thing to begin early.

"The Lord is my shephcrd." Do you believe that? "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want." Then why worry your head off for fear you will go to the poor house? But that is where some of you will go if you don't wake up. Because the Lord "tempers the wind to the shorn lamb." Haven't I just testified of that? In all my wanderings in the south, God led me to the doors of the honest in heart, and they fed me and gave me a place to lay my head. And that is what I am telling our elders, these young boys going on missions. I am trying, when I set them apart, to impress them that the Lord is their shepherd and they shall not want. One good mother stated that her son wrote her and said, "I have only $3, and if you do not send me some money I will be licking the paste off the signboards." And the mother came to me somewhat disturbed and said: "Brother Kimball, what shall I do?" I said, "Let him lick paste for a while; he will find the Lord, but he never will with his pocket full of money." I have repeatedly told the "Mormon" elders that they never found God yet with their pockets full of money. I do not say that you do not have to have the money, but you do not worry much when you know where you are going to sleep and where you are going to eat. I know mighty well that I would not worry the Lord if I had a $5 dollar bill in my pocket; I would go and get something to eat and have the agony over. I do not think the Lord respects a "Mormon" elder who will howl and whine around where he has money in his pocket and is hungry. If he does, he ought to starve; that is my doctrine.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden." God knows that we have thousands in this Church who have labored and are weary. And there are thousands of people in this Church, mothers and old men, the best people God ever created, who never had a banquet or a chicken dinner in their lives unless they cooked it themselves. No wonder they get weary—they are made to feel they are no longer wanted. "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." And that is the only place you can get real rest.

"Cast your care upon him, for he careth for you." Can you believe that? That is what I am trying to believe—but I want to tell you I am having a hard time to believe what I read, and put it into practice. As I tell our missionaries, do not let doubt and fear creep into your hearts, for God never planted in one of his children a spirit of fear; it does not come from God; for when you have faith in God, you have no fear, you have no doubt; you know. But you will have trials and be tested; "you will eat the bread of adversity and drink the water of affliction." That is the only thing that will keep you humble. You have to knock some "Mormons" down every little while to keep them in the Church. It is too bad, but we as Latter-day Saints cannot be prospered without some of us getting arrogant and proud and forgetting God.

"I will strengthen thee," (I have quoted that over a thousand times) "yea, I will help thee, yea, I will uphold thee with the right hand of righteousness." Do you believe that?

"Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." I have heard hundreds and hundreds of elders say, that applied to the twelve apostles in the days of Jesus Christ and did not apply to a "Mormon" elder, out preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ! Think not of the morrow! I remember a story of two elders wandering in the South without purse or scrip, and they came to a corn crib, and one of the elders said, "We will sleep there tonight," and he called that faith! It was, but it was a poor faith. Those boys wandered around and around and got lost, and traveled in a circle; and when darkness set in there was the corn crib, and the elder said, "There, I told you we would sleep in the corn crib." The Lord fulfilled his word, and it served him right. It is where he expected to sleep. "As your faith is, so shall it be unto you."

"As thy faith is"—I have it here, by the way—"so shall it be unto you."

"I will fear no evil, for thou art with me." "There shall no evil happen to the just." You have read those things a thousand times, and so have I; and then we never think of them. We are a good deal like Coue. Have you ever read Coue's book? When I was sick, I read it from lid to lid, and I went trotting around, saying: "Every day, in every way, I am getting better and better." Every morning when I got up I was worse and worse. What good did it do me? I did not believe it. But thousands of people, according to the story, have gotten over physical ailments—they call it mental—by repeating, "Every day and in every way, I am getting better and better." It did not do me a bit of good, because I did not make it work. And they say it only cures mental trouble. My experience is, my brethren and sisters, that a large per cent of our troubles are imaginary and not real. We get an imaginary trouble, and we cling to it like death, and won't let loose. So it is with scripture; of what use is it to continue to repeat these things if you do not believe them?

Here is another. "The God that I worship says unto me, 'I am with you always—'" I can find that in my blessing given to me by Elder Moses Thatcher. "Ask and it shall be given you, seek and ye shall find, knock and it shall be opened unto you."

The Prophet Joseph Smith, when but a boy, read this: "If any man lack wisdom, let him ask of God, that giveth to all men liberally, and upbraideth not; and it shall be given him. But let him ask in faith, nothing wavering." Surely God reads our hearts; you cannot deceive God. You can deceive a bishop, sometimes, not all the time; you can deceive a president of a stake, not all the time; you may deceive the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ, not all the time; but you cannot deceive God any of the time. And don't ever try it. His ways are not as man's ways; he is greater than sects or creeds or isms or fancies or the notions and caprices of men.

Brethren and sisters, the time is up. I have only gotten started.

Why don't you read these things and write them down, like our fathers and mothers did of old, and think about them, and make them work? And when you are sick, have faith and be healed. Christ never diagnosed a case in his life; Christ never asked a woman what was the matter; he never asked her what kind of a disease she had. I know as I know I live and breathe, although I may never feel its power, that when sick, authority has been vested in me, as I have seen people healed, not many, it is true, but some were healed as soon as I took my hands off their heads. Yet doctors have said that those diseases were incurable, but they have been healed nevertheless. They tell me that epileptic fits are incurable. I cannot cite you to many cases, but I can point you out a poor widow, who lived in the sagebrush, in Idaho, that came to me after a conference. The bishop of the ward, and I administered to that good old woman, and she never had a fit after. I can cite you to a poor old widow in the north country who had a cancer. She had fasted for three days, and came to the same conference, and something said to her, "That is the man." I do not think I amount to much, but we administered to that poor old widow, and God healed her. I have had splendid success with widows; especially, when they were in poverty! But I have never had any success with rich people. I do not know why. May be it is because they have little faith.

May the Lord bless you. Think of God. How many of us think of God thirty minutes out of twenty-four hours? There is not one out of five hundred that actually thinks of God and his Son Jesus Christ thirty minutes a day. I do; but the first thing I know, my mind wanders off on something else. My brethren and sisters, God bless you and be with us and help this people, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choirs sang the anthem, "O grave, where is thy victory?"

The benediction was pronounced by Elder John W. Walker, of the High Council of the Ensign stake; and the meeting was adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

SECOND OVERFLOW MEETING

A second overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 2 o'clock p. m., Sunday, April 4, 1926.

Elder Rulon S. Wells, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

Singing was furnished by the combined choirs of Murray First ward and Mill Creek ward, of Cottonwood stake; W. F. Robinson, director; Frank W. Asper at the organ.

The combined choirs sang "Author of faith."

Prayer was offered by Elder William J. Robinson.

The choir sang "Grant us peace, O Lord," Ada McDonald and Manasseh Smith singing the duet parts.

ELDER JOHN V. BLUTH

President of the North Weber Stake

In attending conference this morning, in the Tabernacle, viewing the large congregation gathered there, and knowing that they came from almost every nation under the sun, I could but reflect upon the words of our Savior in the promise given early in the history of the Church to the Prophet Joseph, wherein he said, "Behold a marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men." I could but feel what a wondrous thing it was to see that Tabernacle filled with people from almost all nations of the earth and to know that they had heard the call of the Master; that they were of the honest in heart who had listened unto that call, who had forsaken that which was near and dear unto them in other lands—kindred, friends, wealth in many cases—and sacrificed for that which they believed to be true, and in various ways gathered unto the land of Zion, where they have reared their families under hardship, toil and struggle and sacrifice, and are watching the work of the Lord grow and prosper. I, myself, was born in far-off Stockholm, Sweden; taught a foreign tongue; trained then in what is now to me a foreign religion; trained in other customs than we have here. And the Lord, in fulfilment of the promise that he would bring about a marvelous work, called upon those who had already accepted the gospel to visit those lands; preach the gospel there, and bring the message of joy and gladness unto other hearts; and it fell to our lot to meet with those missionaries; to hear their story and testimony, and have our own hearts touched with that testimony; recognize its truth and have courage and faith enough to accept it and to come to these lands, unto these valleys. It is 52 years ago last month since I had the privilege of being initiated into the Church and Kingdom of God by baptism. In the experiences that have come to me since, the privilege of receiving the Priesthood, of using that Priesthood in various capacities, I have gained an understanding to some extent of what the Lord meant when he said that he would bring about a marvelous work in the earth. To think that this body of people we saw this morning; and that are there now gathered; those who are here; those who are out in the grounds listening; to think that they have a knowledge and a testimony for themselves that this is the work of the Lord—with no doubt whatever—a testimony from God that this work is divine; that all our ideas of the future can be resolved into the mere admonition, "live the laws of God that he has given unto you and all those mysteries will be solved." Give it time; serve the Lord, and we will know all that we desire to know; we will reach to all that our aspirations have sought for, and we will have eternal life in the Kingdom of God.

To me the having within our hearts of that testimony that God lives; that Jesus is the Christ, his Son, our Redeemer; to know that we are his children; to be acquainted with our relationship with him, the purpose of our being here, where we came from, where we are going, and what lies before us in the way of possibility for advancement, growth, and eternal progress—to have a testimony of that kind—is the most glorious gift that our Father could give unto us; and once received, brethren and sisters, we ought to guard that testimony as the most sacred gift in his power to give unto us.

Can we lose that testimony? Yes. We may have the Spirit of the Lord bearing testimony to our souls that this is the truth; but if we will not live the laws by which that testimony can be retained, it will fade and grow weaker. We have experiences before us of those who have stood up and borne testimony to the goodness of God, to the divinity of this work, having a knowledge of it for themselves and how they received it, and who have gradually drifted away until it is only a mere memory that they did such a thing; the knowledge has passed away. And why? Because they have not treasured it. They have not kept it bright and fresh in their minds. They have not served the Lord. They have not given of their talents that God has given unto them; of their time and of their means and their thought and their strength. They have not given of it enough to retain a continuation of that testimony. In this very revelation, where the Lord said that he was to bring forth a marvelous work and a wonder, he added this: "Therefore, O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind, and strength that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day. Therefore, if ye have desires to serve God, ye are called to the work; for behold the field is white already to harvest; and lo, he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might, the same layeth up in store that he perisheth not, but bringeth salvation to his soul; and faith, hope, charity and love, with an eye single to the glory of God, qualify him for the work. Remember faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence. Ask, and ye shall receive; knock, and it shall be opened unto you. Amen."

Those are the promises of our Father. To me the very thought of losing this wonderful individual testimony that God has given me—I dare not think of it! To have doubt come into my soul, where there is no assurance and knowledge and certainty, would unsettle all that I have so far been able to do in my life; and it would be the same to you, my brethren and sisters, if you permitted that to be done. Many of us neglect the opportunities offered unto us. We do not develop them. We receive the Priesthood and we do not magnify it; we do not honor and revere it and recognize that it is the power from God to act in his stead, that he has selected those to whom he has given the Priesthood to be his helpers in accomplishing the great work that he has before him. He says, "My work and my glory is to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man," and he calls upon his children who have heard his voice, who have accepted it and yielded obedience to his commandments; he endows them with the Priesthood and power to be helpers and assistants unto him to accomplish that—he tells us that the worth of souls is great in his mind and he sends us out to seek for those souls; "for the field," as he says, "is already white to harvest, and he that thrusteth in his sickle with his might shall have store which perisheth not." In other words, he shall have the souls of men who have heard his message; who have had faith brought into their lives; who have yielded obedience to the commandments of God, and have accepted the truth and striven to shape their lives in harmony with the teachings of the gospel; and in so doing he has added unto himself a store that cannot perish but will live eternally, a blessing, benefit, joy and consolation unto himself. Our Father says that if you should labor, as it were, all the days of your lives, and bring but one soul unto him, how great shall be your joy with that soul in the kingdom of our Father. And if ye bring many souls unto him, behold how great shall be your joy. That is why the Priesthood is given unto us. What will our Father think if we do not use that Priesthood, when we neglect to use it; or if we do use it, if we do it for our own aggrandizement, the advancement of our own purposes, our own personal gain? When we do that, we dishonor it, and instead of being helpers in his cause and laying up a store that shall not perish, we forfeit our rights and our privileges; we are not helpful, we do not obey that second commandment of which President Grant spoke this morning, "Love thy neighbor as thyself." We are not worrying, many times, about our neighbor; whether he is prospering, advancing, walking the path of righteousness, or not; we are caring only for ourselves. Now, in the midst of that kind of a feeling, it is not conducive to a perpetuation of the individual testimony that God has given us. It begins to fade and weaken and finally it disappears from us.

I would say unto you, my brethren and sisters, as a message that I would like to give to all with whom I come in contact: Guard and treasure that individual testimony of the knowledge of the goodness of God. Why, think what it means! You are not afraid in your explorations; you can study any of the mysteries, branch out, seek to gain knowledge, investigate the things in science, go as far as you can; and yet there is no doubt in your mind. Whether you are able to solve the things that come before you; whether you are able to explain them, means nothing; but you have a testimony that this is the truth, and for that reason nothing on the outside can take it away from you. Only that which is within ourselves can rob us of that testimony.

I have heard of brethren and quorums who are studying certain things, coming across certain passages, and having their faith weakened by the fact that they cannot harmonize certain things that they have read therein, certain things that they have heard. Many of them are carried away by alleged scientific principles, that make them feel that that which they discover in researches concerning this earth does not warrant the beliefs that they have held, and yet I have heard some of those bear testimony to the truth of the gospel. To my mind it seems almost impossible that such a thing could occur. If I know a thing, I know it. How can any one take that away from me? I might as well stand on the rock, dive into the ocean, get out beyond my depth, and then begin to doubt that I ever did stand on land, when I have an absolute knowledge in me that only a few moments before I dived from that rock into the water. If I am wise and have the strength, I swim back to the place from which I dived, and I am again on terra firma, on land. So it is in all our explorations, if we cannot understand them, all we need to do is swim back to that rock, our own individual testimony that God has given unto us and that we know is true. Having gotten back there secure again, we can start out, and we are strong on other explorations and thereby gather a little knowledge here and there, better knowledge, better understanding and interpretation of the things we read and discuss, and therefore strengthen our testimony instead of losing it.

Whatever you do, do not permit anything in your lives, either of sin or transgression, of error, of misinterpretation, idleness, indolence, of failure to accept opportunity, failure to respond to a call—do not let any of these causes step in and begin to weaken that testimony, but treasure it with the beauty of the knowledge that you know where you are going. There is no uncertainty. You know what is required of you, and all you need do is to live unto it, and your lives will be shaped in harmony with God's wishes, and eternal life and joy and glory and everlasting exaltation shall be yours.

May God bless us, that in our hearts we may have a desire for righteousness, live that which is noble and true and uplifting, and shun the things that are degrading and degenerating in character; live the law of the gospel, the law of the land, the law of our own being, and serve God with full purpose of heart. And remember, his glory and his advancement is our glory and advancement, and if we can go on with an eye single to his glory rather than to our own personal gains, joy and happiness will be ours everlastingly. May we be able to see this, get this portion of the philosophy of the gospel of Jesus Christ into our hearts, and shape our lives in accordance with it! Then we will find that we are sloughing off a little vice here, a little evil habit there, a wrong thought; and we are replacing them with proper thoughts, habits, and ideas in harmony with the gospel, and with God; and we become naturally new men and new women, capable of carrying on God's work and serving him and being indeed his helpers in the accomplishment of his wonderful work. May it be our lot that we may retain these testimonies, in our hearts, live righteously all the days of our lives, and receive eternal life in God's celestial kingdom, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER WILLIAM H. RICHARDS

President of the Malad Stake

We are told that "prayer is the soul's sincere desire, uttered or unexpressed; the motion of a hidden fire that trembles in the breast." If ever I experienced that in my life, my brethren and sisters, I experience it at this moment, for it is the earnest desire of my heart today that our Father in heaven will bless me, that I may be able at least to bear my testimony to the divinity of this great work in which we are engaged. I have enjoyed the remarks in this conference very much. I have enjoyed the remarks of the former speaker here this afternoon, in which he quoted the revelation which says, "Behold a great and marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men." I have read that, time and time again, and I have wondered how the Prophet Joseph Smith, at the time he received that revelation and gave it out to the people, could have realized that a great and marvelous work was about to come forth, unless he was inspired by the influence of the Spirit of our Father in heaven. I feel with all my heart, my brethren and sisters, that the Prophet Joseph Smith was inspired to bring forth this great work. I believe that when our Father in heaven and his Son, Jesus Christ, appeared unto him, that they showed him the beauties and the marvelous work that was about to come forth through his instrumentality. There never has been a doubt in my mind with regard to his calling.

I have always believed and have always pictured it in my mind as being fact, whenever I have read the account of the visitation of our Father in heaven and his Son Jesus Christ to the Prophet Joseph Smith. There never has been a doubt in my mind with regard to that matter and the divinity of this work.

My brethren and sisters, I received a testimony in my young days that has never left me; and while I have been thrown into the company of men who have ridiculed the gospel, that ridicule has never had any effect upon my mind, because our Father in heaven gave me a testimony with regard to the divinity of this work. I was almost constantly with my father, a man who accepted the gospel in his native land of Wales. He left all that was near and dear to him, and came out to this country all alone, not a relative of any kind with him; came out here for the gospel's sake; and the testimonies that he bore to me on many and many occasions sank deep into my heart, and I believed with all my heart that he was telling me the truth, because I knew he was a truthful man. I knew that what he said was true, and he would relate the experiences that they had in the old world in the young days of the gospel, when people were possessed of evil spirits; and all of those things always had an interest for me; and while I was but sixteen years of age when he died, and was the only one of his family who happened to be present with him on that occasion—at the time of his death—out of nine of us in the family, I do not believe I shall ever forget, worlds without end, when a few minutes before his death he called me to his side. I knelt down by him, and he bore his testimony to the divinity of this great work. It had an impression upon me that has never left me and never will, worlds without end. I loved my father and knew he was a truthful man, and could not doubt the testimony which he bore to me upon his deathbed. He also gave me the charge that I should take that testimony back to my brothers and sisters. I have tried, in my weak way, to impress upon them the testimony as it was impressed upon me. I hope the day will never come that I forget his last testimony.

Since that time I have had some experience in this Church, and the Lord has been good to me and has blessed me with an individual testimony, that I can bear without fear of any one that I ever met in my life—and, as I stated, I have been thrown, upon many occasions, into rough company. I used to freight to Montana in early days and was thrown many a time into company that had no use for "Mormonism" in any way in the world; but I never met a man in my life that I could not look in the eye and say that I knew the gospel is true, whether he knew it or not. The Lord has blessed me to that extent that I have never feared, wherever I was, in bearing that testimony to the children of men, and I hope such a day will never come, because I know that there is nothing in connection with the gospel that we need to be ashamed of or for which we need to hang our heads in talking to anybody regarding it. Our town, Malad, has been a very much mixed town. Quite a large number of outsiders live with us. I have had to labor with them, have mixed with them upon many, many an occasion, but there has never been a time but I was willing to bear my testimony to them, and I believe that they respected me for it. I do not know of any of our Latter-day Saints who had more respect for me than the outsiders with whom I have labored in different ways, and this was exhibited when I was called to the position, that I occupy at the present time, of president of the stake. Almost without an exception, those men called me by phone and said, "We knew who were going to be the president." Well, I had not thought of it myself, and as I told the brethren when they came up there, that they might just as well have taken a shotgun, taken me out in the field, and taken a shot at me; they would not have come any nearer to killing me. I love the work of the Lord, but for some cause or other it is a hard matter for me to preach the gospel. It is not, however, because of the fear of man or anything of that kind; it is a weakness of some kind that is within me. Some of the Reorganized people up our way make considerable capital out of President Young's having said on one occasion that he was "not a prophet nor the son of a prophet." I can truthfully say that I am not a preacher nor the son of a preacher. My father was a very weak man when it came to preaching the gospel standing on his feet; but when the opportunity came to him in social conversation around the fireside or anything of that kind, he was always ready and was able to defend the gospel, and always did it very creditably.

I pray God to bless us, my brethren and sisters, that we may give heed to all that may be said to us during this conference; that we may not be in the position that President Grant spoke of yesterday when he said that in nearly all the congregations that he attends, they sing, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet"—with the postscript, "provided he does not advise us to do things that do not suit us." I hope that whenever we receive any advice from those of our brethren who are called to those important positions, that we will be ready and willing to accept it, although it may possibly not be according to our way of thinking at the time. We have to wait only a short time until the thing will be demonstrated to our perfect satisfaction that those called to such positions are called of God and have the inspiration of God, our heavenly Father, to advise us along that line.

I remember on many occasions hearing my father discuss the question of the personality of God to people who did not believe in a personal God. I remember the objection that they brought up. They would say that it would be impossible for a man put in the position that we believe God is, if he were a personal being, to know what is going on throughout his creations. My father used to say, "I feel that he has an organization or some way whereby he knows what is going on through all his creations." We have had to wait only a few years, brethren and sisters, before man has demonstrated that it is possible for us to hear people all around the earth, without any wires. The radio has demonstrated it and has demonstrated to my perfect satisfaction that our Father in heaven always has had some way, some means whereby he knows what is going on throughout all his creations. May God bless us, my brethren and sisters, that we may give heed to the counsel given to us by our brethren, from time to time, because I know from my past experience that if we will heed, it will be for our benefit and that we will reap the benefits that we desire. May God bless us, I ask in the name of Jesus. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH B. WHITE

I feel very keenly the responsibility that rests upon one who attempts to address a congregation of this size. In fact my heart has been beating very rapidly ever since President Grant announced that I would be one of the speakers this afternoon. To be Latter-day Saints means service. We must be prepared on all occasions to defend the gospel; to speak upon it whenever we are called. We sometimes feel that we have not anything to say, which may be true in some cases. I think as Latter-day Saints, we depend more upon the Spirit of the Lord to actuate our remarks than does any other denomination upon the face of the earth. I am very grateful for this. The Lord knows what is best to be said; what is best to be done. If we will act in accordance with the dictates of that spirit, we will not go wrong. Whatever we do will be for the advancement of this great work.

About five years ago, or a little more, I was called upon to preside over the Hyrum stake. I felt wholly incapable of performing that great work. But I want to bear testimony to you that this work is indeed a wonderful work, and if we will put forth the efforts necessary in order to carry the responsibility that is placed upon us, we will be able to accomplish this work. One of the greatest testimonies I have of the divinity of this work is the very rapid growth it has made since first established, through the prophet Joseph Smith, despite the great obstacles that confronted him, and by which the people have been confronted from that time up to the present. If it had not been for the help and work of the Lord, it would not have endured; nor advanced from six members to more than about five hundred thousand, the present population of the Church. President Grant gave a report this morning of the wonderful work that we are doing throughout the nations of the earth; of the spiritual growth and development of this Church. No greater privilege can come to a Latter-day Saint than to be called to perform a service in this Church. A short time ago I was checking upon the number of people in the wards and in the stake who are holding office, and I find that over 50% of the entire stake population hold offices in this Church. We know that in order to advance we must work. Success is dependent upon continuous work. We have an opportunity to work all the time, if we only will to do it, and the advancement that we would make in the future would be wonderful if 75% or 80% of those who held office in this Church would only respond to the calls that are made of them in a whole-hearted way and be absolutely dependable. We could not do otherwise than grow and flourish.

Our organization embraces all truth. It covers every good thing. The people of the nations, the people of the world today are seeking after organization. They find that it is necessary to organize in order to protect business, and to protect themselves in a social way, in order that men may succeed in any undertaking. We have this great organization, and we could apply it, if we desire, to any line of business, and I believe it would be effective. I do not think there is any other organization in a business way that would be quite as effective as this one.

I do not wish to continue my remarks, but I want to bear my testimony. I know this is the work of the Lord; and I know that if we will perform the duties of Latter-day Saints, we cannot but advance, gain knowledge, wisdom, and understanding; we cannot but be prosperous, if we will heed the instruction of those who preside over this Church. I pray that this may be our happy lot, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER THOMAS E. MCKAY

President of the Ogden Stake

One of the main reasons that we all so thoroughly enjoyed the chorus to which we have just listened is because of the almost perfect harmony of the voices. Not a discord did we hear. And I pray that the same harmony may continue in our midst during the time I shall stand before you; and to the end that this harmony may exist, and we may each be in tune with the Spirit of God, I trust that each one present will offer up silently a prayer that we may receive a message that will be of benefit to us. We are God's children. He lives; he is in very deed our Father. He loves us. He has a message for us because of his love. And I do pray, and I have continued to pray in my heart since President Grant announced this morning that I was to be one of the speakers, that I may be instrumental in the hands of our Father in saying something that will be of value to us.

I am grateful for my membership in this Church. I am grateful for the association of such men as our leaders. I am grateful for the association of you, my brethren and sisters, and for your loyalty to the Church. I am grateful for the loyalty of this Church to the Constitution of this great country of ours. And if there is one truth more than another that I should like to emphasize this afternoon, it is the necessity for this loyalty. An undivided and an unselfish loyalty is essential to success in any line; I do not care whether it is in a religious line, civic line, in business, or what not; to succeed one must be loyal. And I say again, I am thankful for the loyalty of the so-called "Mormon" people, to the laws of this country.

I often like to contemplate in connection with this theme of obedience, of loyalty, the experience of Samuel and Saul—Samuel the humble prophet of the Lord; Saul the great general, large in stature, we are told, broad-minded, a big man. Saul, as king of Israel, was called and told through the humble prophet, Samuel, to go into the cities of the Amalekites and destroy them—not to spare any. Saul gathered his armies together and in obedience to that command went among the Amalekites, but he did not carry out the instructions of the humble prophet entirely. He spared the king, Agag, and some of the fat cattle and sheep. “Why,” he thought, “of course, the prophet told me to destroy everything, but he does not know the conditions that exist here; if he did, perhaps he would not have told me to destroy everything. Why not spare these fat animals and take them back; offer sacrifices; make a showing?”

When the word came to Samuel the prophet, he was sad, we are told, and went out to meet Saul on the return of the victorious armies; and he asked Saul what it meant, this lowing of cattle and bleating of sheep. “Why,” Saul said, “I brought them back to offer sacrifice to the Lord.” And, O those wonderful words that Samuel gave utterance to, “Obedience is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams!”

There are Sauls in our midst today, perhaps, who think that in the wards they know more than the bishops. “The bishop is only a boy, only a young man. Others are here full of experience. They know better than the bishop what the ward needs.” No; you do not, brethren or sisters. The bishop, no matter how young he is, no matter how inexperienced he is, has been called and set apart by the authorities of God, our heavenly Father. It is our duty to give those in authority, whether bishop, president of the Relief Society, or Primary, the superintendent of the Sunday school, or the Young Men, or what not—it is our duty to give that officer undivided and unselfish loyalty, if we wish to succeed in this Church.

In the history of the Church, from the beginning, this truth is well illustrated. There were those in the days of the Prophet who knew more than he did, were better educated, had more experience, and were not in a position to give that undivided cooperation that was essential. And what became of them? So it was in the days of President Brigham Young. There were those who knew more than he did; he is not the man for the presidency of the Church, they said. But what happened to them? You can go on through the history of the Church. It is full of examples of those who were not big enough—I say big enough, to give undivided and unselfish loyalty.

To be loyal is the only safe course to pursue. What is true of the individual is true of the community, is true of the nation. We are told in one of our Articles of Faith that we believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers, and magistrates, in obeying, honoring, and sustaining the law. There are some among us, I am sorry to say, who seem to be wavering at the present time with reference to honoring, obeying, and sustaining certain laws. "It is alright," they say, as one of the brethren quoted from President Grant, "to sustain those laws when they do not come in conflict with our business or with our appetites; otherwise they are not good for us!"

I am thankful, I repeat again, for the loyalty of the "Mormon" people in sustaining the prohibition law, and I am sorry that some, apparently, from what they say and from their actions, are wavering. Let us, as a people, be loyal in support of those laws. They are constitutional, have been so declared. And it is the safe course, as far as the people of this Church are concerned, to honor, sustain, and obey those laws, whether we like them or not. And I want to tell you that it is the safe course for this nation to follow. When individuals or a community or a nation select only those laws that suit them, and obey them and break those other laws, they are in a dangerous position. When a constitutional amendment prohibiting slavery was passed, there were those who were not ready to sustain and uphold that amendment, just as there are those now who are not ready and willing to uphold and sustain the Constitution of the United States. The Volstead act is a part now of the Constitution of this nation, and is so declared by a large majority of the people of this great nation, and it is the duty of this nation to uphold and honor and sustain the Constitution.

God help us, brethren and sisters, to be loyal, to be true, that we may succeed as individuals, as a community, and as a nation, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER RULON S. WELLS

Of the First Council of Seventy

I feel sure that the Latter-day Saints who have assembled here this afternoon have been repaid a hundred fold in hearing the things that have been said. If we will hearken to the counsels that have been given in this conference, I am also sure that it will result in our happiness and exaltation.

A great deal has been said in regard to the testimony that we have of the divinity of this work and the divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ. The Young Men's and Young Women's Mutual Improvement Associations during the present year have had for their slogan, "We stand for an individual testimony of the divinity of Jesus Christ." In this great day and age of the world, when there is so much agnosticism and so much doubt and so much unbelief, it seems to me it is particularly fitting that emphasis shall be laid upon that great and important principle upon which we stand and for which we are laboring, that we may establish it among the children of men.

How are we going to obtain a testimony that Jesus is the Christ?

How may we know and have a testimony of it, that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God? At no time in all the history of the world has the Lord left his children without divine guidance, without some way of communicating to them and letting them know where they stand and what is necessary for them to do in order that they may come to the knowledge of God; because to know him and to know his Son, Jesus Christ, whom he hath sent into the world, is in very deed life eternal. It is highly important, then, that in the community that is enjoying a dispensation of God's providence, a community to whom have been committed the revelations of the Lord, the building up of the Church and kingdom of God here upon the earth, it is very necessary that every man, every woman, and every child shall know that this is the work of God; that Joseph Smith is a prophet whom God has raised up in the day and age in which we live to usher in his glorious dispensation. Do we know it?

A great many people have some very peculiar ideas in regard to the testimony which ought to be in the hearts of every one of them. What is the testimony of Jesus Christ? What is the testimony that Joseph Smith is a true prophet of God? What is the testimony that God lives? What is the testimony that enables us to say that Peter, James, and John were apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ, endowed with power from on high, and that they spake under the inspiration of the Spirit of God? How do we know these things? Let me tell you. There is only one way to know the things of God, and the Lord intends that his people shall receive that knowledge in his appointed way. There is only one way by which we may come to the knowledge of God; only one way in which we may know that Jesus is the Christ; only one way that we may know that Joseph Smith was a prophet sent of God, and it is within the reach of every member of this Church; and it is a shame unto them if they have not received it.

Have we obeyed the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ; have we had faith in him; have we believed in him; and have we been repentant and turned away from our wrongdoing? Have we hearkened to the testimony and advice and counsel of the servants of God? Have we gone into the waters of baptism and received the remission of our sins? Have hands been laid upon us for the reception of the Holy Ghost? If we can answer these questions in the affirmative, every one of us can rise and say, "I know that this is the work of God, because I have received the gift of the Holy Ghost," through which, and through which alone, any man can know of the things of God.

What do you suppose this gift is for? Why do we receive it? O my brethren and sisters, we are living in a world of sin, of darkness, and of error, and the minds of the people are darkened regarding the things of God. Why? Because they have not obtained the gift of the Holy Ghost. That is the condition of the world at large. We have received it. There is nothing in all the world of more practical benefit to those who enjoy it than the gift of the Holy Ghost. There is nothing more important to us in our lives than to have within us that wonderful gift. Every man that has the gift of the Holy Ghost, every woman, every boy and every girl who has the gift of the Holy Ghost and will keep it, just as sure as they live, they will be exalted in the celestial kingdom of God; and without it, no soul will ever obtain that salvation. And every one that has that gift knows that this is the work of God, for that is what the spirit within us knows. If we have it, then it is ours. Let the spirit speak within you, if you have received this wondrous gift, and I hope that all of you know that this is the work of God, for that is the office of the Spirit of God within you. If you do not, it is because your faith was not sincere, it is because you did not repent of sin and, therefore, you did not receive the remission of your sins, and consequently could not obtain that wonderful gift.

But we possess that spirit in varying degrees. It manifests itself variously among the children of men, brought out by the experiences of our lives and the opportunities that have come to us, wherein the spirit has had opportunity to manifest itself in our lives. Have we given that spirit opportunity? Practical, I say, is this thing, the operations of the Holy Ghost, but some have allowed it to sleep within them; and even in that early day Paul had to write to Timothy, who was really a valiant servant of God, but became, no doubt, a little neglectful. Paul said: "Stir up the gift of God which is within thee, which thou receivest by the laying on of my hands." That ought to be said to Latter-day Saints, if it is not awake and alive in them, bearing witness to the truth of this work. Then "stir up that gift within you," for you have the right to it.

If you have kept the gift of the Holy Ghost, you have done so by keeping the commandments and keeping yourself sweet and clean and unspotted from the sins of the world. But if you have committed sin and grieved the Spirit of God, it may have departed from you, and that is a terrible condition to be in.

Sometimes I have heard young men who were about to depart into the mission field get up in the congregation in their own ward and say that they did not know that this is the work of God, but they believed it; and they were going out! I dislike to hear a young man say that; I do not like to hear any Latter-day Saint say that. Do not say that. Why? Because you grieve the Spirit of God that is within you. You might as well say, "I haven't received the gift of the Holy Ghost," for that is exactly what it means when you say, "I haven't the testimony of the truth of this work." It is a confession that you haven't the gift of the Holy Ghost. The Spirit of God in you is continually crying out for utterance. Give it the opportunity, and when you do, you will find there will be a burning in your heart that will convince you that you speak the words of truth. You may not know when you rise on your feet exactly what you are going to say, but give the Spirit a chance, it will declare the truth that this is the work of God, that God lives, that Jesus is the Christ and Joseph Smith is a prophet of God. That is what the Spirit wants to say to every child of God upon the face of the earth, because God knows that they need it.

What is the purpose of our receiving that wonderful gift, the gift of the Holy Ghost? As I stated before, we are living in a world of sin; we have a battle to fight against the powers of evil; we have the knowledge of good and evil, and God is continually striving with us by the power of his Holy Spirit. But while he is doing that, there are other powers in the world, endeavoring to destroy the souls of the children of men. That conflict did not begin here upon this earth. It began in heaven, before the foundations of this earth were laid, even in that primeval day that we sometimes read about, when "the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy." Why did they shout for joy? Because the proclamation was made that these, the children of God—you and I and all the inhabitants of the earth—standing in the presence of our Maker, should receive this earth-life experience, and thereby, with a knowledge of good and evil, work out our salvation with fear and trembling before the Lord and be brought back into his presence and exalted, clothed upon with immortality and eternal life. That was the program, and we shouted for joy, you and I and all the sons of God, as we were assembled upon that great occasion. It was necessary that the fall should take place; that Adam should introduce the race of mankind upon the earth; that the law should be broken and the penalty brought into the world, the penalty of death, that came into the world as a consequence of original sin.

But it meant an opportunity of development, of education, of growth of those qualities that are divine, to make us like our Maker, that we might become like him in very deed; for as we were told, our eyes were opened to the knowledge of good and evil. And Jesus was chosen. "Here am I," said he. And his offer was accepted. It was the offer of doing the work that the Father would have done, carrying out the divine will. It was a law that gave to all mankind their individual liberty, free agency, with the knowledge of good and evil, to choose between the two. That is what we obtained through the fall of Adam—the privilege of living here upon this earth, with this knowledge that we have, and with free agency, the right to exercise it; but with admonition to reject the evil and do the good, that we might inherit eternal life in the presence of God. That is what we are here for, and the conflict is still on. There was another one in that council that rebelled against God. He said, "O send me, here am I, too many will be lost in that plan of yours; too many will go astray; too many will be lost, for in the free exercise of their agency they will not do the right thing, many of them, and they will be lost. So here am I, send me, and I will see to it that not one soul shall be lost. I will compel. This free agency will not do." Freedom was a law of heaven, but slavery and servitude was the plan of this son of the morning, Lucifer, for he it was who made that proposition. And he was rejected and cast down because of his rebellion against God and the plan of life and salvation, and with him fell one-third of the hosts of heaven. Fell where? Right down here upon this earth, where you and I are living. And we meet them every day. You meet them and so do I—Lucifer and his hordes, these that are endeavoring to lead mankind astray, away from the path of right, into that servitude where he will compel and dominate. That is the struggle that is on, and it is in everything that we do, because there is a right way and a wrong way to do everything, and when we elect to do it the right way, we are serving God and keeping his commandments; but when we do it the wrong way, we are yielding to the adversary. The great principle of refraining from sin is enjoined upon humanity, and we have daily need to practice that saving principle; but we are in conflict with a very formidable foe and their name is legion, Satan and all his hosts, endeavoring to gain the victory over us.

Now then, wherein comes the benefit of the gift of the Holy Ghost? Have you thought, or do you think that you can gain the victory over so formidable a foe without the help of God? I do not think so, not one of us. And the Lord does not think so, and he desires that you shall be properly upheld and supported in your endeavor to gain this victory, and he proposes to help you. How? By giving you the gift of the Holy Ghost, without which no man can gain the victory over evil. Have you engaged in that conflict? Hasn't the Lord come to your help? Has he not rescued you from the power of the adversary? If he has, it is because the Holy Spirit has been with you. Don't you know it? Isn't that the testimony of God's power to you?

How did you get the gift of the Holy Ghost? If you have it at all, you have received it because Peter, James, and John came and visited the Prophet Joseph Smith and laid their hands upon his head and ordained him to the Holy Melchizedek Priesthood. That is why you have it. There were some who had received the word of the Lord down in Samaria, but they had not received the gift of the Holy Ghost. They had been baptized with water. "Now when the apostles which were at Jerusalem heard that Samaria had received the word of God, they sent unto them Peter and John [those same men who came to Joseph] who, when they were come down, prayed for them, that they might receive the Holy Ghost: (for as yet he was fallen upon none of them: only they were baptized [with water.]) Then they laid their hands on them and they received the Holy Ghost." Acts 8. That is what happened. And if you have received that gift of the Holy Ghost, you have received it because those same apostles came to the Prophet Joseph Smith and laid their hands upon his head and conferred that Holy Priesthood upon him, and gave him the power that on whomsoever he laid his hands he might receive that same gift. That is the way you got it, every one of us, either directly or indirectly, from that one source.

O, some people think they can get it without that. That is what Simon, the sorcerer thought. It was an outward demonstration there. It was even apparent to him, and when he saw that on whomsoever these apostles laid their hands he received the gift of the Holy Ghost, he came and offered them money, so that on whomsoever he might lay his hands, the same might also receive that gift. You remember the words of Peter, "Thy money perish with thee, for thou hast thought to buy the gift of God with money." O no, it cannot be obtained that way! It cannot be obtained except as God gives it to us. Through the restoration of the Priesthood, we have received these wonderful gifts, the gift of the Holy Ghost, practical in all of its phases, practical to all of us.

But it is a terrible thing to get the gift of the Holy Ghost and then lose it. We can only do that through transgression. If we have only kept ourselves clean, we have it still, if hands have been laid upon us in this Church; and we should stir up that gift until it is alive within us. It will manifest itself, if you will become active; if you will take your part; if you lift up your voice and cry repentance and labor for Zion. The Spirit will show itself within you, if you will declare the truths of heaven; you cannot but say that you know, and the Spirit does know it. It is a terrible thing to lose it, and that is what some people have done. I call attention to one historical instance of it. There was David, the shepherd king of Israel, a man after God's own heart. How the Lord loved that man! He was full of faith; said he, "The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake." That was the testimony of David. O how full and overflowing was he with that faith and confidence in God, in whom he believed to the bottom of his soul. But David sinned against God, and in the agony of his soul and in his repentant mood, he cried out to the Lord, "Create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy holy Spirit from me." O, Latter-day Saints, it is a terrible thing to have it taken away. David obtained a promise before he died that the Lord would not leave his soul in hell, and I like to think that he will yet receive compensation for all that he has done in upbuilding the faith of mankind in those unstinted words of his wherein he expresses his devotion and faith in God.

It was practical in every way. Paul wrote to the Corinthian Saints—that is to Saints like yourselves, who had faith in God, had repented of their sins, had received the remission of their sins in the waters of baptism and had received the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands—and said unto them, “Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you. If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy, for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.” So might we say to Latter-day Saints, “Know ye not that ye are the temples of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?” Are you not conscious of that, Latter-day Saints? We can realize it. Do not defile that temple, for it is holy. Do not transgress the laws of God, and you will keep the gift of the Holy Ghost; and as long as you do, that is the testimony of the truth of this work, and the only way to have a testimony. What we may not know through the gift of the Holy Ghost is hardly worth knowing. “Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love him. But God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God.”

If we have the Spirit of God, then, and then only, can we know the things of God. So let us cultivate the gift of the Holy Ghost that we received by the laying on of hands, for he will lead us back into the presence of God. He is the Comforter, the teacher, the educator, our tutor, our monitor, our daily companion. If we will only so live that we may enjoy his sweet presence, it will enlighten our minds, enlarge our understanding, fill us with wisdom and knowledge and understanding, that we may know the things of God by his holy Spirit, and without it we cannot come to that knowledge.

I rejoice this afternoon in the testimony that I have that this is true, that it is a reality, it is God's way of helping his children to gain victory over evil. The difference between us and the world at large consists, then, primarily in this thing. There are many good people in the world, just as good perhaps as we are. We are sending our missionaries out to them. Why? That they may take unto the inhabitants of the earth, our brothers and sisters who know not the truth, the glad tidings that they, too, may receive the same joys that we have, that they may receive the gift of the Holy Ghost. That is the difference between the world and us. If they can only secure the gift of the Holy Ghost, it will enable them to work out their salvation and bring them back into the presence of God. But there is only one way to get it, and Latter-day Saints know what that way is. And so we send our missionaries out with that message to tell unto the inhabitants of the earth, that they, too, may receive that priceless gift, and be enabled to overcome this world of sin, and eventually be saved and exalted in the celestial kingdom of God.

May the Lord help us to appreciate, then, what it means to have the gift of the Holy Ghost, and let us not say, as long as we have this gift, that we do not know that this is the work of God. I have heard it sometimes said, "Oh, you want to be very careful about saying what you know." Very true, that may be so; but let me tell you, it is sometimes more dangerous in telling them that you do not know; for then you give the adversary a hold upon you. Do not fall into that danger, because when you say that, you merely indicate that you are not in possession of the gift of the Holy Ghost. Develop it then within you, and as you labor in the ministry, as you labor in advocating the truth, as you labor in bringing men and women to a knowledge of it, and in perfecting your own lives and overcoming your own weaknesses, by the power and influence of that Holy Spirit, you will grow in the knowledge of God, and your testimony will grow day by day; it will burn in your hearts and you will know it beyond all shadow of doubt. That is the office of the Spirit of God, the gift of the Holy Ghost. May we then prize it above all things, and so live that we may always enjoy his sweet companionship, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

An anthem was sung by the choir, "God is our refuge and strength."

The benediction was pronounced by Elder David R. Lyon of the Ensign stake. The meeting adjourned.

SECOND DAY

MORNING SESSION

Monday, April 5, 1926, at 10 o'clock a. m., a large audience gathered in the great Tabernacle on this the second day of the conference.

Meeting opened promptly at 10 o'clock.

President Heber J. Grant presided.

The congregation sang, "O say what is truth?"

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Hugh B. Brown, president of the Lethbridge stake of Zion.

The congregation sang, "Zion stands with hills surrounding."

ELDER STEPHEN L. RICHARDS

I think perhaps the greatest contribution that I could hope to make to this conference would be in the brevity of my remarks, and I hope that I may be able, in a few minutes, to make a few suggestions which may be of some worth.

THE PRIESTHOOD AND THE HOME OUTSTANDING ESSENTIALS

If I were asked what thing I regard as being most essential to the progress of the Church and the well-being of its members, I think that I would answer by mentioning two things: First, the Priesthood, and then the home. I have long felt that these two great institutions lie at the very basis of our work and its advancement.

THE PRIESTHOOD AN AGENCY OF SERVICE TO MANKIND

We have during the past three months been holding Priesthood conventions in connection with the quarterly conferences of the Church. I have been delighted to see the emphasis placed upon this work, and I am hopeful that it may result in a higher and keener appreciation for the great power which comes from God and which is so liberally bestowed upon the men and the boys of our Church. I have construed that power and interpreted it largely in terms of service. I don't believe that the Priesthood has been bestowed upon men merely for their own aggrandizement. I look upon this power as an agency for service to mankind. I have characterized it as the perfect plan of service. I believe that it will not greatly profit any man to hold the power of the Priesthood unless he uses that power for the benefit of his fellows. Indeed, I have come to think that the holding of the power may conduce to his condemnation rather than his exaltation, if he is indifferent to it and fails to utilize it for the advancement of God's work. So I think that no more worthy enterprise can be fostered and carried forward by our presiding officers in the Church than to give to our boys and men, and indeed to the whole membership of the Church, a better comprehension, a higher regard, for the holy power which God in his goodness has given to us.

PRIESTHOOD TO BE USED IN THE ADMINISTRATION OF HOME

This power is to be used, not alone in presiding over the organizations of the Church, and not alone in the administration of the sacred ordinances of the gospel; it is to be used in the administration of our homes. Every man who bears it ought by possession of the power to be a better husband and father. By virtue of the power he is entitled to be regarded with respect and deference, and I most heartily commend the teaching of our children to respect and regard the power of the Priesthood, presiding over the home, as a basis for the inculcation of the great virtue of reverence which was stressed in this building last evening. There ought to be a difference between homes presided over by the power of the Priesthood and those homes which are not. Men who bear the Priesthood ought to be better neighbors; they ought to be better citizens, indeed in every way they ought to be superior men. If there is no distinction between the men who have received this holy power and those who have not, then I think we may well look to ourselves to find our deficiencies. The very holding of this power charges every man who is blessed with it to live more nearly a godlike life, for he holds a portion of Godhood itself. I commend to my brethren and sisters the emphasis of this power with the young boys who have recently received it. It should be taught to them that because these powers are widely distributed they are not cheap.

NO ORGANIZATION A SUBSTITUTE FOR HOME

I said the second great institution I would stress is that of the home. I am well aware that this institution receives very considerable attention at our hands, and that few meetings pass in which it does not have mention. My suggestion is that we so concentrate our study, our attention and our effort upon this institution that we make it more effective than it has been in giving the virtues of true righteousness and purity of life to our children. I am very sympathetic with the attention and emphasis placed upon our auxiliary associations, but I am thoroughly persuaded that not any one of these organizations, or all put together, can be substituted for our homes in the culture of manhood and womanhood. The homes are the very nurseries from which spring the most worthy products of the Church, the State and the Nation. They need more direct attention, and parents, by virtue of their very parenthood, are charged with a responsibility second to no other responsibility ever coming to them in their lives, the responsibility to return in purity the lives entrusted to their care. God grant that we may so safeguard this sacred and immortal institution, that it may achieve its great mission in the lives of men and of women, and God grant that, with the Priesthood, these two fundamental institutions may bring into the lives of Latter-day Saints a great appreciation for the blessings of the gospel and a determination and resolution to keep the commandments which he has given to his children, I ask humbly, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

I, also, have had opportunity to visit the stakes of Zion where we have recently held the Priesthood conventions and conferences, with the membership of the Church, and I think of all the quarterly conferences that we hold with the stakes of Zion I have enjoyed most the work of the Priesthood. I have been greatly pleased, as well as many of the parents of the Church, to see the young men of Zion stand up and in a public place declare their appreciation for the power of God that has been given unto them. With my brother who has just spoken, I, too, am impressed with the thought that it is a wonderful sensation to discover in ourselves a power which comes from above, and the only way to discover that power, is to use it, when it is given to us. It sometimes takes a little courage on the part of young men in the Church, as well as some of the elderly men also, to go forward and use their powers which the Lord has given them, but unless we do use and magnify them I am impressed that they will be of little or no value to us. It is a wonderful sensation to witness in yourselves the power of God, the power to do and say things that are beyond your own physical and mental strength. I heard a very splendid lecture the other evening by one of our educators and doctors in speaking of some of the gifted men of the nation, in their efforts to bring to light the truth. He said that it was probably their imagination which places them in the lead in bringing to the world the things which they were permitted to do; but I have been willing to grant just a little further blessing to these men, because, I believe that they are possessed of a power that is just a little beyond their imagination, even though it may be keen and brilliant, because I believe that our Father in heaven inspires men who are honest in heart and who are seeking after truth, and that he blesses them with gifts that make men more powerful and useful than those of ordinary intelligence, or brilliant imagination. It occurs to me that the joy which comes to men through using their gifts, is somewhat comparable to the feeling that impresses men when they are moved upon by the power of God while functioning in his work, even under the influence of the Holy Spirit, by the power of the holy Priesthood. In my mind one of the greatest blessings that can come to a man, is to function in the holy Priesthood, to fulfil his duty in assisting to bring about the purposes of the Lord in the earth.

The gospel of Jesus Christ, we understand, is for all people who will obey its teachings, who will hearken and who will study and practice the laws of truth which have been taught to the world, and in spite of that the Master himself taught his disciples, and in one particular passage of the scripture were these statements:

"Enter ye in the straight gate, for wide is the gate and broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat, because straight is the gate and narrow is the way which leadeth unto life, but few there be that find it."

When men and women take advantage of their opportunities to use the light and knowledge which comes to them, then they enjoy the blessings, because the Lord has been merciful unto them, those who obey his commandments, he has remembered with the power that has strengthened them against doubt and discouragement and against the thwarts of the adversary to place barriers in their pathway, until just in my brief experience in the work of the Lord I have discovered, to my great satisfaction, that those who are willing to seek and to learn and to take advantage of their opportunities, are the ones to whom the Lord is very merciful, and whom he will strengthen against the temptations of the adversary to place barriers in their pathway; until I believe it is possible for a greater number of the children of men to receive important powers and blessings which God has in store for them than are enjoying them at the present day. The Lord has been kind in establishing his work in the earth where men and women have taken advantage of their opportunities and have in a way cultivated their talents and have prepared themselves to teach God's truth, which is his gospel, which has been revealed to the earth in its plainness, in its fulness, in our own language, it has been taught in nearly all the languages of the world; so I have been constrained to believe that the Lord has been very kind to his children. It is my humble desire to express the wish that all who desire to teach the truth may have occasion to do so, by taking advantage of their opportunities to further cultivate their gifts and talents in preparation to stand upon the towers of Zion as watchmen, as teachers, as defenders of God's work in all of its departments, for I want to testify, my brethren and sisters, that this is a day when the Lord has required of you and me that we be prepared to defend his work, to teach it by precept and by example, wherever it may be our lot to labor. I pray that the spirit of defendership may be upon us all, that the spirit to avoid the conditions of the world, the spirit to live so that we may walk in that narrow way which leadeth to life instead of the easy, forgetful, disobedient way, perhaps, that leadeth through that broad gate to the way of destruction; and in humility, as a servant of the Lord, I leave in this conference, and in the Church today, with the leaders thereof, and with the membership thereof, the blessings of the Lord, that the spirit of discernment, that the spirit of teachership, the spirit of true defense may be in our hearts, and with us all in our homes and in our work, both in temporal and spiritual affairs, in the name of Jesus Christ Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH W. McMURRIN

Of the First Council of Seventy, and President of the California Mission

It is certainly a very great privilege, my brethren and sisters, to be permitted to take part in this great conference of the Church. I trust that the few moments that I occupy this position I may be led to say such things as shall be in keeping with the occasion and that may be of some benefit and advantage to those who are gathered together.

I am very glad to be able to report the California mission as being, from my viewpoint, in good condition. We have had a larger number of missionaries in the field during the past Winter than we have ever had during any previous period in the history of the mission. This larger number is accounted for owing to the fact that a good many short-term missionaries were sent to California. A large number of the short-term men who have been assigned to California have been men quite well advanced in age, two or three of them being just under eighty years of age. They have all manifested a splendid spirit and have been very anxious to magnify their callings as preachers of the gospel. Their spirit has been stronger in some instances than their physical organism, and a number of these elders have already been released on account of failing health. Those who have been released were not quite able to stand up to the stress of missionary work. I am very sorry to say that one of these brethren, Brother Thomas Wilson of the Woodruff stake, after returning home suffered for a considerable period of time and then passed on to the great beyond. Elder Wilson was a good and faithful man. We appreciate the splendid work that has been accomplished by the short-term missionaries. Short-term missionaries will be made welcome again in California. While I have no thought that it is my prerogative to indicate what should be done regarding this class of missionaries, I take it from some expressions that I have heard from some of these brethren that they could just as well as not have been in the mission field earlier in the season if they had received notification, and this certainly would be a very great advantage to missionary work. If short-term missionaries could be notified so as to leave their homes, probably not later than the month of October, they could give more time in the field and thus make their services more valuable. They could render service during the winter months and still return in time to take up their farming operations. I think the great majority of these short-term missionaries who have been assigned to California have been men who have been engaged in agricultural pursuits. Many of them have already been released to return home in order that they might give attention to the planting of spring crops, and the balance of these short-term men I suppose will be home within a month or two from the present time. They have brought a splendid influence into the mission. They are men of faith and confidence, they have set a good example before the people and have had wonderful testimonies to bear in relation to the great work that the Lord our God has planted among the children of men.

We also have an excellent body of young men and women; and while I suppose every mission president is anxious to have some men of experience in the mission field to lead the way, to preside over conferences, to instruct and teach younger men and women, personally I feel, the longer I labor as a missionary, that our Father in heaven made no mistake when, through his servants from the very beginning, he called very youthful men to go abroad to represent him in the preaching of the gospel. It is perfectly marvelous to note the change that takes place with these missionaries. Last Saturday night I had the pleasure of meeting quite a body of California missionaries in their missionary reunion, and I was proud of that company of young men and women. Just a short time ago I met every one of these young people in the mission field when they first reported for missionary labor, and almost invariably I met trembling boys and trembling girls. They hardly knew, as a rule, whether they had any testimony concerning the divinity of the work of our God, or not. In fact it has not been an unusual thing to hear some of these missionaries say that they did not have a testimony, they believed in the work of God, they had faith that Joseph Smith was a Prophet of God, and they were anxious to come to the knowledge which they had heard their parents and bishops and presidents talk about in their home communities. These young people that I met in the reunion were a different class of young men and women altogether from the young men and women I met as they came into the mission field. They were no longer trembling. They were no longer in any doubtful mood concerning the work of God. They were full of conviction. Instead of striking hands with trembling boys in a good many instances, I found myself shaking hands with bishops in the Church of Christ, with bishop's counselors, and with stake superintendents of Mutual Improvement organizations, and Sunday school organizations, and it was evident from the words that fell from their lips, in the brief conversations I was able to hold with them, that they were in very deed ministers of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and that they had burning in their souls the same testimony, the same knowledge, the same understanding, that were in possession of their fathers and mothers.

I said in our Mutual Improvement General Board meeting the other night, when there was a little discussion regarding testimony, that I heard one of our bright, well-educated young missionaries say that he had attended one of our Church schools for four years until he graduated from that school, and then attended the Brigham Young University for four years until he graduated from that institution of learning, and he made this wonderful statement: "I have come to understand my relationship toward my Father in heaven, the nature and importance of the Priesthood of Almighty God that has been conferred upon me, and the duty I owe to my fellowmen, better in the three

I hope there will not be any thought in the mind of any educator who may be in this great congregation, that I do not entertain a proper appreciation for education. I would to God that I had more education myself. I am proud of the men in our midst who have passed through great institutions of learning in our own land and in other lands, and who have had conferred upon them degrees of honor, because of their educational attainments, and yet I do hold that in giving actual service in the preaching of the gospel, in coming in contact with individuals who question one in relation to the principles that have been revealed of God, there comes by the power of God, and the inspiration and revelation of the Spirit of the Lord, an understanding regarding the purposes of God, the greatness and power and necessity of his work, that cannot be obtained from books, and that cannot be put into the hearts of men by teachers, let them labor ever so well and faithfully. I do not understand that there is any way of coming to a comprehension of the purposes of God other than by having the companionship of the Spirit of the Lord. If we come to understand the truth, as one of the old apostles taught, it must be by the revelation of God. So taught the apostle Paul to the Galatians. There is no other way.

I am greatly comforted when I hear testimonies such as I have referred to; and missionaries bear many such testimonies. I heard one of our college-bred men, Elder Louis E. Rowe, who is at present in charge of the Sunday school and Mutual Improvement work in the California mission, make the statement not long ago that he would not exchange the information and understanding that had come into his soul as a result of his missionary labors for all the college training that he had ever received, or ever expected to receive. With, I hope, a due appreciation for the declaration that came from the Prophet Joseph Smith that, "The glory of God is intelligence," I myself entertain the thought that there does come by the power of God and by the mysterious revelation of the holy Spirit, a knowledge, concerning the purposes of Almighty God that is superior to anything that any man living has ever obtained or ever will obtain while the world stands, from any institution of learning.

Our Father in heaven has established this work. Men in the world do not believe it. We have been sent out to bear testimony that God has set his hand to accomplish a marvelous work and a wonder. Yesterday when I looked over this great congregation I wondered what can be in the minds of men and women not of our faith when they come into this tabernacle and see it crowded to its utmost capacity with Latter-day Saint men. Latter-day Saint congregations are not made up chiefly of women, as is the case in many of the churches of the world. Our meetings are crowded with men, men of hard sense, men who know something about the battle of life; yet they leave their affairs and come from long distances that they may be in this general conference.

As I looked over the tremendous gathering yesterday morning there came into my mind the promise that was made by one of the prophets, Isaiah, when he said:

"And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem."

Another prophet, Jeremiah, made this declaration:

"Turn, O backsliding children, saith the Lord; for I am married unto you; and I will take you one of a city, and two of a family, and I will bring you to Zion: And I will give you pastors according to mine heart, which shall feed you with knowledge and understanding."

I have had some experience as a missionary in many of the nations of the world. In my missionary work I have been brought in contact with many thousands of Latter-day Saints who have been converted to the truth of the great message that missionaries are attempting to deliver to the peoples of the earth, and I know that they have not come up to Zion for gold or for silver or for perishable things.

I call to mind, now, that many years ago, when I was a boy missionary in Scotland, in conversation with a good sister in that country she made this statement to me: "I would to God that the way might be opened up that I might go to Zion with my children. It would not matter to me," said that good mother, "though I was sure to lay down my life on the journey, if I could only have in my soul the knowledge that my children would be taken to the land of Zion, and that they would be brought up under the care and teaching of the servants of God." I know that men and women who have gathered from afar, to this land, designated by the Lord our God for the gathering of his people, are actually fulfilling the promise that was made by the holy prophets, that they are coming to the land of Zion with the thought uppermost in their minds, that they may learn more perfectly of the ways of God; that they may receive more completely of the blessings that our Father in heaven has to give to his servants and his hand-maidens who are willing to keep his commandments.

I would like to ask the strangers who are present in this congregation: Where else in all the world can a people be found who have been gathered from all nations like this people, or where else among the religions of the world can teachers be found who believe in the promises of the prophets such as I have mentioned? Men at large are not looking for any such fulfilment of the promises of God. The Latter-day Saints alone teach and believe in such promises as are made by Isaiah, Jeremiah and other prophets pertaining to the last days.

I rejoice in my ministry, my brethren and sisters. I can not conceive of any line of employment, that any human being can have, more desirable or that produces greater joy in the human heart than that which is found by men and women who are engaged in calling repentance to the inhabitants of the earth and in teaching to them the precious truths that have been revealed for the salvation of the human family. I feel grateful to my brethren of the presiding authorities of the Church for the opportunities they have given me to labor in the ministry, to labor at the present time in the great state of California. I feel grateful to them for the kind words they have spoken to me, for the encouragement they have given me and my companions, and I have a strong desire in my soul to perform the duties that rest upon me to the best of my ability, and to be found always crying repentance among the people and bearing witness to the truth as it has been revealed. It is true there are not any great numbers that pay attention to the testimony borne by the missionaries. In the California mission, during the year just passed away, there were about seven hundred sixty baptisms. A large number of these baptisms were the children of Latter-day Saints who reside within the confines of the mission, but we rejoice when we take into consideration the declaration of our Father in heaven that if one labors for a life time and saves but one soul, how great will be his joy with that soul in the kingdom of God. Then if we put that measure of importance and value upon the souls of men, wonderful things are following the ministry of these missionaries, not only in California, but in all the missions throughout the world, for I take it that few as the baptisms may be, they are far in excess of one soul to each man and woman who has been called to labor as a missionary.

Then there is another great responsibility that rests upon the missionaries. It is not to be gauged by the number of souls that we lead down into the waters of baptism. It has always been the decree of God and his manner of working with the inhabitants of the earth, to send forth his servants to warn mankind and bear witness concerning the judgments of the Almighty that are to overtake the inhabitants of the earth, and those judgments have not ceased, as the Lord God liveth. All that he has promised by the mouths of his holy prophets in due time shall be brought to pass; and upon the shoulders of these men who have been called to labor as missionaries there rests a responsibility to warn the people and testify as widely as possible that the heavens have been opened, that God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ have come to earth, that holy angels have been sent by the command and appointment of God, and these holy messengers have conferred upon the heads of mortal men authority of the holy Priesthood, the power to speak legally in the name of God. That authority is here, it is with the missionaries; they feel it. No wonder they say there has come to them a knowledge and comprehension concerning the purposes of God which they have never been able to obtain in institutions of learning, but they found it by revelation in the service of God.

I bear witness to this truth. I rejoice in it. I know that God lives, I know that Joseph Smith, the man chosen to introduce this great work of the latter days, was called and ordained to the authority of the Priesthood by the commandment of Almighty God. The Lord's Spirit has so testified to me and, whether my fellowman entertains the thought that I am radical or otherwise, God being my witness, I know that this is his work, and that it cannot be destroyed. It has been planted to remain. That is the promise of God. Overturn it if you can! Amen.

I rejoice with you, my brethren and sisters, in the testimonies that have been borne, and the instructions given in this great conference. I realize that all of you who have come together have come for the purpose of receiving the word of the Lord and instruction from his servants, and I, with you, have listened with great interest and appreciation to the instructions that have been given to us by the Presidency and those of the authorities who have already spoken. I desire to live in accordance with these instructions, and, so far as I have power, to help with you, to carry them out in our lives for the advancement of this great work in which we are engaged. I appreciate the fact that in endeavoring to speak to you this morning I am under a great responsibility, and that unless I can enjoy the influence of the Spirit of the Lord and your confidence and attention, I shall not be able to speak in such a way as shall be edifying and profitable to you who are present.

I have rejoiced greatly, and have been delighted with the opportunity that has come to me to visit in the various stakes of Zion. It has been a joy to attend the conferences that have been held, and to partake of the fine spirit that is manifest among the presidencies of stakes, the bishoprics of wards, and the sisters—the women who are engaged in the various activities which are common to them in the various stakes of Zion—and to feel the spirit generally that is manifested in these stakes. I have been edified, strengthened and encouraged in the appreciation of the fine manhood and womanhood that is in evidence among the officers and members throughout the Church.

I rejoice in the fact that this Church will have been organized ninety-six years tomorrow. I have been led to reflect upon some of the things that have happened on that date. It is believed, I think, that on or about this date, somewhat like nineteen hundred twenty-six years ago, our Savior was born, and that about thirty-three years later, on or about this same date, he was resurrected from the dead; that yesterday, the day that is celebrated by the Christian world generally as the day of his resurrection, conforms very closely to the day which we celebrate as the anniversary of the organization of the Church. There are other events that have occurred on this same date, April 6, that are of importance in addition to this great event which we celebrate—that of the organization of the Church. I am reminded that on April 6, 1909, Admiral Peary reached the North Pole. What connection that may have with the gospel or with the attitude of the Church, I leave for your consideration. I am reminded also that on April 6, 1917, war was declared by the United States against Germany and Austria, which nations were engaged at that time in a war against the welfare of humanity. This nation entered into that conflict with unselfish purposes, and with the desire in mind to promote liberty and right living. As Latter-day Saints, we surely appreciate the fact that the entry of the United States into that war was in conformity with predictions that have been made in the past with regard to conflicts which should prevail, and also the part which this nation should take in the promotion of liberty among mankind.

I was impressed greatly with statements made by President Grant in his opening remarks yesterday morning with regard to the blessings which have attended the people of the Lord in coming to this land, and I would like to read to you a few of the words of Isaiah relative to this matter. In the 35th chapter of Isaiah we read as follows:

"The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice, and blossom as the rose. * * *

"Strengthen ye the weak hands, and confirm the feeble knees.

"Say to them that are of a fearful heart, Be strong, fear not: behold, your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense; he will come and save you.

"Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped.

"Then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing: for in the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.

"And the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water. * * *

"And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called The way of holiness; the unclean shall not pass over it; but it shall be for those: the wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein. * * *

"And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads: they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away."

We are witnesses, my brethren and sisters, to the fulfilment of this prophecy. It has been brought to pass in this generation in the coming of the people of the Lord to this community, and the building up of this land. We are enjoying the blessings that have followed the acceptance of the trials and sacrifice which they made in coming here. What was the cause of their coming, or by what means were they able to endure? They developed the spirit of obedience and willingness to do that which the Lord desired of them, whereby they were prepared to submit their own desires and feelings for the welfare of this work, and the accomplishment of God's purposes, with an appreciation of the fact that his word and his will had been declared unto them by those who were the leaders of his people.

I would like to stress for a moment the importance of this spirit of obedience. The Lord has given to us a knowledge and an appreciation of the responsibilities of the principles and the ordinances which conform to his house, and to the building up of his kingdom. He desires of every one of us who accept of these things that we shall accept of them willingly and that we shall endeavor to observe them. We have heard from our President in regard to the principle of the Word of Wisdom, a principle and a revelation that has been before this people for all these many years, so plain that the wayfaring man need not err with regard to the truth and the divinity of the principle and the assurance of blessings which follow the observance of this principle. Let me call your attention in this connection to the statement made in one of the opening paragraphs of the Word of Wisdom, with regard to the efforts which are being made and which will be made by wicked men conspiring for the purpose of defeating the welfare of the children of men, for which reason, among others, the Lord has made plain this revelation. I am sure that every one of us appreciates the fact, if we will but consider for a moment, that there are influences at work in the world today which are endeavoring to mislead and to deceive the people of the world with regard to those things which the Lord has declared are not good for man, such as tobacco and strong drink, and other things which he has declared are not for our welfare. Many men in the world are endeavoring in a deceitful way to make these harmful things appear attractive. We read the advertisements of these things which are narcotic in their nature, and we can perceive very clearly that such advertisements are worded and designed in order to deceive those who are not familiar with the dangers which attend the use of these drugs and narcotics. The Lord expects of us that we shall observe these things. As he has given this commandment, we should be ready to obey it, and should do so willingly. There should be no trial, as I see it, to the Latter-day Saints to observe the principle of the Word of Wisdom, even though it may mean that we have to resist the temptation or the desire for any of these things. If we will cultivate the spirit of obedience and humility, there is no reason at all why every one of us cannot observe and live in conformity with the principles which the Lord has declared in that revelation, the Word of Wisdom.

In like manner, there is a principle and a law that has been given for our development which will enable us to overcome our selfishness and enable us to cultivate charity and consideration for our fellow-men, for the welfare of mankind everywhere. We heard read yesterday a statement of the expenditures that have been made by the Church from the tithes for the welfare of the people, and I want to say to you that which you know for yourselves, that these tithes are expended solely for the welfare of the people of the Lord, for the advancement of his purposes in the earth, for the promotion of the welfare of mankind, for the bringing of the gospel to all men everywhere, and for these purposes only; and the tithes are expended with the greatest wisdom and judgment, under the inspiration of the Spirit of the Lord.

The Lord has given to us this commandment, which we should observe, that one-tenth of all of our increase should be given to him annually. Surely every Latter-day Saint can be taught this principle, and can learn to observe it in conformity with that spirit, that not less than one-tenth of all that we earn, not less than one-tenth of all our increase, shall be given to him for the advancement of his work. When the people of the Lord came to this land, they took it up as their own, and yet I am sure they did it with an appreciation that they were doing so as stewards; that, while they claimed the land, they realized the fact that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof. In like manner, every one of us ought to cultivate that spirit, and the appreciation of the fact that we are only stewards here and we have what we enjoy of material things for the time being only. We cannot take any of the earthly possessions when we go from here. We can only take with us the things that we have developed in the way of faith, righteousness and good works. So we surely ought to use our means and administer our affairs here with the appreciation in our hearts that what we have received is of the Lord, and that he will bless and prosper us in larger measure as we show our appreciation to him for his blessings unto us.

There are, also, other things, my brethren and sisters, that we need to learn to observe and to obey more fully. In the matter of the observance of the Sabbath day, the Lord has declared to us how we should observe that day. Many people question at times how we should observe it, or what it is that might be considered as breaking the Sabbath. Surely anything that interferes with the spirit of peace conformable to the Sabbath is breaking the Sabbath. There should be nothing that interferes with our worship or that causes our minds to be diverted, nor any act of ours that causes our minds to be detracted from the spirit of that day; but in all of our acts upon that day we should exercise and devote our minds and thoughts to those things that shall help us to grow in faith, in righteousness and in good works.

The Latter-day Saints have received the promise of a blessing, that if they will observe the principle of fasting and give for the benefit of those who are in need—the fast donations—they shall be prospered and blessed and grow in faith and righteousness. Our fast every month ought to be in the spirit and with the purpose of obtaining some particular blessing that we need, which will enable us to gain spiritual strength and power. As we live and strive in this way we shall cultivate increased strength and capacity, we shall be blessed physically and cultivate more of the spirit of charity and good will for our fellowmen.

My brethren and sisters, I rejoice in the truth of the gospel. I rejoice in the confidence of my brethren and the confidence which you have in me, and pray that I may be worthy of it. I know that this restored gospel is true. It has been an assurance to me all my life. I was brought up in the Church, of goodly parents who trained me in the spirit of the gospel, and I have learned to know for myself the divinity of this work, to know that this Church which is named the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, is in very deed and absolutely his Church. Of all the churches of the world, it is the Church of Jesus Christ. It is founded upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, with Jesus Christ as the chief cornerstone. It has been established under his immediate direction and by revelation from him. It will endure and carry out the purposes which the Lord has in view for the accomplishment of righteousness, truth and liberty in the earth, and the preparation for the coming of the Son of man to reign in righteousness here. May we, every one of us, do our part to advance the purposes of God and to help to bring these things to pass, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER LLOYD O. IVIE

Former President of the Japan Mission

I am sure, my brethren and sisters, that I have never in my life had a surprise quite like this. It was something that I had never expected. I really have never felt it would be possible within my lifetime to be called to speak to an audience of this size, though I have spoken to audiences in our stake assemblies. I do feel that this is a place where, above all, we should be able to receive the blessings of the Spirit of the Lord. I have felt that Spirit whenever I have come to conference, here in Salt Lake. I have always felt it here, perhaps, as much or more than at any other place.

I was given an opportunity as a missionary to labor among the Japanese people. I am sure that I enjoyed the time that I labored in that land. I have had faith in that people. I know there are many good among them. I realize that in America anything concerning the Japanese is spoken of with considerable prejudice, due perhaps to political and other reasons. But in my association with them as a missionary, I have found much good among them, and have learned to love and respect them in very deed. I really think and feel that the Japanese people are worth while.

Our coming to Japan was, perhaps, the first contact of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints with other than Christian religions, with other people than those of Christian belief, the so-called Christian denominations of the world. It is our first contact, we might say, with Buddhism, a religion and philosophy which is so much different from our own; and I have found that in this we have a new work, a different problem to solve, and it is one that is going to tax the ingenuity and faith of our missionaries and of our people before that problem shall be entirely solved. At any rate, that is the way it has always seemed to me. We cannot go before those people and preach to them the gospel by quoting passages of scripture, and say that this is true or that is true, because it says so in the Bible. We must convince them with reason. But, of course, as Latter-day Saints, we know and understand that truth is reason, and that there is no other way by which we can receive knowledge and understanding except by study and by the Spirit of the Lord, and that we must reason these things out for ourselves. That is one of the strong points, I think, of the Latter-day Saints. We are not confined to what is said in any book of scripture, though it is true those books are the foundation of our religion. They make us what we are historically; but, at the same time, we as Latter-day Saints feel that we have individual testimonies, each and every one of us, concerning the gospel, because we have reasoned it out for ourselves, and such is the way that we must work. As Latter-day Saints, that is the way we must obtain our testimony, if we feel that we are strong enough to stand against those various doctrines that spring up against the work of the Lord throughout the world. I think that it is a good thing for us all to gain a testimony, not only by faith and prayer, but by reason and by study, until we can understand that these things are true, even though the scriptural books were taken away from us. I think that is one thing that we should all say as Latter-day Saints, that we could stand on the testimony we possess, even though, through some freak of nature, or otherwise, the very books by which we have been taught were taken away from us. We stand upon that. That is going to be the problem in my mind when our Church fully solves the methods, the correct methods, of doing missionary work among this people who believe in Buddhism. I believe that there will be a great work done among that people. Of course, we don't understand the origin of the Japanese. We don't understand entirely, that is of a surety, whence they came, though many opinions have been given, and much has been studied on the subject.

While I was in that country I had an opportunity to study in company with a native man, who used to come to the Book of Mormon classes. He was interested in the Book of Mormon from the viewpoint of his getting knowledge of early races; from the viewpoint of learning of the origin of the races. That was what he was studying, as a lad. He was a government employee, but as a hobby he had collected a large library. By the way, his library was destroyed in the great earthquake, and immediately thereafter he came back to the Church and bought a copy of the Book of Mormon, saying that it was the first book that he had purchased to begin his new library since the old one had been destroyed; and he had studied these problems and felt that the Japanese people had perhaps come from somewhere around Asia Minor, perhaps from Greece or from Egypt or in that district somewhere, and he had maps that he had collected showing something to that effect. It is probable that such might be the case. At any rate, it is my firm belief and opinion that there is the blood of Israel among that people. I believe that some day, although the time may not be fully ripe, that blood will show itself in greater good works in the land.

I want to bear my testimony that the restored gospel is true. I know this with all my being. The only problem in my life is to live worthy of those things which we know and understand are true and correct. I pray that the blessings of the Lord may be with us all, that we may seek continually to keep his laws and commandments, and I do it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Our concluding speaker will be President Alonzo A. Hinckley. I thought the Saints would be pleased to hear from one of our short-term missionaries who has had experience in the field.

ELDER ALONZO A. HINCKLEY

President of the Deseret Stake, and one of the Short-term Missionaries

My brethren and sisters, I beg of you that you will sustain me by your united faith and prayers, that my spirit may be calm, and that the Lord may be able to use me in his own way for the few minutes that I shall stand before you. I certainly do appreciate the opportunity of being with you and worshipping with you during the sessions of this conference. It is only a matter of a few days since I wrote home to my folks and said to them that this would be the first conference that I had missed in a number of years; but that I hoped that they, in their attendance here, would receive that reward of the Spirit of this work that comes to us when we are associated with the authorities of this Church, who speak in the name of the Lord by divine authority.

I have been privileged the last few months to be in the missionary field, under the direction of President Charles A. Callis, in the Southern States mission. I was assigned to the Florida conference. Not being acquainted with the other conferences of the Southern States, I am prone to believe, from the short experience that I had in Florida, that perhaps the Florida conference is one of the choicest conferences of the Southern States. I bring to you the greetings of the Saints in Florida, and I can speak of them as Saints. The majority of those who are members of the Church are devoted in their service to the Lord. I have felt that it is one of the greatest opportunities that has come into my life to be privileged to become renewed in the spirit of proclamation, even the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ; to feel the missionary spirit; to feel the spirit of testimony; to be associated with young men in the Florida conference. I believe that ten short-term missionaries were appointed to labor in that conference. Choice as they are; splendid as are their influence, the spirit they manifest and the testimony which they bear, yet, the greatest impression came to me with the wonderful work that is being done by young men. Those young men seemed as dear to me, almost, as my blood kindred—true, clean, wholesome, sweet, living so that the Lord could speak through them; living so that he did speak through them, speaking in the power and demonstration of the Spirit of the Lord. They are accomplishing a great and a mighty work. It has been a joy to me to sleep with them, to talk with them, to pray with them, to feel their spirits. I cannot conceive of anything that could bring, and that does bring, in my belief, greater strength to the Church than for young men, clean in mind and clean in body, to discover really what this work is and what the power of the Priesthood is. It was like a renewal; in fact, it brought me back immediately to the experiences of years gone by. I speak of Florida frequently as of Holland. I don't know why it should be, after a lapse of twenty-five years, that when I speak I should mix the names of Holland and Florida, only for the same spirit of testimony which is discovered.

I do not know what particular good I was able to accomplish for any other than for myself, but it was worth more than it cost me in time and in money just to have the feeling and the experience.

A week ago yesterday, Brother Worley asked me if I would perform a ceremony of baptism, and it was my privilege to walk out into the clear waters of one of the streams. Six people were led out into those waters to make covenant with the Lord. I had one of the real experiences of my life. I baptized three children that were children of members and one man and two of his children. It seemed just like other experiences that I have had in the Church as I baptized those children; but when I put that man a little deeper into the water and when I raised my hand to high heaven and called him by name, I realized who I was, just a weak man, and then when I spoke the words: "Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ," my soul thrilled, and I felt, perhaps as I have never felt before, what it meant to be able to say: "Having been commissioned of Jesus Christ, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Ghost." When that man was buried in the water and he came forth, and after the confirmation, he gathered me into his arms—a larger man than I am, having heard the gospel for seventeen years of his life and never having been brought, as he said, to a full understanding of what he had lost, what he was permitting to pass by; then to have two of his children go down with him into the waters of baptism; and as he closed me in his arms he said: “Oh, my brother, now do not forget me after all these days, when I accept the truth with an honest heart.” He had laid away his tobacco, he had understood fully what it meant to part with one-tenth of his income annually, he said: “Remember me and my little family, that I shall have the faith, the support and the prayers of the Saints and of you, that I shall be true henceforth and forever.”

I do remember them! I do pray for them, because out in this world of unbelief, in this period when men doubt the divinity of Jesus Christ, to find an honest soul who, through repentance and through baptism, has his sins washed away and who, through the laying on of hands, does receive the gift of the Holy Ghost and testifies of a surety that he knows that God lives and that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God; that he who was dead now lives and lives forevermore, and has established his Church and commissioned men to proclaim this everlasting gospel and to testify of him, of the establishment of the Church, and to point the way of salvation to those who will hear and believe, the privilege is choice, the blessing is great to have the opportunity to go and deliver this message. I thank the Lord for the opportunity. I pray that it shall be appreciated. I do not believe that it needs men as old as I am or older; it needs vigor; it needs strength; it needs testimony; it needs those who are prepared to offer sacrifices. From the beginning I have seen those who have come in. I call to mind one brother when he came in, one of the short-term missionaries, who said: “I am ready to go back. I have not been able to do much. I have given what I had, all the strength that is in me, but I have not had much strength.” I believe that it is worth the strength, the physical strength, the ability, the time and all that any man can give, to go out and renew his spirit, and cry repentance; testify of the divinity of this work, and receive a renewal of his testimony, a renewal of the desire to bring souls unto God. When I think of Brother Roscoe H. Paramore, I shall remember him forever; I shall think of him as one in whom the promise may possibly be fulfilled. I did not bring him the gospel first; oh no! I have said that he has heard it for seventeen years, but he has joined the Church. I expect, if I am true, and if he is true, which I believe he will be, to have joy with him forevermore, for it is the promise of the Lord.

I bear testimony to you, my brethren and sisters, of the divinity of this work. It is of the Lord. The greatest manifestations, I have said, is in these young men standing up. I think of one of them. The Saints told me when he came out he had not had much experience.

Some of the elders told me of him. When I went down into his field, I said: "My brother, do you have any honest investigators in this section who are listening to your testimony?" He said: "Come with me, my brother, and visit some of them. I believe they are honest." At the close of a meeting, we went to the home of one investigator. When I came away, one investigator stood up, and as he grasped my hand he said: "Brother Hinckley, you will not take this elder away from me, you are not going to replace him, are you?" "Why not?" "Oh, he has brought us the truth. As he has come into our home, opened the scriptures, reasoned with us, and borne testimony of the gospel, he has brought more joy into our home than any man who has ever visited us. Leave him here with us." I walked out and I said to one of the elders. "Have you ever worked with this elder before?" "Yes, Brother Hinckley, when he first came out here I stood with him on the streets. He had not had much experience. As he stood on the street, his hands trembled so that he could hardly read a hymn that they were going to sing." Yet he stood there, notwithstanding his weakness, notwithstanding his fear; and he said, "As I watched his knees tremble and listened to his weak words, I thought, 'oh, that he had had some training before he came here.'" That was an elder's testimony regarding this weak elder. Sure he was weak, but what has he done? He has followed the instructions of President Callis; he has risen early in the morning and in the early morning hours, after prayer, he has read the scriptures; he has prayed with his companions; he has studied diligently for two years; and after two years of prayer, two years of study, two years of testimony, as I said to my folks, speaking of him yesterday, he is sweet and clean, and, excepting perhaps one elder, there is not another that will be missed as he will be missed when the servants of God say: "Honorably released to return home." He has gone into the homes, knowing the truth, testifying of it, living it, exemplifying it every day; and before he comes home I feel certain that the Lord will permit him, even while there, to see the fruits of his labors, for I believe that the man who grasped me by the hand, saying "Take him not away, for he has come to us with a message that has brought more joy into our home than any other message that has been given unto us," will become a member of the Church. What is he waiting for? Because that same brother said: "Not yet; clean, free from tobacco, free from liquor, understanding that the gospel is a gospel for which you shall sacrifice; and then when you accept it, you shall receive the Holy Ghost, which shall lead you into all truth forever." God grant that he may be permitted to see the fruits; God grant that we may exemplify in our lives our testimony of the divinity of this work, henceforth and forever, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

President Heber J. Grant announced that the congregation would sing the hymn, "Though deepening trials throng your way," music of which was written by Elder George Careless, now eighty-seven years of age and present on the stand.

After singing by the congregation, Elder John B. Beckstrand, president of the Millard stake of Zion, offered the closing prayer; and the conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION

President Heber J. Grant presided, and promptly at 2 o'clock opened the meeting by announcing that the choir would sing, "Guide us, O thou great Jehovah."

After the singing by the choir, prayer was offered by Elder Roy A. Welker, president of the Bear Lake stake of Zion.

The congregation sang the hymn, "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire."

ELDER RICHARD R. LYMAN

THE ANCIENT PROPHET'S SPECIFICATION

It is specified by one of the ancient prophets that "In the last days it shall come to pass, that the mountain of the house of the Lord shall be established in the top of the mountains, and it shall be exalted above the hills; and people shall flow unto it. And many nations shall come and say: Come, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths." (Micah 4:1,2)

A FEW EVENTS SHOWING JOSEPH SMITH DIVINELY GUIDED

Let us look at a few events in the history of the Latter-day Saints' Church and see if these satisfy the specifications contained in this ancient prediction.

At the age of fourteen Joseph Smith became seriously interested in matters religious. In accordance with instructions which he found in holy writ, he concluded to "ask of God that giveth to all men liberally and upbraideth not." From that very hour, as we believe, until the early age of thirty-nine when he gave his life as a martyr, Joseph Smith was guided by Divine Providence in the establishment of the Church and the direction of its affairs.

TEMPLE BUILDING

For example, how, without divine guidance, could one so young and with so little chance for education have been wise enough to inaugurate the movement in temple-building that has aroused the interest of so many for so long a time? In less than a hundred years the followers of Joseph Smith have invested millions in nine different, splendid temples. The path these faithful followers have trodden has had temples constructed beside it all along the way.

While the people after leaving New York located temporarily in Ohio, the inspiration of the Prophet seemed to indicate that Zion was to be established somewhere far away in the west. In June, 1831, he sent many of the elders westward on a preaching tour. The questions being asked by him and his associates were: "When will the wilderness be made to blossom as the rose? When and where will Zion be built in her glory, and where will the temple be located, unto which, in the last days, people from all nations are to come?"

IN INDEPENDENCE

The Prophet, Oliver Cowdery and other missionaries, met at Independence, Missouri about the middle of July, 1831. This land seemed so far west that they immediately located the city of Zion, the central gathering place of the Saints. Such was the intensity of the desire to locate a site and build a temple that under the inspiration of the spirit, Independence was chosen for this purpose. The lot then selected and dedicated is a spot on which the L. D. S. people hope, sometime, to erect a sacred building. By this act the people felt as if their Zion had been located and dedicated on the western borderline of civilization.

The twelve hundred Church members in Missouri, in 1833, were being increased rapidly by immigration. By mob violence these twelve hundred were driven from their homes and robbed of their possessions.

While these hardships and cruelties were severe, may not they, viewed in the light of more recent events, have been necessary in order to prepare a people strong enough and far-sighted enough to make the journey of a thousand miles across the desert and climb into the very top of the Rocky Mountains? Nothing less than years of severest training and discipline could prepare a people for such a task.

The temple block in Independence had been dedicated in 1831. In December, 1832, through the Prophet, a direct command was given to "establish a house, even a house of prayer, a house of fasting, a house of faith, a house of learning, a house of glory, a house of order, a house of God." (D. & C. 88:119) The temple-building spirit rested so mightily upon the Prophet that the cornerstones of the temple in Kirtland were laid in July, 1833, and the building was finished and dedicated in March, 1836.

While in this sacred structure there occurred rich outpourings of the spirit and many important heavenly manifestations, this temple was eventually abandoned. It did not satisfy the specifications named by the ancient prophet who clearly said that the temple to be built "in the last days," was to be established in the top of the mountains and was to be exalted above the hills.

IN FAR WEST

Those who are familiar with the history of the Church know that the temple-building spirit has been active in the hearts of this people from the beginning. Among the many sects and churches of today the Latter-day Saints are distinguished as builders of temples.

On the Nation's birthday, in 1838, large numbers of church members participated in a Church celebration at Far West, Missouri, which included the laying of the foundation stones of a temple. Had this structure been completed the number of temples built by the Latter-day Saint people to date would have been ten instead of nine.

IN ILLINOIS

The training and preparation of this people for the work they were to accomplish continued to increase in severity. They were told in unmistakable terms they must leave the state of Missouri. Stripped of the accumulation of years many suffered with the cold and for the necessities of life. They stood facing a mid-winter exodus not knowing where to go. At this trying time the Prophet himself was in prison. Brigham Young, however, with his strong leadership came forward as President of the Council of Twelve and planned and carried into effect the exodus from Missouri to Illinois. On the 1st of May, 1839, it was decided to locate the headquarters of the Church at the town of Commerce in the state of Illinois. A year later this name was changed to Nauvoo.

Soon the construction of dwellings was begun, and in the course of a comparatively short time a hamlet was transformed into a city.

Prisons, mobs, persecutions, hunger and other hardships failed to dampen the temple-building ardor of the members of the Church. At a conference held on the 6th of April, 1841, the cornerstones of the Nauvoo temple were laid. On the 27th of June, 1844, while this structure was in the process of construction, the Prophet Joseph and his brother Hyrum gave their lives as martyrs to the cause which, under divine guidance, they had instituted. Would one not naturally conclude that this peculiar people would lose interest in their peculiar work of building temples with these great leaders slain? But new leaders arose and the work continued going forward as we believe under the direction of Divine Providence. Actual labor was resumed within two weeks after the slaying of the Prophet.

There were indications of persecution on every hand when the capstone of the Nauvoo temple was laid on the 24th of May, 1845. Not until May, 1846, was the building wholly completed and ready for dedication. Nauvoo by this time had a population of twenty thousand. Could anything less than divine inspiration induce these builders to struggle on in the midst of poverty and persecution and thus carry out their ever-increasing desire to construct a temple?

Feeble efforts were made in the fall of 1844 to bring to justice the murderers of the Prophet. In the fall of 1845 encouraged by the acquittal of the slayers of the Prophet, mobs became more and more bold and more and more vicious.

When the people had to decide between exodus and extermination by massacre, they concluded to leave the state. Is it possible that this people still needed a more severe, a more trying training?

Although the exodus of the people had begun, ordinance work in the temple was continued. In a few months after its dedication "the people whose energy and substance, whose sweat and blood had been spent in its rearing, were driven into the wilderness or slain." The temple was in the possession of a mob. Fire and wind finally destroyed it. So complete has been its destruction that literally not one stone is left upon another.

The people had dedicated a temple site in Independence, they had constructed a temple in Kirtland, the foundation of a third had been laid in Far West, and a fourth had been built in Nauvoo. Not one of these, however, satisfied the specifications of the scripture. The temple to be constructed "in the last days" is not to be located on the seashore nor in the valley nor on the bank of a river, but "in the top of the mountains," and it is to be "exalted above the hills."

To these people who were being driven, robbed and persecuted, the following words of the Master gave great satisfaction: "Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven." (Matt. 5:11, 12.)

Perhaps no one can tell why in the wisdom of Providence, these severe experiences were necessary. Now the people, however, were thoroughly prepared. They were ready. They had their faces set like flint toward the west.

THE HISTORIC JOURNEY

While Nauvoo was less than seven years old, it now had twenty thousand inhabitants. These were compelled to leave their homes and journey far beyond the confines of civilization. It was in mid-winter, February 4, 1846, that this multitude began crossing the waters of the Mississippi. Ferries were used until the river was frozen. After that the crossing was made on the ice. With their sick, sleeping in tents and wagons, great hardships were necessarily endured. "There is no parallel in the world's history," says Bancroft, "of this migration from Nauvoo." (Whitney's History of Utah, page 217.)

"The people of Iowa have told me," said Colonel Thomas L. Kane, "that from morning to night they passed westward like an endless procession. They did not seem greatly out of heart, they said; but at the top of every hill, before they disappeared they were to be seen looking back, like banished Moors, on their abandoned homes and far-seen temple and its glittering spires." (See Anderson's Brief History of the Church, page 82.)

On the 14th of January, 1847, President Young announced instructions to guide the Saints in their travels. Early preparations were made to vacate Winter Quarters and depart for their unknown inheritance in the wilderness.

One hundred forty-four men, able bodied, were selected to lead on this westward journey. Because of illness one returned to camp leaving the number of one hundred forty-three with three women and two children. They had seventy-two wagons, ninety-three horses, fifty-two mules, sixty-six oxen, and nineteen cows, besides seventeen dogs and some chickens. (See Anderson's Brief History of the Church, page 90.)

This historic journey was begun April 7, 1847. All of April passed, May also, and still the Pioneers continued their journey onward across the American desert. June went by as did also nearly all of July, and yet they with their oxen and slowly moving teams wended their way westward, climbing the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, higher and higher, and higher, to the very place that answers the specifications prescribed by the Prophet anciently. Who will deny that such a journey made under such conditions was directed by the power of God?

THE TEMPLE IN SALT LAKE CITY

The long and trying trip seems to have increased rather than to have diminished the interest of the people in temple building. From the day the cornerstones were laid for the Salt Lake temple until it was dedicated, forty years elapsed.

The death of the great temple-builder, Brigham Young, occurred when the walls of the Salt Lake temple extended but twenty feet above the surface of the ground. The work so well begun by him was continued during the whole administration of President John Taylor and the intensity of the effort seemed to increase during the administration of his successor, President Wilford Woodruff up to the very hour when it was dedicated, April 6, 1893. The capstone of the mighty structure was laid by him in the presence of a throng that numbered forty-thousand within the confines of the temple block, while other thousands, unable to secure a place inside the walls, stood in the streets or looked from nearby windows and the roofs of adjoining buildings.

THE SPECIFICATIONS OF THE ANCIENT PROPHET FULFILLED

The edifice completed stands on this block. It speaks for itself. It is located in the top of the mountains. It is exalted above the hills and people from all nations have come unto it. Thus the specifications laid down by the prophet of old are satisfied, his prophecy fulfilled.

These are the days, too, in which, as Daniel says, "the God of heaven shall set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed." That kingdom is located here, and in the language of Daniel, "it shall not be left to other people, and it shall endure forever." This is the place, this is the kingdom, and Jesus of Nazareth is the King.

ELDER HUGO D. E. PETERSON

Former President of the Swedish Mission

My brethren and sisters: I feel on this occasion like the young brother did this morning, when called so suddenly and without warning to speak unto you. I appreciate this opportunity that has been given to me to speak a few minutes about the Swedish mission, whence so many thousands of the blood of Israel have been gathered home to Zion. I appreciate the privilege that my brethren gave unto me to perform a mission to my native land, after having been in Zion since my youth. It was the most glorious time that I have ever experienced in my life.

I will say, as President McMurrin said this morning, that we cannot count very many that come into the Church; but the word has to be preached as a warning, that the people may not say they have not been warned when the Lord shall pour out his judgments on them.

The people in Sweden have the spirit of gathering to Zion. While the elders discourage them from coming out here, we cannot stop them from coming. Their desire is to gather with their own people. I have in mind a certain intelligent, well educated young lady, who embraced the gospel less than two years ago. She holds a prominent position in one of the greatest establishments in the city of Stockholm, and is drawing a large salary. She said, "I am going to try to go out to Zion." My wife discouraged her and said, "Do not go, sister. You will probably not get such a position there as you have now, and you might become discouraged." She said: "Never mind what I may get. I will do any honorable work that may be offered me for my support, but I want to go home to Zion, that I may work in the temple of the Lord for my dead relatives." And that is the spirit that the people generally are in possession of in the far north.

I, too, can testify that we have a lot of fine missionaries in that mission, and especially when they get the spirit of the work. They want to labor early and late for this cause. I had frequently to remind one young man who labors in the mission office that, "You cannot do it all today, leave something for tomorrow." I found him at his desk many a night after we had held our public meeting. Another young man who had not learned the language of his father and mother, being born in this city, was sent up into the northern part of Sweden. While laboring in a certain city, a preacher advertised that he would lecture about the "Mormons" in Utah. Our young man had not been in Sweden very many months, and had not yet mastered the language; but he went to the church to hear what the reverend gentleman might have to say. After the meeting he said to the priest, "What you have spoken here tonight is not true. I am from Utah, was born there, and am therefore thoroughly cognizant of the conditions out there. I would like to be given a few minutes to correct what you have said." The gentleman replied, "We will not permit you to speak here in this building." "Very well," said the young man, "I will take the opportunity of speaking to the people on the street outside; I will give them tracts, and invite them to come to our hall, and I will there tell them the truth about Utah." The reverend gentleman evidently got frightened. He published an article in the local paper against us, and tried to belittle the elder who had taken him to task for telling fables about the Utah people and their religion, saying that the elder could not speak the Swedish language fluently. Our young brother wrote to me and said that he would like to answer the preacher's effusion, but, said he, "I am afraid the editor will find out that my written language is faultier than the language I speak." I helped him to write an article for the local paper, and told him he could use it if he saw fit. He took it to the paper, however, and the editor was liberal-minded enough to publish it. Shortly afterwards the minister left the city, and our little hall there was for some time crowded with people who wanted to hear our side. I have learned that where we have opposition it is the best advertisement we can get for our Church, as the people want to find out the other side, and they come to our meetings to investigate for themselves. In that way we have now and then the pleasure of baptizing a number of people.

One thing that has rested on my mind for years is this: It was ninety years ago the day before yesterday that the Lord, also Moses, Elias and Elijah, visited the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery in the Kirtland temple, and gave unto them all the keys that were necessary for establishing his Church and carrying out the work for the salvation of man in this last dispensation. After they had received the keys, these words were spoken to them:

"Behold, the time has fully come, which was spoken of by the mouth of Malachi—testifying that he [Elijah] should be sent, before the great and dreadful day of the Lord come, to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the children to the fathers, lest the whole earth be smitten with a curse. Therefore, the keys of this dispensation are committed into your hands; and by this ye may know that the great and dreadful day of the Lord is near, even at the doors."

The application I wish to make is this, that we are ninety years nearer the culmination of the event spoken of in the revelation, namely: the second coming of the Lord, and that we should warn the people and our children, that all may be prepared to receive him. It behooves us as parents to look after our children, our sons and daughters, that the Lord has given into our care, and to teach them the principles of, and inculcate in their hearts a love for, the gospel. That is a duty resting upon us; and I would say to the young people: Follow in the footsteps of your fathers and mothers, for the world has nothing to give you that can be compared with the joy and satisfaction we feel when we live in accordance with the teachings of the Church; the joy that we have in the knowledge of the truth of the gospel and in the knowledge that we have prophets and apostles in our midst to lead and guide us aright. There is nothing else in the world that can give us that joy.

Sometimes it happens that young people do not watch their actions, and they overstep the bounds of propriety, causing them to feel the pangs of sorrow and regret. My attention was drawn to an instance or two of that kind, and when appealed to, I felt compassion for them, realizing that they have lived in an environment almost the opposite of that in which our youths are reared. On such occasions I have thought how fortunate are my five daughters and four sons, in being born here in a different atmosphere, blessed with faith in the gospel and from their childhood having a chance to walk in the right path. Our mission is to save, and I have felt a happiness beyond my power to express in seeing those who have made a misstep mend their way, making their lives conform to the teachings of the Savior. They have paid their tithing, attended to their meetings and done their duties in the Church; and they have thus felt happy. I am satisfied they will not permit themselves again to be led astray.

The Summer season is before us, brethren and sisters, when we will go to the canyons, the woods, the bathing and other resorts. See to it that our children are warned before they go out. Pray with them. I heard, many years ago, a good brother speak of a man whose son had been called to go on a mission, and how that son had spent the whole night with his father occupied in conversation, the father warning the son against making mistakes, giving him encouragement, that he might be able to perform an honorable mission. I believe we should take our boys in our arms before the time comes when we are to part with them, and warn them of certain things that will confront them when they come to a certain age, that we may come in before our enemies do, who whisper evil into their ears, and that we may warn them of things that may happen to them if they are not careful.

I rejoice in this gospel, my brethren and sisters. I have been reared by honorable parents, and I have thanked the Lord hundreds of times on my knees that he led the elders to their door when I was young, so that I had an opportunity to be trained in the teachings of the gospel; and I wish to continue to do good as long as the Lord gives me strength and permits me to live upon the earth, that I may eventually be saved in the kingdom of the Lord. May that be the blessing to us all, I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

I rejoice, my brethren and sisters, in my membership in this great Church, the Church of Christ. I shall never have the power to express fully my gratitude to the good men who left the valleys of the mountains and came into far distant Scandinavia and brought the gospel to my mother, to me and to mine. The gift of that visit is beyond earthly expression. While Brother Peterson was speaking to us this afternoon, having returned from one of the Scandinavian countries, my heart was filled with gratitude, and with the prayer that the time may never come when we shall lack the courage to go forth among the nations of the earth to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ. Thousands of men and women in the Scandinavian countries are ready and ripened for the greater truth, and I pray, in behalf of the people whose blood runs in my veins, that ways and means may be found continually to do missionary work in those countries until the truly honest in heart may be brought to a testimony of the truth of the gospel.

IMPORTANCE OF THE BODY

I have rejoiced also in the proceedings of this great conference. I was deeply impressed yesterday by the voice of authority with which President Grant spoke to us about a number of important topics. I was happy to hear him mention to the Latter-day Saints the tremendous importance of caring properly for the human body. Man is an eternal spirit inhabiting a body of this earth, a perishable body, which some day we believe will be made imperishable. By means of that body, given by our Father in heaven, we are able to accomplish the great mission known as earth life. Through the body the spirit speaks, and through the body the experiences of earth are made the possession of the spirit. It is well that we give due care and consideration to the welfare of the body, which is the one great characteristic of this epoch in our eternal journey.

A STRONG BODY PERMITS SPIRITUAL STRENGTH

There have been times in the history of the world when the doctrine has been taught that spiritual strength may best be known if the body is weak; and that the weaker the body the stronger may be the spiritual experiences of life. Latter-day Saints have no such belief. We believe that in a strong, healthy body the spirit may do more effectively and efficiently the work which it is called upon to do here upon earth. It is a duty of Latter-day Saints to live well. We all agree to that. But it is important to Latter-day Saints also to live long upon the earth, just as long as the Lord may permit us to live. We take no pride in disease. We take pride only in those things which build us and make us strong both in body and in spirit.

TWO LAWS OF HEALTH

As I have learned to understand the laws that govern our body, it seems that one fundamental law in preserving human bodies is the law of moderation. All things must be done in wisdom. No unnecessary strain must be put upon the body, nor must indolence seize upon us. A second great law for the preservation of bodily health, including the needs of both mind and body, is that all the faculties of man must be given due and proportionate exercise. The mind must be used and the body must be used, neither to excess nor to the exclusion of the other; otherwise, we shall not attain to that fulness of perfection of life on earth which we believe is the right of all Latter-day Saints.

THE WORD OF WISDOM A BINDING LAW

The Lord, as was called to our attention yesterday by President Grant, has given us a series of principles, laws if you choose, specific in their nature, which may be used safely by the Latter-day Saints for the preservation of physical and mental health. I refer to the Word of Wisdom, a great and a marvelous document, given us for our good, itself a witness that in the economy of the Lord the care of the body is very important, not to be neglected or forgotten. I know that many people believe that the Word of Wisdom is not a binding law upon us. To that view, I can only answer that yesterday I heard the prophet of God—I believe and know him to be a prophet of God—say to the Latter-day Saints that it was their duty to obey the Word of Wisdom. That ought to be sufficient for all Latter-day Saints. But, we find that from the very beginning, the Word of Wisdom has been held to be a binding law upon the Latter-day Saints. The Patriarch Hyrum Smith, brother of the Prophet, in a sermon which has been preserved and reproduced a number of times, warned the people of that day, about 1843, against following any elder of the Church who declared that the Word of Wisdom was not binding upon the Latter-day Saints. Brigham Young, the great successor of the Prophet Joseph Smith, upon many occasions urged the Latter-day Saints to obey the Word of Wisdom; and at least on one occasion said definitely that the Spirit had directed him to tell the Latter-day Saints to obey the Word of Wisdom. If I read the revelation on the Word of Wisdom correctly, I find that it says that the Word of Wisdom shows “forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation” of his people. Whatever is the will of God appears to me to be equivalent to a commandment.

THE WARNINGS OF THE WORD OF WISDOM

The Word of Wisdom contains certain very important warnings. It declares that alcohol, tobacco, tea and coffee are not good for the body. The revelation says “hot drinks,” but before the revelation was a year old, “hot drinks” were defined to include tea and coffee. Those who read the revelation intelligently understand that it has reference to all drugs or substances that act upon the human body to produce a constant desire for them. All habit-forming substances are included. Perhaps right here is one reason why we quibble about the meaning of the Word of Wisdom. When a taste is begotten, a habit is established, or when our appetites are concerned, almost every one of us is inclined to quibble just a little so that we may satisfy that appetite. The fact that the Prophet Joseph Smith spoke of alcohol, tobacco, tea, coffee and similar substances as injurious to the body and handicaps in the journey of life, is an evidence of the divine inspiration of the latter-day prophet, for the physiological value of these substances was not known in that early day. Only after the days of the Prophet Joseph Smith did the world of science establish the fact that these substances act injuriously upon the human organism.

WHAT TO EAT

The Lord seldom says "thou shalt not" without declaring also what we shall do. Therefore, the Lord prescribed in this revelation the foods that man may eat safely: meat in moderation, grain, vegetables "in the season thereof," and fruits "in the season thereof." Perhaps, were we more careful to obey the part of the Word of Wisdom that deals with the "do's" it might be easier to obey the "don't's," and thereby be able more easily to conquer our appetites for the forbidden things. The more completely the body is able to function as intended by nature, the better control man has over himself and less desire he has for stimulants and for all things injurious.

MODERN KNOWLEDGE CONFORMS TO THE WORD OF WISDOM

It is probably common knowledge to the Latter-day Saints that during the last fifteen to twenty years, the science of nutrition, the science of eating, has been developed greatly by those who make researches into this branch of knowledge. The old learning has been laid aside; and some very remarkable discoveries have enabled a new science of nutrition to be built up which is becoming very generally understood. That new science of nutrition is built largely upon the doctrine that human beings must use meat in moderation, must use the grains as nature provided them, that vegetables must be eaten freely in the season thereof, which often means as they come from mother earth; that fruits must be eaten in larger abundance than before—all practical applications of the Word of Wisdom, given in 1833, long before the science of nutrition or of physiological chemistry had been developed.

One of the teachers in the summer school of the Utah Agricultural College, during the last two years, was Dr. E. V. McCullom, a leader in this field, who has done outstanding work in the domain of modern nutrition. On the last day of the Summer term, Dr. McCullom devoted a part of his closing lecture to a discussion of the fact that the "Mormon" Word of Wisdom coincided very well, indeed almost perfectly, with the doctrine which he had been elaborating in detail to his students throughout the preceding six weeks. It brought gratitude to my heart, when my children and some of my friends reported that this man bore such a testimony to the authoritative teaching of the Prophet Joseph Smith.

WE SHOULD USE ALL KNOWLEDGE

What we eat is of tremendous importance. We possess not only wisdom of men, but also wisdom from heaven, all of which we should use for our welfare. We should be anxious to secure and use all learning that may yet be developed. It should be our ideal to make and keep our bodies just as perfect as possible; that our lives may be extended as long as possible; so that we may accomplish as much as may be possible during our earth careers.

AN EXAMPLE OF THE IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT FOODS

Last November, when I was in Washington, I had the opportunity to look into the new nutrition of which the Prophet spoke a long time ago. I went to Baltimore and into the laboratory maintained by one of the great foundations in this country. There, those in charge, to show the thorough going effect of food on the body, took two rats, one fed improper food, the other, food conforming to our new knowledge, both classes of foods in common use. The rats were chloroformed before our eyes, and opened, and their bones treated with a stain, placed under the microscope. The bony tissue of the rat which had been fed correctly was normally developed; while the tissue of the rat which had been fed improperly was imperfectly developed and diseased. This is but one of the hundreds of illustrations that might be used to verify the truth of the Word of Wisdom.

CONCLUSION

I have taken the liberty of offering these reflections upon the very authoritative and emphatic teaching of our President yesterday; and to call your attention, not in detail, for this is not a scientific lecture, to the importance of our obeying in detail all of the Word of Wisdom. We must refrain from the things forbidden; but we must also obey the teachings with respect to that which we should do. Already it has become evident that one of the great revelations given to man for his good is the Word of Wisdom, and also that it is one of the great evidences of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph.

May God bless us and be with us. May we fully understand the greatness and the grandeur and the mighty possibilities of the gospel of Jesus Christ, endless in their nature and for our good, I pray in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN S. HANSEN

Former President of the Danish Mission

My brethren and sisters: I feel very weak and embarrassed in standing before you this afternoon; but as I have been called upon to say a few words about the work in Denmark, I will do so.

I stand before you and look over these many faces with a feeling of fear, but also with happiness—fear that I may not be able to talk to you so that you can understand what I say. But when I think of all these many people who are here today and of the same faith that I am, belonging to the same Church, believing the same doctrines that I have been taught and believe in, and have been trying to teach to others, then, a feeling of happiness goes through me; and I ask the Lord to be with me during the few minutes I stand before you that I may be able to give an account of myself.

I came home three weeks ago today from my mission in Denmark, where I have labored three years, and have enjoyed my work. It was my second mission to Denmark. I was there in 1912 to 1914, and as I was twenty years old when I emigrated, and at that time could not speak a word of English, you will understand that I am better able now to speak Danish than English. I hope that you will be able to understand me, although in the last three years I have been preaching and talking mainly in my native tongue.

Denmark is a little country belonging to the Scandinavian group. Its population is a little more than three million people. It is a good country, and the people are a good people, and it is a pleasure to labor among them. We have had a number of good brethren from Zion to help out in our missionary work during the last three years. When I arrived, conditions were different from what they are now. A long period had elapsed in which very few elders from Zion had been laboring in that country, and there were only six elders there when I arrived. Most of the branches were disorganized. When I left, there were twenty-five missionaries in the field doing good work, and the branches were fully organized. Most of the elders that were sent to that country while I was there were young men unable to speak the language, and it took a great deal of work with them to help them learn the language and place them so that they could be of use while learning it. But I must say that the great majority of them have been very diligent and have learned the language quickly, and have been able to do a good work, and we have seen good results from our labors, many having joined the Church during this time. The prospects are good for the future.

I realize that I am speaking to people who represent the Church from the different wards and stakes. The Danish as well as the other missions needs missionaries, men of liberal experience in life, and with the language that they learn there they will be able to do a great work. There are many people in that land who are of the blood of Israel, and I feel sure many will embrace the gospel in the near future. But the gospel must be brought to them, and it must be preached to them in a language and in a way they can understand, because they are surrounded with so many different influences, all trying to work with them and upon them.

Denmark has complete religious liberty. Anyone can advocate or preach anything that he desires to preach. They had there representatives from India preaching Buddhism and other "isms." Spiritualists, Christian Scientists, International Bible Students, Seventh Day Adventists, and all these different sects, are preaching their doctrines, and many people do not know what to believe, and they come to the conclusion that it is better to leave it all alone, "Mormonism" included. And we cannot blame them. The way to teach them is to present the truth in such a way that it will reach their hearts and make an impression upon their souls. In order to do that, we must understand the condition of the people and the teachings they have been taught and have received from different sources.

A number of the sects to which I have referred do not believe in the literal resurrection of Christ. They do not believe in the resurrection of the body, and a literal resurrection is one of our testimonies to the people. We have been trying to confine our remarks to bearing testimony to the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ as it has been revealed to us in these latter days, telling them of the true and living God, a personal God, our Father in heaven, who has a body, and who can show himself, and can talk to us and be with us. Also of his Son Jesus Christ, that he is literally resurrected with the body in which he walked and talked while upon the earth. Sometimes in our meetings, when we have borne testimony to these truths as we understand them, people have come to us and said: "These are things that we used to believe in when we were children, but now we do not know what to think, because our ministers and all these other advocates of religion have confused our minds upon the question as to whether or not man will be literally resurrected."

Ministers of the state church of Denmark have come forward with the teaching that the resurrection of Christ was a spiritual resurrection, and that it was a vision the apostles saw when they met him and talked to him after his resurrection, and also that our resurrection will be a spiritual resurrection. If we understand the people and preach the truth to them, we will find that the truth will appeal to them in many ways, and it will make an impression upon them. We have found that the best way of succeeding and getting access to the hearts of the people is by talking to them from the point of view that they now have, in order that they may understand us better than if we were to talk over their heads. I find that little children understand the teachings of our Church with reference to God much better than the grown people. In our Sunday school classes we can explain to little children the personality of God, and it seems natural to them. The people say to us, "When we were children we believed in such a God. When our fathers and mothers talked to us about God, we pictured him as a personal God, somewhat like our earthly father. It was when we grew older that our views became confused with these different ideas that are now in the world." What we have to do is to bring the people back to the faith of their childhood, for there is not a child but has that impression and that feeling concerning God, and understanding of him when they first hear him spoken of by their parents.

When I went to school in that country I was taught the state religion, but my feelings and understanding of God were of a personal God; and when I was eleven years old and joined the "Mormon" Church, I kept that view and that idea of God, which I think is true. We have been trying to teach these doctrines to the people.

Yesterday was Easter. Today is also a holiday in those old countries, being a day appointed for Church services where they celebrate the resurrection of Christ. It is strange to think that these people will congregate and talk about the great and glorious truth of Christ's having risen from the dead, and not believe that it was a literal resurrection. But when they read the gospel of St. John about Christ coming out of the grave, and the grave being empty, they explain it by saying it was a spiritual resurrection. When we hold our Easter services, we bear witness to the people of the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ; that he arose from the dead; that he did take the body with him out of the grave which was laid in the grave; that he showed himself to his disciples; showed them the marks in his hands and in his feet, and that he said to them, "It is I, myself: handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." We believe also, and have taught it to the people, that all those who shall come forth in the first resurrection shall come forth with the bodies which they received here upon the earth, glorified and free from evil, and free from the results of sin, which, through the gospel of Christ, we will be able to efface. That is why the teachings referred to by Elder Widtsoe are natural to us. They fit this body which we possess and which we have received as a gift from God for our spirit to work with eternally. This body is going to be ours throughout eternity. We must take care of it, because if we do so and use it properly, it will be so much the better for us in the resurrection.

I believe that the people in the world are able to accept the principles of the gospel in a great measure, if they are presented to them in a way that they can understand and grasp. I have found many times, and I hope I will not offend anyone by saying it, that our missionaries are a little too quick to judge people, or judge their capacity to understand, and they judge them from their own point of view, instead of the point of view of the people. If it is the truth that we bring to the people, if it is the gospel of Jesus Christ, and if the Lord intends us to bring it to them, then it is our duty to work diligently in that service, and not to give up because things seem to be difficult, or because people do not seem to understand. Maybe the difficulty is that we do not present it in a way that they can understand it, and if that is the case, then let us try to find a way to reach their hearts and their souls, and present it so they can grasp it and understand it. If we cannot do it one way, possibly we can do it in another. I have never turned away angrily from anybody who could not understand me, or who ridiculed my views. But I have always said, "We will meet again; we will talk it over again; maybe we will be able to get closer together on this point."

It is a mistake, as some have done occasionally, to say to the person who will not understand, or cannot understand, "You are cursed. I have borne my testimony to you and you do not receive it, consequently you are cursed." I have always instructed the missionaries not to do that, and have told them that we are in the world to bless and save the world and not to condemn it. We have been trying to preach and teach salvation and not condemnation, and trying to explain to the people that the gospel is in the world to build up and save the people. In preaching the gospel of salvation, we find that we are greatly blessed and the Lord is with us. Our converts have not been so many in numbers, but we have been able to bring into the Church a number of good, honest souls while I have been in Denmark during the past three years. In addition, we have been able to find and get interested in the work of the Church a number of people who were practically dead; who for years have not been visited by the missionaries, and who had forgotten that they were members of the Church; but who have come back again to the Church and have taken up the work again. They have commenced again to pay their tithing, attend their meetings, and labor in the organizations; and we look upon this as being as great a work as the bringing of new converts into the fold.

My brethren and sisters, I feel that the time is limited, as there are many others of our brethren from whom you wish to hear. But I wish, before I sit down, being the first time I have had the privilege to stand in this place, to bear to you my testimony of the truth of the restored gospel of Jesus Christ. I love it. I have tried to do my duty as far as I have been able to see it, and as far as my business has allowed me to fulfil it. I pray the Lord to be with me in the future, that I may continue in this good work, and that we may all continue to do the Lord's will; and may God help us, is my prayer in the name of Jesus. Amen.

ELDER ALBERT R. PETERSON

Former President of the Norwegian Mission

This is one of the great honors that has been bestowed upon me.

It is the first time in my life that I have occupied this stand, and I feel it a great honor and privilege to bear my testimony to you this afternoon to the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ which has been restored. I am thankful that I have had the privilege of raising a warning voice to the nations, and in the land of Norway, to the people in the far north, declaring unto them that the Lord has restored the gospel in these the latter days.

I was indeed pleased when I heard the President speak regarding the Word of Wisdom, for I found it very necessary when I went into the mission field to preach this glorious principle to the world. It is a great responsibility which rests upon us as teachers and leaders in Israel. As I traveled around in the branches in Norway I saw fathers and mothers with their children smoking cigarettes; and I saw in these children the future fathers and mothers; and I thought, what will be the end if they continue to poison and contaminate their souls with this dreadful weed? I found a condition that made my heart ache! Out of the many honest, true Latter-day Saints, in the mission I found only very few who are keeping the Word of Wisdom. Is it not necessary that we as elders in Israel, when we go into the world, set worthy examples for these boys and girls, honest and true, living in those countries who do not, perhaps, understand the great necessity of keeping the Word of Wisdom as we do? Is it not necessary that we lift the voice of warning to them against that which will eventually destroy them if they continue its use?

I did not see this condition in Norway alone, but also in other European countries that I visited—boys and girls contaminating their souls with these things. And I feel to rejoice, and thank my Father in heaven, that my parents had the courage to join the Church and accept these great principles in Denmark many years ago, and emigrate to this country. As I traveled among my relatives, who have never understood the gospel of Jesus Christ, and saw them, with trembling hands, pouring alcohol into the coffee, I thought then, O how glorious it is that the elders in this day are sent out into the world to teach us the Word of Wisdom, thus to make us better men and women, and make us stronger physically and spiritually, that we may be able to carry the burdens of the day.

I rejoice in the privilege of being a member of this great Church, which has been organized and is costing some of the best blood on earth to establish. We all realize that when the great God of heaven wishes to do anything of importance, it must cost the blood of many good men and women.

When I was set apart as the president of the Norwegian mission, I was told that I was denied a visa to Norway, and I felt very sorry, and also felt it would perhaps be impossible for me to enter that land. When I reached Chicago, I received permission to enter Norway and to remain there for two weeks. When I arrived, I went to the police station where I was to report, and asked for permission to remain, which permission was denied me. I went again the next day with the same result. The officials said they must take the request to higher authority. I was preparing to go the next day, and while putting on my coat and hat, a little girl was in one of the rooms pleading with God that we might be permitted to remain. I felt within my soul that we would not be permitted to remain. She knew where to go. She had confidence in the Lord. She had been taught to pray; and even as the boy prophet went into the woods to pray and had confidence that God would hear and answer his prayer, this little girl also prayed to God. She came to me and said, "Papa, I know we are going to remain, for the Lord has answered my prayer." I thought then, O, if we only had the confidence and the courage of little children! And I thought, too, is it any wonder that the Lord placed before his disciples a little child and said, "Unless ye become as a little child ye cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

It was mentioned here yesterday by President Ivins that we are not considered Christians, that we are heathens, in Norway. That is a fact. They consider us heathens and not as Christians, and I believe that was the only excuse they had whereby they could keep us from entering Norway. It is a free country, free for the Christian religion, but it is not free for those who are not Christians; in their opinion we are not Christians, therefore they have been using an old law, sixty-five years old, to keep us out of Norway. We do not have any persecution from the people on the whole, but we do meet with persecution from those in authority—the government officials and the city officials. One young elder was driven from four cities. He said, "O, I will be glad when I can find a place that I can call home for at least two or three nights." The ministers write articles occasionally in the papers against us, but they do not seem to do us a great deal of harm. I remember that one of the great ministers there said, "I am not going to let down the bars now, and let those swine in here!" It was not long after he made this remark until the Lord saw fit to call him away. Men cannot stop the work of the Lord until he may see fit to stop it himself.

There are many honest souls in Norway who are waiting to hear the gospel. The doors have been practically closed against our missionaries and our elders, and we have had a hard time getting in, but there are a few there now and I want to say to the fathers and mothers of those boys, that your boys who have been sent to Norway are honest, true workers in Israel, clean and pure.

One little item I wish to make mention of is this: Be sure, fathers and mothers that you teach your boys to pray. O how humiliating it was to one young man when he came into the mission field, and I asked him to pray. He said: "I have never uttered a prayer in my life." Who was to blame? Let us teach our children to pray, to live the gospel of Jesus Christ. There is not anything that will bring us such great blessings as living the gospel. It will make us better men and women.

I know the gospel is true. I have felt the nearness of God in far-off Norway, away up in the Narvik branch, the farthest north of any branch in the Church. Nestled in those snow-capped mountains, we find a little branch of honest, true Latter-day Saints who are living the gospel. I am glad that I had the privilege of bearing my testimony and warning them, for it is the only hope of the nations today—that is, the gospel of Jesus Christ. May we know and realize who we are; that we are the chosen people of God; that we have been called and endowed with the holy Priesthood of God; and that we may always stand firm and in holy places, and be ready at all times to go into the world to warn the nations, and to let them know that God has spoken in these the latter days, and that his great work is rolling on. May the Lord help us to be true and firm to these principles, I humbly pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

In speaking yesterday of the missionary work that is being done throughout the world, although I had a note about it on a piece of paper in front of me, I forgot to mention what I consider one of the greatest of all the missions we have, namely, the one on the Temple Block, presided over by Elders Levi Edgar Young, Benjamin Goddard, and Axel A. Madsen, aided by a number of faithful workers.

The work which they are doing in allaying prejudice and in making the acquaintance of influential people, I feel is among the very finest missionary labors performed in any of our missions.

The congregation sang, "Lord, dismiss us with thy blessing."

Prayer was offered by Elder George S. Romney, president of the Fremont stake.

The conference adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m., April 6.

In the evening there was a general priesthood meeting, which was the largest priesthood assembly ever held in the Church, there being 3,207 people present. The ground floor was comfortably filled and there were many in the galleries, opened for the first time at a priesthood meeting.

THIRD DAY

MORNING SESSION

On Tuesday morning at 10 o'clock, April 6, 1926, with President Heber J. Grant presiding, the conference continued in the great Tabernacle.

The choir and congregation sang, "Come let us anew our journey pursue."

Prayer was offered by Elder Milton H. Welling, president of the Bear River stake.

The choir and congregation sang, "Jesus once of humble birth."

ELDER JOHN WELLS

Of the Presiding Bishopric

The last congregational hymn that we sang brought to my mind great events in the life of our Redeemer and events dealing with the last week of his ministry when, after having partaken of the usual passover feast and before his departure for the Garden of Gethsemane, he instituted the Sacrament, which we call the Lord's Supper. "Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body." (Matthew 26:26.) And after each disciple had partaken of this bread, "He took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; For this is my blood." (Matthew 26:27, 28.) And he told them that as often as they should meet together they should do this in remembrance of him. Our Savior left no Church ritual, nor did he outline in detail the proceedings that his followers should adopt for their meetings. He gave them no sermon and no form of worship distinctive from that which they had been accustomed to in the synagogues; but he did leave that one definite thought: that as often as they should meet together they should partake of the bread and wine in remembrance of his body and blood and of his death and sufferings, and this they should do until he should come again.

I wonder why it is that, with such definite instructions from our Lord and Master the day before he was crucified, these words have not so sunk into the hearts of Latter-day Saints that they should feel afraid to neglect the Sacramental service. I believe it is one of the most solemn occasions in the Church, the time when a Latter-day Saint sits in silence in a place of worship and partakes of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

It has been my privilege to visit several of the stakes of Zion recently and to see the marvelous development of the Priesthood work of the Church. I have listened to powerful testimonies of men and women concerning the authority of the holy Priesthood and the gifts and blessings that have come to those who hold it, through obedience to the gospel. I have listened to some wonderful singing by quorums of the Priesthood and other organizations—young men and boys. It has made me happy because I believe that in song we may worship the Lord, for he has said that the song of the righteous is a prayer unto him, and he will answer with blessings upon our heads.

In one stake of Zion the presidency of the stake announced that they had decided to call upon every active and useful member holding the Melchizedek Priesthood to aid the bishoprics; each one of these persons to have assigned to him some neglectful or indifferent boy, over whom he will watch and teach the gospel and try to implant in his heart the love of the work of the Lord and a deeper appreciation for the blessings and opportunities that come to him. And he will be taken care of by this older and more experienced man until the boy can practically walk alone.

What a wonderful possibility this thought opens to our minds. Take into consideration those who hold presiding positions in the stake alone and consider the bishoprics alone. If each of these brethren would take upon himself to be a brother's keeper to one of these indifferent boys for a year and see that these boys are trained and directed in the right manner, think of the good that would result. There are in the stakes of Zion 282 brethren holding the office of presidency; there are 94 stake clerks; there are 1,400 high councilors and alternates; 200 patriarchs; in the neighborhood of 1,500 holding offices as presidencies of councils of seventies; 500 quorums of elders, each quorum presided over by three men, making 1,500 men; then there are nearly 3,000 bishops and counselors. If each of these brethren made it his duty to take charge of one wayward or neglectful boy, thousands of young men would be on the road to improved conditions and would be diverted from paths of waywardness and neglect to a better understanding and appreciation of the gospel.

Tithing matters have been touched by our President, and incidentally by two or three other speakers. We have recently had a tithing settlement, and the tithes of the Church have materially increased. Crops in most districts have been bountiful, and some of our brethren have been blessed with larger incomes, as a result of the high prices obtaining for certain products. The Lord has blessed this land, and he has done so because it is occupied by his people. As we pay our tithes and offerings gladly and willingly, as a part of our service to the Lord, so will he bless this land. What was once a barren waste is now a marvel to those who travel through this country.

No doubt, during this tithing settlement that has recently passed, many of our brethren and sisters went happily and gladly to their bishoprics, who are common judges in Israel, and were pleased to tell these good men that they had fully observed the law of tithing. Every person is happy when he fulfils the law of the gospel. Others, no doubt, went to the tithing settlement feeling more or less conscience-stricken, and made resolves for the future, that they would more diligently observe this important law and would try to pay their tithes and offerings in the season thereof.

I appeal to my brethren and sisters not to leave the settlement of their tithing until the end of the year. I firmly believe in the idea of paying tithing each month. Every Latter-day Saint who earns something, whether he be old or young, rich or poor, should sit down with his conscience on or about the last day of the month and find out what the Lord has given him, and tithe it there and then. So many of our people get into the habit of leaving the payment of tithing until the end of the year, feeling that the next month they will be better off. The end of the year creeps along, settlement comes, and then instead of seeing how much we owe the Lord and paying it gladly, there is a tendency to see how little we can get off with and ease our consciences.

Tithing is a fundamental principle of the gospel of Jesus Christ. To those who observe it fully there comes a deeper love of the gospel. It is just as essential to our growth and development in this Church as are repentance, baptism, or any other fundamental laws. It will develop in men and women a deeper devotion to the truth and greater willingness to serve their fellowmen; and, above all, it will increase their testimony of the gospel.

I picked up an old Journal of Discourses a few days ago. It was forty years old. I opened it casually and found there a very fine discourse given in Provo, in 1855, by Brother Franklin D. Richards, in which he urged obedience to the principle of tithing. He said: "In the receipt which the Prophet Joseph Smith gave to me in Nauvoo, signed by himself and the tithing clerk, he stated that having paid my tithing in full to date, I was entitled to the benefits of the baptismal font, which had just been dedicated in the basement of the temple." So, evidently in those days it was understood that those who paid their tithing in full had the privilege of the House of the Lord. Twenty years later President Joseph F. Smith, from this very pulpit, spoke these words:

"By the principle of tithing the loyalty of the people of this Church shall be put to the test. By this principle it shall be known who is for the kingdom of God and who is against it. By this principle it shall be seen whose hearts are set on doing the will of God and keeping his commandments, thereby sanctifying the land of Zion unto God; and who are opposed to this principle and have cut themselves off from the blessings of Zion. There is a great deal of importance connected with this principle, for by it it shall be known whether we are faithful or unfaithful. In this respect it is as essential as faith in God, as repentance of sin, as baptism for the remission of sin, or as the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost."

After all, we are creatures of habits. The habits formed in our childhood stay with us throughout life. Every boy and girl, for this reason, should be taught the principle of tithing and should be urged to tithe all that comes to them, and fathers and mothers should see that their children have something to tithe. At one time I was out with Elder Stephen L. Richards, at a stake conference, and he expressed the thought that every member of the Church should see if the Lord has given him something, and if so, should tithe it in the month in which it was received. He recommended that fathers and mothers encourage boys and girls to tithe even their spending money, not because it has not already been tithed, but to develop the habit of paying tithes and offerings as children, so that when these children become grown the habit will have been formed.

I am glad that I am a Latter-day Saint, thankful to my heavenly Father that I heard the gospel, thankful to be associated with my brethren and sisters in the work of the Lord. I have been blessed with a testimony that this is God's work; that it is the power of God unto salvation; that the holy Priesthood is the agency by which he operates in this Church through those who have received the gospel; and I pray that the Spirit of the Lord and the blessings of the gospel may be upon all of us, which I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER CHARLES S. HYDE

Recently returned President of the Netherlands Mission

I am not entirely surprised, my brethren and sisters, at being called to this position, as a number of other returned mission presidents have already spoken. But notwithstanding the sense of responsibility which I feel in speaking here this morning, I am very pleased to be able to report to you the labors which have been performed in the Netherlands mission, and to tell you something of that wonderful little country.

The country of Holland is about one fifth the size of the state of Utah, according to area, and has a population of between seven and a half and eight millions of people. The Church membership in Holland at the end of 1925 was 3270 souls. There were 63 missionaries laboring in that land at the end of the year, in four conferences and 18 organized branches. During the year they performed a most remarkable work, and while we had only 93 baptisms, they distributed more than 400,000 tracts, held 31,000 gospel conversations, and visited the homes of 6,513 people on re-visits. While this may not be a very large number compared with other missions, I feel that it is a remarkable work to be accomplished under the conditions which prevail in that land. I am very happy to report that the elders are united; that they sense the responsibility of missionary service, and are seeking to bear witness of the divinity of this latter-day work whenever occasion presents itself.

I believe some of the best times I have spent in my life have been in the missionary service, and especially on occasions where ordinances of the gospel have been performed. It has been my privilege to attend some very remarkable baptismal services, not only in Holland but in Belgium, which at one time was a part of the Netherlands mission; also in Switzerland, where I had the pleasure of attending conferences. I remember a very impressive baptismal service which was held in Lake Geneva during one of the sessions of the Lausanne conference, where a number of people were baptized in the lake upon a beautiful Sabbath morning, to begin the sessions of that wonderful conference. But I believe the most remarkable baptismal service that I have yet been privileged to attend was one held in the month of February, 1924, in the city of Liege, at the time of the official organization of the French mission. There were a number of candidates prepared for baptism and the service was scheduled to be held at ten o'clock on Sunday morning. It was a wintry day and snowing, cold and uninviting, and as we went to the baptismal place in the river I felt in my heart that it was a most uninviting day. Among others who were present were the elders of that conference, visiting brethren, myself, and the newly appointed president of the Netherlands mission, also President David O. McKay. As the elder who was to baptize descended into the water with his candidate, in the heavens a ray of light shone through, the clouds separated, it ceased snowing, and there just upon the spot where the elder stood with his candidate, a ray of light descended and shone upon those who were in the water, and remained there until all the candidates were baptized, and as the last person went up out of the water, that ray of light disappeared, and it began to snow again. To me it was a most remarkable manifestation of the divine approval of God upon that wonderful ceremony of baptism which was being performed by his authorized servants in the river. My heart was thrilled as I felt that God was smiling his approval upon that which was being done, and sanctifying to the people the ordinance which they were taking upon themselves, to keep his commandments and to walk in his ways.

The elders who are laboring in that mission have received of the Spirit. They are united, and they are seeking to do that which is required of them. If I had received no other witness throughout my missionary work than the attitude of the elders, it would have been a remarkable manifestation. The fact that these young men are cleansed and purified, sanctified to the work of the Lord, is a most remarkable thing. I have had them come into my office with their disappointments in seeking to learn that language and to accustom themselves to the habits of the people, and they have poured out their souls to me in tears, expressing their feeling of inability to do the work which they had been called to do, of their unpreparedness, being disappointed in that they had not fulfilled every responsibility at home which they had been privileged to do had they been so inclined. But after speaking with them, and praying with them, and counseling them, they felt to go onward and receive the spirit of the work.

Just before leaving to come home one of our new elders came into the office, and in tears poured out to me his soul; told me of his life and all that he had done, and his desire to do right, but with the feeling of inability to do everything that missionary work imposed upon him. After counseling with him and having prayers with him in my office, he went out feeling encouraged, and the day I left I received a letter from him, and at the top of it he had written these words: "There is sunshine in my soul today." That spirit is the spirit which characterizes their work—sunshine in the soul, and a desire to preach repentance and to bear witness of the divinity of this gospel. We have sought to impress them with the fact that the Lord has made wonderful promises to his servants in the missionary field, that he would be with them and go before them, and prepare the way, that they might be able to accomplish that work.

I desire to call attention to his promise as made known in the 84th section of the Doctrine and Covenants, and we have relied upon this promise, and have seen the truthfulness of it. We have realized that the Lord really brings to pass his promises to those who seek to obey him. In speaking to the missionaries who had returned from the Eastern States in the year 1832, he made known these words:

"Behold, I send you out to reprove the world of all their unrighteous deeds, and to teach them of a judgment which is to come.

"And who receiveth you, there I will be also, for I will go before your face. I will be on your right hand and on your left, and my Spirit shall be in your hearts, and mine angels round about you, to bear you up.

"Whoso receiveth you receiveth me; and the same will feed you and clothe you, and give you money.

"And he who feeds you, or clothes you, or gives you money, shall in nowise lose his reward.

"And he that doeth not these things is not my disciple; by this ye may know my disciples."

We have tested this word and found it to be true, for we have found in that land disciples of the Lord Jesus Christ, men and women who have been and are willing to feed the elders and to clothe them and to give them money, and rejoice in this opportunity. In all of the organized branches of the Church in that mission where members of the Church reside the elders are fed, and in many instances clothed and given money by members of the Church; and last year, by practicing economy, we were able to reduce the average expense per missionary in the mission from $32.00 to $27.17; with this added testimony that the elders who expended the least amount of money in the missionary services were doing the best work and producing the most results, for they were relying upon the Saints, partaking of their hospitality, leaving their blessings, and the Saints were in nowise losing their reward. And we were able to determine the disciples of Christ from those who were not his disciples. Truly the Lord is going before his servants, is on their right hand and on their left hand, and is bearing them up, and his angels are round about them, and they are enjoying an influence that will sanctify their souls, if they continue faithful in the work.

I believe I realize to a certain extent the feeling experienced by some of the Seventies in the time of Christ when they returned from their missions, and with joy reported that even the evil spirits had been subjected unto them by the name of Christ. I have also had a similar experience, when even the evil spirits have been subject unto us through the name of Christ. We had one in the mission field afflicted with an evil spirit, and his body tormented and tortured by the possession of that evil spirit. I came into the room upon one occasion, and the evil spirit sprang upon me and seized me by the throat with a grip of iron, shutting off even my ability to speak and almost to breathe, while the elders stood round about, also my wife with a feeling of fear in her heart that the evil spirit would overcome me. He shouted with a voice that was most terrific. He declared himself to be the devil. "My name is Satan," he declared, "and I have more authority than you." And again tightening his grip upon my throat he declared, "I have more authority than you." I could not speak, but I looked the person in the eye, and releasing his grip and falling upon the bed, that same voice declared, "No, I have not more authority," and he hid his face in the pillow and was subject to the power of the Priesthood. Elder Kooyman, who was conference president, anointed him with oil, and with other elders I laid my hands upon him, and I began to confirm the anointing with oil. When I reached the point in prayer, that "in the name of Jesus Christ," I was going to say, "we rebuke the spirit," he sprang from the bed, and pleaded: "Do not use that name, do not use that name." We placed him upon the bed, and in the name of Jesus Christ I rebuked that spirit and commanded it to depart from him, and the person who was afflicted fell limp upon the bed and slept for hours, the first peaceful sleep he had enjoyed for several days. One of the greatest witnesses that have come into my life was upon this occasion.

I had been taught by my father and mother that there is power in the Priesthood. I had been taught it in the Sunday school and in the elders' quorum. I doubted it not, I felt that there was power in that Priesthood, but this was the first occasion which had come into my life where I had seen evil spirits subject to that power without even a word being spoken. I realize that those who are set apart and ordained to preside have authority to administer in the ordinances of the gospel and have power over unclean spirits.

I might go on and relate to you many wonderful experiences, but the time will not permit. I rejoice, my brethren and sisters, that the opportunity came into my life, to enjoy the wonderful spirit of missionary work, to associate with the cleanest, most wholesome young men that can be found in the world anywhere, whose lives are clean, and whose habits are an example unto all the world, seeking to bring unto them the power whereby they may be saved. I thank the Lord for this Priesthood, the power whereby we may sanctify our lives unto the renewing of our bodies, and by enduring in faithfulness become the sons of Aaron and Moses, sons of the seed of Abraham and the Church of God, and of the elect of the kingdom. That we might sanctify ourselves by this Priesthood and continue faithful and enjoy the Spirit of the Lord as long as we shall live, is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER DAVID A. SMITH

Of the Presiding Bishopric

I rejoice, my brethren and sisters, in the fellowship with you and for this privilege of meeting with you in conference, to be fed spiritually, for I have been fed and I rejoice in this fact.

I have a testimony that God lives; he has been good to me and I have found him to be patient, kind and loving, and I sincerely pray that while I address you this morning he will bless me with the same spirit that has been present in our conference thus far.

Many of our speakers have referred to the good work being accomplished by those who are sent into the mission field and to the wonderful growth and development of young men who are called to this service. It is a fact that the spiritual growth of our young men who go into the mission field is very rapid after they reach their field of labor, and we often refer to this development as a witness of the mercy and goodness of the Lord to those who serve him in faith. I have been wondering if, because of this fact, we neglect to a large degree our opportunities for development at home, looking forward to even a greater service than could be rendered in the mission field with proper preparation beforehand.

For the last year it has been my good fortune and pleasure to labor with many young men who have been preparing to leave for the mission field. Occasionally this question is asked: Why did the Lord keep Joseph Smith waiting for seven years after giving him the first vision? And from the discussion of this question, I have wondered if many of us have not had this same thought in our minds. Let me refresh your minds by briefly calling your attention to the fact that after Joseph Smith went into the woods to pray and after he had received the wonderful manifestation—the appearance of the Father and the Son, at which time he was commanded not to join any church, but to return to his home and in due time information would be given to him—he waited three years, which seems to have been a time in which he was tried and ridiculed and tempted, but overcame all temptations, his faith in the Lord and determination to serve him increasing. When he had been sufficiently tried and had shown by his faith and his works a desire to carry out the instructions given him and to seek for greater light and knowledge, the Angel Moroni appeared to him, and for four years he was schooled under the direction of this heavenly personage; and finally the plates containing the record of the ancient inhabitants of the American continent were given to him and, little by little, translated, requiring much patience, study and effort upon the part of Joseph Smith.

If we stop to reflect upon this incident and many others that could be called to our attention, we will see how God calls men to positions of great responsibility and provides for their preparation for such service. "Many are called but few are chosen." Is it not possible that many blessings are withheld from us because of our failure to earn those blessings through our faith and our works. In this day opportunity is given to us to prepare in our youth for the service of the Lord, and not only is the opportunity given, but we are commanded to prepare through the organizations provided for us, and known as the priesthood quorums. Isaiah tells us in the following passage when we are to begin to gain knowledge:

"Whom shall he teach knowledge? and whom shall he make to understand doctrine? them that are weaned from the milk, and drawn from the breasts.

"For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little." (Isaiah 28:9, 10.)

We also read in Deuteronomy 32:1-4 the following:

"Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak; and hear, O earth, the words of my mouth.

"My doctrine shall drop as the rain, my speech shall distill as the dew, as the small rain upon the tender herb, and as the showers upon the grass:

"Because I will publish the name of the Lord: ascribe ye greatness unto our God.

"He is the Rock, his work is perfect: for all his ways are judgment: a God of truth and without iniquity, just and right he is."

I am wondering if some of us have overlooked this fact. Occasionally we hear expressions from members of the Church that would lead us to believe that we cannot expect young men to get the spirit of missionary work at home. Is this a real condition or an imaginary one? When we meet together to worship, we partake of the same spirit and manifestations that are found in the mission field, and many times to a greater degree. If we will study the matter we will find that this spirit and these manifestations come mainly to those who are serving in faith and who, through their labors, are entitled to these blessings.

If our young men were given greater opportunity to give expression to their thoughts, and were taught to respond to the requirements of the priesthood and the responsibilities placed upon them in the quorums of the Aaronic Priesthood, and to perform the labors required of them in these organizations, laboring at all times in faith and for a purpose under the direction, encouragement and good-will of their parents, their brothers and sisters, and associates, they would, in my opinion, go into the mission field with the same spirit that is developed so soon after they arrive in the field.

What is responsible for this rapid growth and development in the mission field? It is the responsibility which is placed upon them; it is the work required of them. They leave their homes for the mission field with a testimony of the gospel, but that testimony is not developed. They have looked forward for years to an opportunity to serve in the mission field, but as a rule have not been given opportunity to give expression to their thoughts or to discuss the knowledge they have received concerning the gospel of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; but when they reach their fields of labor they humble themselves before the Lord and seek the Lord in prayer, just as Joseph Smith sought him. They are touched by the influence of the holy Spirit and they respond to this power and influence.

Now, what justification have we to feel that it is necessary for these young men to go into the mission field before they can develop this attitude toward the things pertaining to the gospel? There are many schools in which we may learn. Some are schools which look to the holy Spirit for light. Under this influence the spiritual growth is much more rapid than otherwise. We have an example of this in the life of Moses. We all know the story of his childhood, how he was taken to the home of Pharaoh, where he grew to manhood, learning from his mother, who was employed as a nurse to care for him, of the teachings of her people concerning God and the hereafter. Moses was far removed from the spirit and influence which comes through these teachings when in the midst of those who partake of this same influence. He learned of the teachings of the world from the masters of Egypt, who, while they had great learning, were not actuated by that influence which comes from above. So, while Moses had faith in God and the teachings of his mother, he had evidently not learned of the great power and could not appreciate fully the promises of the Lord to his children. An example of this is shown in the third and fourth chapters of Exodus.

Moses seemed curious when he saw the burning bush and he stopped to determine why the bush could burn and yet not be consumed; and God called him and told him of the afflictions of his people, saying:

"Now therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me: and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them.

"Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt." (Exodus 3:9, 10.)

Had Moses been trained under the proper influences, this no doubt would have been commandment enough for him, but listen to his reply: "Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt?" Even with the promise from the Lord to be with him, Moses questioned the power of God to give him strength to accomplish God's purposes. Even after several miracles had been performed by Moses as a sign to him of the power of God, he found excuses for not carrying out the Lord's instructions, and finally Moses said unto the Lord:

"O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant: but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue.

"And the Lord said unto him, Who hath made man's mouth? or who maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind? have not I the Lord?

"Now therefore go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say.

"And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send.

"And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses, and he said, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee: and when he seeth thee, he will be glad in his heart." (Exodus 4:10-14.)

Is it not possible that blessings were withheld from Moses and given to Aaron, blessings which Moses could have enjoyed had he obeyed the commandments of the Lord in faith?

In the life of Enoch we have another striking example of how the Lord provides a means for the establishment of his work and the preparation of his servants for service in that great work. We are told that in the days of Enoch there was great wickedness upon the earth. In Moses 6:27, 31 and 32 we read the following:

"And he heard a voice from heaven, saying: Enoch, my son, prophesy unto this people, and say unto them—Repent, for thus saith the Lord: I am angry with this people, and my fierce anger is kindled against them; for their hearts have waxed hard, and their ears are dull of hearing, and their eyes cannot see afar off; * * * *

"And when Enoch had heard these words, he bowed himself to the earth, before the Lord, and spake before the Lord, saying: Why is it that I have found favor in thy sight, and am but a lad, and all the people hate me; for I am slow of speech; wherefore am I thy servant?

"And the Lord said unto Enoch: Go forth and do as I have commanded thee, and no man shall pierce thee. Open thy mouth, and it shall be filled, and I will give thee utterance, for all flesh is in my hands, and I will do as seemeth me good."

Unlike Moses, Enoch did not question the Lord, but he acknowledged his own weakness and his lack of preparation and was willing to be guided by the Lord and prepared for the service required of him. We find that Enoch did not commence his preaching immediately, but was taken into the mountain where the Lord taught him, where he learned precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little and there a little, finally returning to his people, where he converted a city, and the city was not, for the Lord took it unto himself.

Now, my brethren and sisters, I mention these incidents because it seems to me that there is something lacking, either in our belief, in our training, or in our faith, when we say that young men cannot be prepared at home in the Church for service they render so well under the guiding influence of our heavenly Father in the mission field. How much better they could and would serve while in the mission field if they were thoroughly prepared before leaving. It is so easy to pass the responsibility to someone else, but it requires a real effort to face the responsibility placed upon one when he receives the Priesthood and to perform the labors required of those who are called to such positions, who should labor in faith and humility, knowing and realizing that all things are possible to those who serve the Lord in faith, with a desire to accomplish that which is required by him. Let us keep in mind the words contained in John 15:1-5:

"I am the true vine, and my Father is the husbandman.

"Every branch in me that beareth not fruit he taketh away; and every branch that beareth fruit, he purgeth it, that it may bring forth more fruit.

"Now ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you.

"Abide in me, and I in you. As the branch cannot bear fruit of itself, except it abide in the vine; no more can ye, except ye abide in me.

"I am the vine, ye are the branches: He that abideth in me, and I in him, the same bringeth forth much fruit: for without me ye can do nothing."

How many of us belong to that branch which beareth good fruit? How many of us are in danger of being cut off because of our inactivity, because of our failure to take advantage of every opportunity that comes to us for service in this great work?

May we be numbered among the branches that bear fruit; may God purge us that we may bring forth more fruit; may we always abide in him and may his words abide in us, that we may eventually be glorified with that glory which he has promised to those who are faithful in all things. May God help us to see the way; may we be guided by his Spirit that we may go forward and accomplish that which is required of us, doing it in faith and humility, is my prayer, which I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A sacred solo, "Light of the world," was sung by Cyril Martin.

ELDER CHARLES H. HART

Of the First Council of Seventy

The Apostle Paul, in the opening words of his epistle to the Hebrews, testified as follows:

"God, who in sundry times and in divers manners spake in times past to the fathers by the prophets, hath in these last days spoken unto us by his Son."

And so we testify that in this generation the same God has spoken through his Son, and through the prophets unto us. Just as it was necessary to supplement the revelations of the Old Testament by the revelations of the New Testament, to which the Apostle Paul testifies, so was it necessary to supplement the revelations of both the Old Testament and the New Testament by the revelations to us in our generation.

The history of this American volume of scripture, this modern volume of scripture, known to us as the Doctrine and Covenants, shows that the Prophet Joseph Smith and also his associates placed a high valuation upon the message, upon the doctrines given to us. Soon after the organization of the Church, indeed about three months afterwards, Joseph was concerned in getting the revelations together for the purpose of publication. In November, 1831, a conference was called at Hiram, Ohio, for the purpose of having these revelations sent down to Missouri and published at the printing office of the Church, then established at Independence, Missouri. On the afternoon of that day, November 1, 1831, there was given to the Prophet Joseph the revelation now embodied as the first section of the Doctrine and Covenants, known as the preface. It is so designated in the revelation. This revelation alone is very strong corroborative proof of the divinity of the work through the Prophet Joseph.

Elder Whitney spoke of the Book of Mormon as being one of the strongest corroborative evidences of the divinity of the Master. And so as to the Doctrine and Covenants we may say that it is a very strong book of corroborative testimony in support of the divinity of this latter-day work.

Dr. Eliot, the president emeritus of Harvard, has given us a volume of prefaces of the notable books of the world. Volume 39 of this five-and-one-half-foot library, as it is sometimes called, is a volume devoted entirely to prefaces—prefaces that are deemed worthy to live after the books themselves to which they are prefaces in some instances have lapsed into obsolescence. After considering the preface to the Doctrine and Covenants in the light of the literary standards of the world as to what a preface should be, and after comparing it with the outstanding prefaces of the books of all time, I discover it to be a very remarkable document. I have read it over scores of times, and the oftener I read it the more powerful and beautiful does the language seem to me. I am persuaded that the testimony in support of so-called "Mormonism" is not dependent upon any one single bit of evidence, but upon the cumulative effect of all the corroborative evidence we have in support of this divine latter-day cause.

The brethren having in charge the bringing forth of the Doctrine and Covenants safeguarded it very carefully. It was not sufficient for Oliver Cowdery alone to take the manuscript from Ohio to Missouri, but by revelation a companion was designated as his assistant in carrying that message. Ex-Governor Harding, of Utah, a Palmyra boy, in an affidavit furnished for an anti-"Mormon" publication in the 50's gives us a very beautiful picture, to my mind, of the way Joseph and his associates safeguarded the precious manuscript of the Book of Mormon. He testifies that he saw Joseph, Oliver and Martin walking through the woods each day in the morning, with a "take," as the printer calls it, of manuscript to be delivered to Mr. Grandin, the printer of Palmyra, sufficient copy for the day; and the same three men again in the evening walking through the woods to receive back the precious manuscript which the printers during the day had placed in type.

Some of the brethren felt that it was not such a very difficult thing to produce one of these revelations. They saw these revelations and realized that they were coming through the Prophet Joseph more or less in his language, and yet with wisdom above that of man, and a notion prevailed with some that it was not a very difficult thing to produce such revelations. Then the test was given of the Lord, just as surely a test, although not so spectacular, as Elijah's contest with the priests of Baal. This is the language of the Lord in making that test:

"And now I, the Lord, give unto you a testimony of the truth of these commandments which are lying before you. Your eyes have been upon my servant, Joseph Smith, Jr., and his language you have known, and his imperfections you have known; and you have sought in your hearts knowledge that you might express beyond his language; this you also know.

"Now, seek ye out of the Book of Commandments, even the least that is among them, and appoint him that is the most wise among you;

"Or, if there be any among you that shall make one like unto it, then ye are justified in saying that ye do not know that they are true;

"But if ye cannot make one like unto it, ye are under condemnation if ye do not bear record that they are true.

"For ye know that there is no unrighteousness in them, and that which is righteous cometh down from above, from the Father of lights." (Doc. and Cov. 67:4-9.)

And there was one wise man—Church history suggests that he was very wise in his own estimation—Brother McLellan, who was really foolish enough to undertake to produce something that would read somewhat like one of these revelations, and added to his knowledge the folly of attempting the impossible. Just as the great John Marshall, justly estimated the greatest jurist that the United States has ever had, failed upon a challenge by his preacher, to produce a parable comparable to one of the parables of our Lord and Master.

There were many testimonies given in support of the divinity of the revelations. The first book published was known as the Book of Commandments, afterwards changed to its present title. The Presidency in the proposed issuance of that volume, testified thus:

"We do not present this little volume with any other expectation than that we are to be called to answer to everything advanced, in that day when the secrets of all hearts will be revealed and the reward of every man's labor given unto him."

Later the great body of the priesthood divided into departments, each with a spokesman, and strongly testified to the divinity of that book of revelations and to Joseph as a prophet. The following testimony was prepared and presented at a conference, November, 1831, it being intended to have it signed and printed in the Book of Commandments:

"The testimony of the witnesses to the Book of the Lord's Commandments, which commandments he gave to his Church through Joseph Smith, Jr., who was appointed by the voice of the Church for this purpose: We therefore feel willing to bear testimony to all the world of mankind, to every creature upon the face of all the earth, and upon the islands of the sea, that the Lord has borne record to our souls, through the Holy Ghost shed forth upon us, that these commandments were given by the inspiration of God and are profitable for all men, and are verily true. We give this testimony unto the world, the Lord being our helper; and it is through the grace of God the Father and his Son, Jesus Christ, that we are permitted to have this privilege of bearing this testimony unto the world, in which we rejoice exceedingly, praying the Lord always that the children of men may be profited thereby." (History of the Church, Vol. I, page 226.)

This testimony to the truth of the Book of Commandments was concurred in by the leaders and other elders present at the conference where it was presented. It may have been signed also. It was carried to Missouri, but owing to the fact that the printing press was destroyed by a mob before the Book of Commandments was all printed, the testimony does not appear in the part of it that was printed; but it was concurred in by all the leading brethren present at the conference, among them being Joseph Smith, Jr., Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer, John Whitmer, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Sidney Rigdon, William E. McLellan, Orson Hyde, Luke Johnson, Lyman E. Johnson, and others. (See History of the Church, Vol. 1, page 222 and 226.)

As we look for individual items of testimony, having as I say this cumulative effect of making a case beyond all controversy to those who are willing to listen to the truth, we have such evidence as was referred to by President Grant in his opening speech—the testimony of the great premier of England, Gladstone, a man disinterested and certainly competent to give that testimony. And the testimonies continue up to this time in support of the revelation to Joseph contained in section 101, Doctrine and Covenants, verse 80, to the effect that the constitution of this land was established by wise men raised up unto this very purpose—not only the view the great Gladstone had, but modern lawyers in convention assembled express similar views in reference to the inspiration of this great work. Honorable Michael J. Doyle, in the convention of the Commercial Law League of America, held July 13th, 1925, said:

“It is not to be expected that any product of mere human brain can escape all criticism or will be an absolutely perfect document. But so far as human genius could reach, the testimony of the intervening years has established that never before in the history of man’s endeavor to uplift man has there been presented to civilization or to humanity a document so inspiring of the rights of posterity and the rights of freedom, as the document which followed the Declaration of Independence on that hot Fourth of July, 1776. I agree with the many writers on the subject who say that we have much reason to believe that the brain of these men, sitting there in that solemn assembly, was touched by a divine spark when they gave to the world and to posterity that marvelous document.”

A federal judge who sometimes sits in our own city, Judge Page Morris, had this to say with reference to the Constitution not long ago:

“The Constitution of the United States is the greatest document the world has ever known, and if it is not divinely inspired it is nearer to it than any other human document I know of.”

The very manner of giving these revelations indicates that Joseph had divine assistance. Parley P. Pratt testified to the giving of these revelations, but time does not permit to read his testimony, but it was in substance to the effect that there was no interlining, no reviewing, no reading back, no corrections, but he simply dictated it, so that a person writing longhand could conveniently take it, and when his dictation was through the revelation was complete.

My own testimony is that the revelations in the Doctrine and Covenants are beyond the wisdom of man. That is true of the least revelation. Take, perhaps, the shortest, the second section, outlining all our great temple work in the turning of the hearts of the children to the fathers and the hearts of the fathers to the children. That is above the wisdom of man, as also the 20th, 107th, 84th, and 124th, sections, the four great charters of the Priesthood, or revelations on the Priesthood, which, by the way, the priesthood here assembled should be very familiar with, as many of them no doubt are, and other revelations, too numerous to mention, such as the 59th, the 93rd, 76th, 87th, 88th and 89th sections. Indeed any one of them is above the wisdom of the young man Joseph, and above the wisdom of any of his associates, and above the wisdom of the world today. That is my testimony, and I bear it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The congregation sang the first and third verses of the hymn, “Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah.”

ELDER CHARLES A. CALLIS

President of the Southern States Mission

Brethren and sisters: A solemn thought comes to me as I stand before you. It is this: The Lord said: "I give unto men weakness that they may be humble; and my grace is sufficient for all men that humble themselves before me; for if they humble themselves before me, and have faith in me, then will I make things become strong unto them."

The Apostle Paul, by the inspiration of the Lord, declared: "But we have this treasure in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God, and not of us."

There were those in Paul's day who made the statement that his bodily presence was weak; but in that earthen vessel was the courageous spirit, the power of the Priesthood and the Holy Ghost that magnified the name of the Lord, and that preached Jesus Christ and him crucified to all the people who would listen to the apostle's message.

We should look upon the manner of our redemption not only with respect and gratitude, but also with deep love and affection. In the body of the Babe of Bethlehem was the mighty God, the everlasting Father, the God of heaven, who came down to redeem his people.

What was there in that young child to incite the murderous impulses in the heart of the wicked King Herod? The child appeared to mortal eyes much like other children, except to those whom God had given the light to see that the Son of Mary was God, the Savior. The evil power moved Herod to seek the life of the Only Begotten of the Father, because the promised Son was a revelation of God, the Redeemer of the world, who came to save mankind by his atoning blood. He was the Resurrection and the Life.

When the Prophet Joseph Smith related to sectarian ministers the account of his glorious vision in which he beheld the Father and the Son, they laughed him to scorn and persecuted him. After accomplishing all the work God had given him to do, he sealed his testimony with his blood as a martyr for the Lord Jesus Christ. What was there in that boy to stir up hate and murder in the hearts of those who persecuted him and sought his life? The evil one revealed to them that here was a man who came to declare to the world that God lived, that Jesus was the Christ. Joseph Smith was a man sent from God to fill the earth with the knowledge of the Lord and to restore the true and everlasting gospel for the salvation of the children of men.

The remark is sometimes heard among us that the world looks with more complacency upon a prophet than it did a generation ago. This is not true, and those who entertain that idea are deceiving themselves. The same power that hated the Savior has always hated and will always hate the prophets he sends into the world. "If ye were of the world, the world would love his own: but because ye are not of the world, but I have chosen you out of the world, therefore the world hateth you."

A few years ago, shortly after the World War, I had a conversation with a prominent minister. He was a great preacher of the gospel as he understood it. In manner he was courteous, and his questions indicated a tolerant spirit. At the close of our talk I said to him: "Doctor, do you not think that this great war and this terrible epidemic of influenza foreshadow some great event such as the second coming of the Son of God?" He replied: "I think so now, but if a man eight years ago had told us that this war and epidemic would come, we would have laughed him to scorn and then crucified him." I said: "Doctor, men did crucify just such a man." Then to relieve the deep astonishment depicted on the churchman's countenance, I told him the story of the Prophet Joseph Smith and the marvelous predictions that he made, by revelation from the Lord, of the Civil War, the World War and the desolating sickness and the overflowing scourge that should cover the land.

I testify to you, my brethren and sisters, that in earthen vessels there is power, there is a heavenly treasure. In the Prophet Joseph Smith there was a heavenly treasure, an immortal spirit, the power and calling of the holy Priesthood and the Holy Ghost by which he established the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in all its beauty and power, divinely commissioned to preach the gospel to prepare the way for the second coming of the Lord.

And I testify that in the missionaries, earthen vessels, the Holy Ghost dwells, and by this they know, by first-hand knowledge and not second-hand, that Jesus is the Christ. By that treasure and power they are preaching the restored gospel, reproving the world of sin, and God is blessing their labors.

The President of the Church has the same treasure, the same power, keys, and authority that the Prophet Joseph Smith had, and all the leaders of the Church, and the officers laboring under their direction have these treasures and the calling and authority that belong to the particular offices to which they have been appointed, to declare God's message to the people to whom they are sent and among whom they labor. This testimony I bear, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

A Lamanite brother from Washakie will now speak to us. His remarks will be interpreted by his bishop, Elder George M. Ward.

We have 150 members of the Church in Washakie. I understand that this Lamanite brother said he would like the opportunity of saying a few words here, and we are glad to have him do so. Brother Frank Warner, a brother of our Lamanite who is coming to the stand, filled a number of very fine missions among the Lamanites in different sections of the United States.

YEAHGAH TIMBIMBOO

My brethren and sisters: I am glad to meet here with you in conference. This is the first time in my life I have stood here and spoken to an audience. In my childhood I understood nothing of the services of this people. I had seen them going to Church. Not until I yielded obedience unto the word of God and accepted the ordinances of the gospel did I know what they were doing. Since I have accepted this gospel I have felt to be a friend to this people, and I have no desire to kill, or to do anything wrong that would displease the Spirit of the Lord.

I believe the Lord is in existence. In my younger days I was sent with others to this country towards the west in search of a Great Spirit. But I have found that the Spirit of the Lord is among this people. While in search of that Great Spirit, the company of Indians traveled by foot day and night, and endured hardships, hunger and thirst. When we did reach our destination in the west, we found it was the elders of this Church, and we were baptized by those elders. Since I have been baptized and accepted this gospel I feel to live it to the best of my ability. And it encourages us one and all to live sacred lives before the Lord and keep his commandments, as we have been instructed during this conference.

I look upon these men sitting here the same as I look upon our heavenly Father. I want to be obedient unto them and their teachings. Upon one occasion in my life I was very sick and my spirit left my body and went to my Creator, and the Creator would not accept my spirit, but it was sent back to my body. And now I testify that I am a living witness to this thing. I rejoice in the work that I have accomplished in this Church, the acceptance of the ordinances of the gospel, the performance of the same in my own behalf and the work that I have accomplished in behalf of my dead kindred.

I feel that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof is his, and we are his children and are placed here to obey him. Everything that we receive from this earth in the shape of grain, I feel is a blessing from the Lord unto us, and that we should consider it such, and thank the Lord for these blessings. I want to encourage you to be faithful and serve the Lord and keep his commandments. You people have the advantage of me. You can read the word of God from the scriptures and can store it up in your minds and prepare yourselves to live it. I, being unable to read, have to get my instructions from my bishop and remember them, and whenever he calls upon me I depend upon the Lord to bless me with his Spirit to bring to my mind the things I should say. I am in this position this morning, called unexpectedly to stand here before you, and I have expressed the few things that I have spoken under the direction of the Spirit of the Lord.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I wish to say that the Latter-day Saints have undoubtedly spent more money and more time in endeavoring to educate and benefit the Lamanite people, whom we believe to be the descendants of the father Lehi, than any other people. The Church today, I believe, numbers among its converts in Hawaii over one-half the native population of that land. We are given the credit by leading officials in that land of having done more for the uplift, morally, intellectually and physically, and for the temporal benefit of the people of Hawaii than all other missionaries who have been in that land. And we have invested there at the present time in plantations considerably more than a million and a half dollars in money.

We have assisted the Indians in Arizona and in different parts of Utah and Montana, and have done everything within our power for the benefit of this people, and we look forward to the day when hundreds and thousands of them will be abundantly blessed of the Lord, and when they shall eventually become a white and a delightful people.

As a closing number, the congregation sang "High on the mountain top;" and prayer was offered by Elder Thomas W. Johnson of the Beaver stake of Zion.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION

On Tuesday afternoon, April 6, the closing session of the conference was held in the Tabernacle.

President Heber J. Grant presided.

The choir and congregation sang "Come, come ye saints."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder J. Fred Corbett, president of the Idaho stake of Zion.

The choir and congregation sang "O my Father, thou that dwellest."

ELDER RUDGER CLAWSON

My brethren and sisters: It is a thrilling, yes, an almost overpowering experience, to stand before a great congregation such as is assembled here, and endeavor to preach to them the word of God. We have had some very wonderful meetings during the past three days, and now we have come to the last session of the conference. These general conferences recur at regular periods; nevertheless, they always come with a freshness and variety of instruction that is very delightful.

It is not expected of me to present to you any new doctrine. I have no new doctrine to offer, and if there were any such to be given to the Church, it would be the duty and privilege of the President of the Church to announce it, he being the man who holds the keys. This is a principle that ought to be well understood by the Latter-day Saints.

WE ARE DECIDEDLY A CHRISTIAN CHURCH

President Ivins in his remarks yesterday alluded to the fact that the "Mormon" Church is sometimes referred to in the world as being an un-Christian church, that we are not a Christian people. If I remember correctly, and perhaps President Ivins mentioned the fact that in 1893, at the great parliament of religions, the "Mormon" Church was denied admission because it was regarded as not being a Christian church. Now it appears to me that with the facts which are readily at hand and within reach of any investigator, it is easily seen that we are decidedly a Christian church. Ours is the only Church that bears the name of the Savior. It is called the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and that alone, if we are sincere in our belief, and we are, is sufficient proof that we are Christians.

OUR STANDARD TEXTS

I have here on the stand the standard works of the Church—the Bible, the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price. These are the works that will be found upon almost every pulpit in the Church, in all our places of worship and in the temples also as well as in the homes of the Saints. Let us pause for a moment and as briefly as possible consider these wonderful books. What is the Bible? The Bible is a book of scripture that contains the word of God as transmitted to his people on the eastern hemisphere; and not only a book of scripture, but a book of historical character, because it deals with the purposes of God and his providences in the journeyings and travels of his people. It covers a period from Adam down to Christ and his Apostles. Somebody might say, "Is that the only Bible you have in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints?" The answer is, Yes, that is the only Bible we have. We have other books of scripture, but they are not known and not referred to under that title.

THE HOLY BIBLE

I am free to state on this occasion, in the midst of this great congregation, that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints accepts the Bible for what it purports to be. We hold it in reverence, and to us it is a holy book; and a couplet that is very often used in connection with the Bible is very pleasing to us, namely: "Holy Bible, book Divine, precious treasure thou art mine." The Bible sets forth in clearness the gospel of Jesus Christ. That is perhaps its main value. I speak of this because the gospel involves principles that are everlasting in their character. They always existed, and they will always exist. For that reason these principles of salvation are applicable to all times and all nations throughout the world. It must be apparent to anyone who studies the Bible that there were certain commandments given therein, very important and sacred commandments, which do not apply to us. This cannot be said, however, of the Ten Commandments. They are of a general character and their application is general, and, as stated here by one of the speakers, the Ten Commandments form a basis for all law. If they were local commandments they would not apply to us, and would, perhaps, have no particular value in guiding our movements. That fact alone naturally suggests that the Church of God, whenever it is upon the earth, is in need of direct revelation. People require the word of God that is suited to their day and time. The Bible represents very great authority, but it does not impart any authority. Here is a distinction that should always be borne in mind.

THE BOOK OF MORMON

The Book of Mormon is also a record of scripture. We prize it very highly. We study it and search it, for we claim it to be the word of God. It was written by the hand of Mormon, who was a prophet among the people of the western hemisphere, or America, as it is now known. He was a great prophet among the people in the day in which he wrote. The Book of Mormon had its beginning about 600 years before Christ, and its ending about 420 years after Christ, covering a period of about 1,000 years. Surely anyone who will give the Book of Mormon a careful study will be driven to the conclusion, if he is sincere-minded, that wonderful things were accomplished during that period. The people of the Book of Mormon were called Nephites, after one of their first prophets. Nephi was the son of Lehi, who was the founder of the nation, and surely it was a great nation. The Nephites themselves as a people passed away about 1,400 years ago; nevertheless, they have some representatives still upon the earth. The Lamanite who stood here this morning and bore his testimony, and a very wonderful testimony it was, is a descendant of Lehi through one of his sons who was called Laman, who was a brother of Nephi. The descendants of these men are called Lamanites, otherwise known as American Indians. So we had a Lamanite here to speak to us this morning, and he bore a faithful testimony. It was very wonderful to hear him. He spoke in his own language and it was interpreted by the Bishop of his ward.

Now the principal value of the Book of Mormon, as a standard work of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, lies in the fact that it contains an account of the gospel of Jesus Christ. It is set forth in very great clearness. It is learned through this sacred record that the Savior after his crucifixion visited the people of Nephi. It is not to be wondered at that he visited them, because the Nephites were of Israel, being descendants of Jacob, and could properly be called a branch of the house of Israel. Since the Savior deigned to appear to his own people after his resurrection at Jerusalem, is it to be wondered at that he visited this branch of the house of Israel? Well, the account says that he did visit them, and the record further tells us that he organized his Church among them, and strange to say—and yet I ought not to use that expression—gave to his Church in this land twelve apostles. He also gave to the Church such other officers of the priesthood as were given to the Church in his day. He ordained high priests, seventies and elders, priests, teachers and deacons. The Church of the Nephites, corresponded exactly in every detail with the Church of Christ in the land of Palestine.

Now I tell you, brethren and sisters, there is something very beautiful in a comparison of this kind, something that is faith-promoting, something that is very enlightening.

In addition to the plan of redemption, or, the everlasting gospel, that was given to the Nephites, we have in the Book of Mormon a brief history of their travels and of the ministry of their prophets. It is a book that is published to the world. If anybody should ask me: "Well, isn't it a Bible, isn't it your Bible?" I would answer, "No. It is our Book of Mormon. We do not call it the Bible. There is only one book which has that title. This is the Book of Mormon." If they should say, "Well it is a book of scriptures, isn't it?" We answer: "Surely it is, and we put it forth as such."

THE DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS

Coming down to our own day we form a distinct and separate people from those great nations that have gone before; namely: the Israelites of the eastern hemisphere and the Nephites of the western hemisphere. We have received the gospel of Jesus Christ in this day and time, and it came to us direct from heaven. We did not get it from any other church or denomination under heaven. We have another book of scripture that is very precious indeed. It has been referred to, as have been these other books in this conference. It is the Doctrine and Covenants, which contains seventy-two to seventy-six revelations, given to the people of our day through the Prophet Joseph Smith and is declared to be the word of the Lord to his Church. Strange to say, and yet I must not use the word "strange," the book of Doctrine and Covenants in its doctrines corresponds exactly with the teachings of the Book of Mormon, and corresponds exactly with the teachings of the Bible. I am, therefore, justified in saying that the Latter-day Saints have three powerful witnesses of the truth of the gospel.

HOW THE BOOK OF MORMON BEARS UPON THE SUBJECT

Now, in conclusion, permit me to read just a few words from the Book of Mormon which have a bearing upon this topic, and are very instructive. Nephi, the Prophet to whom I have referred, II Nephi 28 and 29, uses language somewhat like this:

"Yea, wo be unto him that hearkeneth unto the precepts of men, and denieth the power of God, and the gift of the Holy Ghost!

"Yea, wo be unto him that saith: We have received and we need no more!

"And in fine, wo be unto all those who tremble, and are angry because of the truth of God! For behold, he that is built upon the rock receiveth it with gladness; and he that is built upon a sandy foundation trembleth lest he shall fall.

"Wo be unto him that shall say: We have received the word of God, and we need no more of the word of God, for we have enough!

"For behold, thus saith the Lord God: I will give unto the children of men line upon line, precept upon precept, here a little and there a little; and blessed are those who hearken unto my precepts, and lend an ear unto my counsel, for they shall learn wisdom; for unto him that receiveth I will give more; and from them that shall say, We have enough, from them shall be taken away even that which they have."

And again briefly:

"And because my words shall hiss forth—many of the gentiles shall say: A Bible! A Bible! We have got a Bible and there cannot be any more Bible.

"But thus saith the Lord God: O fools, they shall have a Bible; and it shall proceed forth from the Jews, mine ancient covenant people. And what thank they the Jews for the Bible which they receive from them? Yea, what do the Gentiles mean? Do they remember the travels and the labors, and the pains of the Jews, and their diligence unto me, in bringing forth salvation unto the gentiles?

"O ye Gentiles, have ye remembered the Jews, mine ancient covenant people? Nay; but ye have cursed them, and have hated them, and have not sought to recover them. But behold, I will return all these things upon your own heads, for I the Lord have not forgotten my people.

"Thou fool, that shall say: A Bible, we have got a Bible, and we need no more Bible. Have ye obtained a Bible save it were by the Jews?

"Know ye not that there are more nations than one? Know ye not that I, the Lord your God, have created all men, and that I remember those who are upon the isles of the sea; and that I rule in the heavens above and in the earth beneath; and I bring forth my word unto the children of men, yea, even upon all the nations of the earth?

"Wherefore murmur ye, because that ye shall receive more of my word? Know ye not that the testimony of two nations is a witness unto you that I am God, that I remember one nation like unto another? Wherefore, I speak the same words unto one nation like unto another. And when the two nations shall run together the testimony of the two nations shall run together also."

God bless you, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER GEORGE ALBERT SMITH

Time is very precious today, as it is always, and I desire most earnestly that the few moments I occupy will be profitable to this vast congregation.

A MARVELOUS AGE

We are living in a marvelous age, in the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times. All the other dispensations that have gone before are culminating in this one. The Lord tells us in the Book of Mormon, to which President Clawson has just referred, that at the time of the coming forth of that book, he would commence his work among all the nations, and it is remarkable that since the publication of the Book of Mormon more important discoveries and inventions have been presented to mankind than in all the ages that have gone before. Science has developed many wonderful things. Labor-saving devices have made our work much easier than before. Electricity, which has been in the world from the beginning, has been recently discovered and has been so controlled that it is used to light our homes, to propel our street cars and railway trains, and to operate machinery of all kinds. This was unknown one hundred years ago. As a matter of fact, nobody can tell what it is today; but it is one of the powers in this universe that is controlled by our Father in heaven. It would seem that everything one can imagine has been provided for our comfort in this age. We have the accumulated information of the ages, and surely we ought to be inclined to take advantage of that information in order that we might enjoy our lives here and be prepared to enjoy them eternally. In our great institutions of learning men are devoting their entire time to research. There is a disposition on the part of man to find out everything that is mysterious, and the result has been that intelligent men have had their minds operated on by the Spirit of our heavenly Father, and many of the conveniences to which I have referred have been the result. In the science of medicine, newly discovered anaesthetics have been a boon to suffering humanity, and by their use the surgeon has been able to perform wonderful operations. Toxins have been prepared that have a tendency to prevent disease, and to stop its spread. Opportunity is given us to know what happens in all parts of the world each day through the great newspapers and magazines that are published. Everything that you can think of in the way of comfort and information has been presented to this dispensation. Unfortunately, notwithstanding these blessings, there is a tendency to worship the gift and to forget the Giver.

THE WISDOM OF MAN TAUGHT

We have in our public schools and in our universities, men and women who are trained, their minds are lighted up by the teachings of men, and it is remarkable to what a degree the business of life has been brought to the attention of the human family; but most of our schools operate as a result of the wisdom of man and exclude God, the source of all truth. We spend millions of dollars in the education of the hand and of the mind, and we exclude from many of these institutions all knowledge of our heavenly Father, who gave to us the hand and the mind. In fact, there has been an effort made by some educators to create in the minds of pupils under their watchcare a contempt for the fact that the world we live in is controlled by our Father in heaven.

In section 93 of the Doctrine and Covenants I find this reference:

"Light and truth forsake that evil one.

"Every spirit of man was innocent in the beginning; and God having redeemed man from the fall, men became again, in their infant state, innocent before God.

"And that wicked one cometh and taketh away light and truth, through disobedience, from the children of men, and because of the tradition of their fathers.

"But I have commanded you to bring up your children in light and truth."

ADDITIONAL LIGHT AND TRUTH TO BE TAUGHT

So my brethren and sisters, while we can have our children educated in the arts and sciences as taught by men, there still remains a commandment of our heavenly Father that we shall supplement those teachings and that our children shall be reared in light and truth. I find in this same section a reference that is made to one of the men of that time. It says:

"Verily, I say unto you, * * * you have continued under this condemnation;

"You have not taught your children light and truth, according to the commandments; and that wicked one hath power, as yet, over you, and this is the cause of your affliction."

Now the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints realizes the importance of teaching children the things of God, and has given to us our auxiliary organizations. Our heavenly Father inspired the organization of the Relief Society, the Sabbath School, the Mutual Improvement Associations, the Primary, the Religion Class. The inspiration of the Lord gave to us our Church schools and our seminaries. All these are intended to supplement the teachings of men, and to bring our children under an influence that shall assist them while they remain here in the earth to prepare for eternal life. These have been wonderfully beneficial. Then we are instructed, even in our recreation, to teach our boys and our girls that in their pastime they should recognize our heavenly Father; and in our day the various stakes and wards of Zion are asked to give special attention to recreation, in order that the things that induce our young people to follow after the foolishness of the world may be neutralized by keeping them in an influence that will incline them to righteousness and inspire them to do those things and live such lives as shall make them worthy to be called sons and daughters of our heavenly Father.

We find in section 68 of the Doctrine and Covenants something that we often hear quoted, but I am going to read it because it has application to these things I refer to:

PARENTS TO TEACH CHILDREN THE THINGS OF GOD

"And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance, faith in Christ the Son of the living God, and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands, when eight years old, the sin be upon the heads of the parents.

"For this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized.

"And their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands.

"And they shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord."

There is more of this same section that perhaps you are all familiar with, but the point that I had in mind, and what I am about to say I am exceedingly anxious that it should sink into the mind of every parent in Zion, and that is, that while the Lord has provided all these wonderful educational institutions, while science has contributed so much for our comfort and our blessing, while the Church has prepared places to which we may send our children to be taught the gospel of Christ, that does not relieve you or me of the responsibility and the obligation that is laid upon us by our heavenly Father to teach our own children. And the Lord says, wherein we fail to do that, even at the tender age of eight, that the sin will be upon our heads. President Joseph F. Smith was inspired to give unto us the wise counsel to be more with our children. Notwithstanding the many things that occupy our time—the business of life, theatres, parties, socials, automobiles, pleasure resorts, the canyons and lakes—all these things that we may enjoy in moderation; notwithstanding the pursuit of life whereby we gain a livelihood, that prophet of the Lord gave to us this advice: That we should so arrange our time that one evening each week would find the Latter-day Saints in their own homes, associated with their own children, and there teach them the things that the Lord has decreed that they should know. It is not sufficient that my children are taught faith, repentance and baptism, and the laying on of hands for the gift of the holy Ghost in the auxiliary organizations. My Father in heaven has commanded that I should do that myself. I have read to you that the Lord told one man that the cause of his distress was that he had not taught his children light and truth. There is anguish in some of the homes of the Latter-day Saints today because we have neglected our opportunity, and we have failed to teach our children as we should. If the home evening could only be a fact among the Latter-day Saints, if during one evening a week we would live with our own, under the influence of the spirit of the Lord, at our own firesides surrounded by those whom the Lord has given unto us, and told us, particularly, that we should instruct them, how many happy homes there would be where today there is sorrow and discord and distress. Fathers and mothers would elicit from their children that respect that is due to parents who are model parents, and who have in their hearts a desire to teach their loved ones. We are told in Luke that there would be a time when men would be choked with the cares and the riches and the pleasures of life. I have in my mind, as I stand here even now, men and women that I love, whose very spirituality is being choked by these very things, and the adversary is leading them along that easy pathway of pleasure and they are neglecting their duty as parents and as members of the Church of Jesus Christ.

THE DUTY WE OWE TO OUR CHILDREN

It was said by one of the speakers that your commission, you men of Israel, is from God the eternal Father. The holy Priesthood has been conferred upon us, and if we exercise it as we should, as we have a right to do in our homes, when we shut out the world and the things of the outside, and under the power of prayer and thanksgiving we give to our sons and daughters those rich truths that the Lord has deposited with us for our welfare and for theirs, a genuine development of faith will follow. I hope that it will be possible for us to return, if we have departed from that advice. Gather our children around us and let our homes be the abiding place of the Spirit of the Lord. If we will do our part, we may know and be sure that our heavenly Father will do his. Let us avail ourselves of all the information that it is possible to obtain in the world; it will rise with us in the resurrection. I am grateful for the great men and women who give their lives for the education of the human family, and I am grateful to God that he has given to us in this latter day a knowledge that the wisdom of man is not sufficient, but it takes the wisdom of our heavenly Father to prepare us for eternal life in his celestial kingdom. Are you satisfied with the thought that your children will go to the terrestrial or the telestial kingdom? Are you satisfied that you shall inherit either of these lesser kingdoms? It is that you might enjoy the celestial kingdom that the Priesthood of the living God has been conferred upon men in this day. It is that we might gain the celestial glory that the gospel of Jesus Christ has been given to the children of men. Now in the midst of confusion, excitement and all the pleasures of life, let us not lose sight of the Pearl of Great Price, the power of God unto salvation, and let us not lose sight of the duty that we owe these boys and girls who are created in the image of God. He is the Father of their spirits, and he will hold us responsible for the teaching that they receive. I hope and pray that we will so teach them that when the end shall come we can receive from him that blessing, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord," and that we may have our loved ones with us eternally, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A soprano solo, "Beautiful Zion for me," was sung by Lily Shipp Burton.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

"Beautiful Zion For Me," was written by Brother Charles W. Penrose upon the spur of the moment when bidding good-bye to Brigham Young, Jr., who had presided over the European mission, and who was about to sail for home. Brother Penrose remarked, "Oh, Brigham, beautiful Zion for me! I wish I were going with you." Then he asked Brother Brigham Young, Jr., "Do you know the tune, 'Beautiful Isle of the Sea?'" And he said, "Yes." "All right, I will write you a hymn to that tune that you can sing on the ocean." And President Penrose wrote this hymn.

ELDER GEORGE F. RICHARDS

On occasions of this character there is an obligation resting upon each member of the Church present, perhaps the greatest responsibility is upon those who are called upon to instruct the people.

PRAYER IS OF GREAT BENEFIT

We all have need of the help our Lord so generously gives, when sought after in the way that he has appointed. Our singers need help that they may have control of their voices, that they may have the spirit of these hymns and songs which are sung, that the song may be as a prayer unto the Lord, that it may be an acceptable feature of our worship, and be answered with blessings upon our heads, and that they may be able, not only to be heard, but to be understood. The individuals who pray need help that they may be able to voice the sentiments and feelings of the members of the congregation, for they are not offering an individual prayer, but a prayer for the whole people, expressive of their thoughts and feelings. The speaker needs that help which the Saints can give by their prayers of faith. The Lord has said that the prayers of a righteous man availeth much with the Lord. This being the case, the prayer, silent and secret though it be, of many faithful men and women is sure to avail more with the Lord, and if we all do our duty in the spirit of worship when we come together on such occasions, our worship will not only be approved of the Lord, but will be sanctified to our blessing and salvation.

THE SPIRIT OF GOD, THE SOUL OF THE CHURCH

The Apostle Paul in an epistle to the Corinthians made comparison of the Church and the offices thereof with the human body, and made the declaration that one member could not say to another: "I have no need of thee," for all the members are necessary. Notwithstanding the perfection of this organism of man which God has created, there is something within, that is the spirit, that if it were lacking this body would be as the dust of the earth, there would be no virtue in it. And so it is with the Church of Christ and the officers therein. But for the Spirit of God, which is the very soul of the Church, of our religion, of "Mormonism," it would be powerless to accomplish its destiny in the earth. There is in this thing called "Mormonism" a spirit, a spiritual life, and I fear that many of us have not found it. I fear that we are too mechanical in our prayers, in our worship, and in our service of God. When this spirit is upon us we feel the truth and see the beauty of the gospel which we have received. Our souls are lighted up by it and we have the spirit of testimony and a knowledge of the truth. It is the spirit of revelation, it is the spirit by which the Church and kingdom of God has been set up and by which the work has been conducted up to the present time. We can have this spirit with us and have its manifestation if we will live for it, my brethren and sisters. We must make these tabernacles of ours, which are the temples of God, fit to receive the Holy Ghost that he may dwell within us, that we may be inspired by him in that which we have to do in life, to see aright, to feel aright, and to act aright, that our administrations and our lives may be acceptable unto God. We cannot do this work assigned to us, we cannot live our religion acceptably to the Lord without his help.

THE SPIRIT COMES TO THOSE WHO ARE WILLING

If we obtain his help it must be through his holy Spirit, and if we would have that Spirit we must live for it holy lives, being altogether worthy in the sight of the Lord, then we must have a willing spirit, willing to receive that which the Lord has to give us, willing to give that which the Lord desires at our hands, whether it be our time, our talents, our means, or our lives, we must have that willingness of spirit that we will place all upon the altar to be used by the Lord for the accomplishment of his purposes, the saving of the souls of his children. We must recognize that authority which the Lord has placed here in the earth, in his Church, for he has said: "Whether it be by my own mouth, or by the mouth of my servant, it is the same." So, when a call is made upon us by those who are in authority, we should regard it as a call from the Lord, and never refuse to accept that call, no matter what of sacrifice it may entail. We should receive these things with grateful hearts, having that faith and trust in God that it will mean to us honor and glory in the life to come which it certainly will if we magnify these callings and the work which is assigned to us. We are here to learn what the will of God is concerning us and to do his will, walking in the footsteps of our Savior, even in the light as he was in the light, that we may receive a fulfilment of the promise that we shall have fellowship one with another in his kingdom, and that the blood of Jesus Christ shall cleanse us from all sins.

PRaise THE LORD IN PRAYER FOR OPPORTUNITY AND BLESSINGS

I have been greatly edified and blessed in this conference. I have enjoyed the inspiring songs, so beautifully rendered, and particularly the song, "Beautiful Zion for me." My soul went out in rejoicing and thanksgiving before the Lord that my lot is cast with the Latter-day Saints in Zion, that I have membership in the Church and kingdom of God here upon the earth, that I have the fellowship of the Saints, their love and confidence and association, that I have a portion of the authority of the Lord and have been honored with the privilege to minister for him in this great ministry in the earth, for his sustaining hand and power have been with me in my ministry, notwithstanding my weaknesses and personal inability. May the name of the Lord be praised forever.

My attendance at the meetings of this conference have had the effect of bringing me to appreciate, it seems to me, more than ever before, the blessings of the Lord unto me and unto his people. I love the Latter-day Saints. I desire to see the blessings of God poured out upon them, the blessings of heaven and the blessings of earth, and I desire to see this people faithful in keeping the commandments of the Lord and in doing his will. Brethren and sisters, if we appreciate the great blessings that have come to us through the gospel, let us never forget our obligation to render thanksgiving to our Father in Heaven for them, in the name of Jesus Christ. Morning and night is not too often. It was not too often when I was a child at my mother's knee. I have never felt less the need of prayer than at that time. As obligations have come to me, and as I have been made to appreciate more the blessings of the Lord, I have felt more the need of prayer, and I have constantly, and fervently prayed unto him in praise and thanksgiving, and, realizing my dependence and my weakness, I have pleaded with him for mercy, forgiveness and for spiritual guidance. The Lord has been very good to me, and I feel sure you feel the same, brethren and sisters, that he has been good to you.

OTHER WAYS THAN PRAYER TO MANIFEST APPRECIATION

Now let me say, it is not sufficient that we pray to the Lord often in thanksgiving for the blessings. There are other ways in which we can manifest our appreciation. If we appreciate what the Lord has done for us, we will love him and the greater our appreciation of these blessings the greater will be our love, and the Lord has said: "If ye love me, keep my commandments," and thereby does he know whether we love him, if we keep his commandments. He has said: "If a man love me, he will keep my word." He has given us his word through his servants. President Heber J. Grant has referred to the Word of Wisdom as the word of God, which it is. Now the Lord says: "If ye love me, keep my commandments. If a man love me, he will keep my word." Some people say: "But the Word of Wisdom is not a commandment." If the Lord has commanded that I love him with all my heart, with all my soul, with all my might, and then has said that if I love him I will keep his word, therein is a commandment to me that I keep the Word of Wisdom. Regard it as you will, to me it is sufficient to know that it is the mind and will of God. That is what we are here for, my brethren and sisters, to learn his mind and will and then with his help to do it at whatever cost it may entail.

TESTIMONY

I know that this is God's work, I am thankful for it, I know that President Heber J. Grant is the mouthpiece of God unto this people at this time, and I know that he has the inspiration of his calling. I know that this work is progressing as it has under administrations of the Church which have gone before, and I know there will be no dearth of interest on the part of the Latter-day Saints in helping to carry on this work. I am assured of its triumph. I have no fear of future embarrassment, of being found in a mistaken condition. I know, and thank God for this testimony, that this is his work, that he is at the helm, and that it will triumph. This is my testimony which I bear to you, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

We have a half hour left and there is some business to be attended to, namely, the presenting of the Authorities, and I would like to make a few closing remarks. I do not know that it would hurt the Latter-day Saints if we were to overrun the time fifteen or twenty minutes. I would like to hear from all our mission presidents that have not spoken, and I will ask them to watch that clock and to bear us a testimony of from three to five minutes.

ELDER SAMUEL O. BENNION

President of the Central States Mission

I am very happy, my brethren and sisters, to be in attendance at this conference; and, had I been left to my own desires I would have preferred that my time be given to President Grant. I appreciate the gospel and the knowledge that has come to me through my ministry, and the privilege I have had of laboring in the ministry, bearing my testimony to the children of men; that the work of God as revealed through the Prophet Joseph Smith in our day is true. In my travels I have found faith among the children of men, and have become acquainted with many men and women who have obeyed the gospel of Jesus Christ as taught by the elders of the Church who have labored in the Central States mission during my appointment as president of that mission.

Inasmuch as I have had many hundreds of young men and women laboring under my direction as president of that mission, I have been able to observe that the youth of Zion are growing stronger, and that they are not weaker than they were 20 years ago. I know that the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are growing in faith and that the youth of Zion are not losing their faith, but that they are holding their own, notwithstanding the increased temptations that surround young people, compared with the temptations of 20 years ago.

Considering the fact that our young men and young women continue to show improvement in faith and in preparedness, is it not evident, then, that the membership of the Church of God in the earth is growing in strength and in power? For if we could notice a decline, it would be undoubtedly because of the training of the youth of Zion, and inasmuch as the youth of Zion do show an increase in faith and in general preparedness for preaching the gospel, we cannot but conclude that the affairs of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints are well administered, and that the work of the Lord is growing and increasing in power and in strength in the earth, and that the children who are given to parents in Zion will be able to continue to carry in honor the gospel message to the children of men until the Lord shall come.

I know that the Lord lives and that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith was and is a prophet of God and that he received the authority to act in the name of God; that he was divinely appointed and commissioned to establish the Church, and that the gospel through him might be preached in all the world. I bear testimony that the Priesthood of the Son of God is in the earth, and that the presiding brethren, with Heber J. Grant at the head, are divinely appointed men to act in the name of God, for the furthering of his work here in the earth. That the Priesthood shall remain in the earth until the Son of man comes to rule and reign; and I bear this testimony in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN H. TAYLOR

President of the Northern States Mission

I am very grateful, my brethren and sisters, for the testimony of the gospel of Jesus Christ that I have received; of the truth of this great work that has been established in the latter days; and of the divinity of the Prophet Joseph Smith. We often say that we are very grateful for our parentage, and for the blessings that have come to us through that parentage. Sometimes I wonder just what I have received through my parents and grandparents. In thinking over the matter, I feel that I have received one good thing, among the many other blessings, and that is a love for the Prophet Joseph Smith whom God raised up in these latter days to establish his work upon the earth. Grandfather loved Joseph Smith and was willing to give his life for him. He stood by his side. I am grateful for the blessing that has come to me in the testimony that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God; that I can love him, in a measure at least, in the way that grandfather loved this man of God. I have heard my grandmother, Elizabeth Taylor, testify regarding the Prophet Joseph Smith. I have also heard my wife's grandmother, Rachel Grant, testify of him. I have heard many other men and women who have personally known the prophet testify to the divine calling of Joseph Smith. We are not so very far away from this Prophet of God, and the testimony concerning him is very close to us. It is not necessary to reach back through the ages, or through the thousands of years, to find testimony and to find faith in regard to this great work and this great man, a prophet, raised up in these the latter days.

I hope that, as members of the Church, we will do our part; that our boys and our girls will accept the testimony of the splendid men and women we have among us, and particularly of those who can testify to the divinity of the mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith. May God bless us and help us to live a life of usefulness and of righteousness upon the earth; and show him, by the things that we do, that we truly love him and are willing to give service and perform the labors which God would have us perform upon the earth. I bear testimony as to the truth of this work, and of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and of Jesus Christ the beloved Son of God. Amen.

ELDER BRIGHAM S. YOUNG

These tabloid sermons remind me of a line from Shakespeare: "One woe doth tread upon another's heels, so fast they follow."

But I will not detain you long, brethren and sisters. I am grateful to have the privilege of representing and making a brief report of the Northwestern States mission. It is a glorious work to which a few selected brethren have been called, and I am very grateful that I have been one of the selected few; not because I merit the distinction, because I have had to rest upon the mercy of God and the kindness of my brethren. It is a wonderful and glorious experience to be associated with your sons and daughters. They are the elect of the earth, and I plead for them that, on their return to their homes, their presidents of stakes, their bishops of wards, will extend to them the hand of helpfulness, that they shall be cared for and provided a place in which they may continue the excellent work they have performed in the mission. They are acquiring such knowledge as does not come to men and women in educational institutions, but I desire to make a plea that we encourage them to greater educational efforts. We are meeting a class of men and women in the world that requires and calls for the very best of intellectual attainment, and the better equipped our boys and girls are to meet these higher intellectuals, the more good they can do. They can reach people whom men and women of less educational attainment cannot successfully reach; and I look forward in hope to the time when young men and women we shall send out into the world will be the peers, educationally, of any other men and women in the world. The destiny of this people and this cause is that it shall be the greatest educational factor in all the world; and to the testimonies that have been borne here this day, and other days, I wish to add mine. Reason has convinced me; the laws of experience, as they have been and are being applied in human attainment, as well as the authority of the scripture, teach, proclaim and testify to me, that this is the work of God. As the gospel of Jesus Christ has come forth from the crucible it has been adorned and is in the radiance of the divine. God is with good. He is with truth. He is with this people; and if we wish to do our full duty to him, we can best do it by proclaiming to the world in the lives we live that this is the gospel of Jesus Christ, to which I testify in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH QUINNEY, JR.

President of the Canadian Mission

I believe that I appreciate, to the fullest, the great responsibility that rests upon one, when one is called upon to bear witness of the gospel of our Lord and Master, Jesus Christ. I have come to the conclusion that there is no greater work in all this world than to be engaged in proclaiming and teaching the gospel of our Lord and Master to the nations of the earth. I am glad, beyond my power to say, that I have been chosen and sent into the world to be associated with young men and women, in declaring this divine truth to those with whom we come in contact from day to day. I am glad to be a member of this great and mighty Church, and that there is burning within my heart a testimony concerning the divinity of this great latter-day work.

In the country in which it has been my privilege to labor, there are some of the finest people with whom one would care to meet. They are, as a rule, intelligent and law-abiding people. They are people who know the value of law, in that they execute it to bring about better order for all those who reside within their borders. As an example: the other day, while riding in one of the street cars of the city of Toronto, there hung from the roof of the car this sign, "The Toronto Traction Company, since September 1, 1921, has traveled one hundred twenty-two million miles; these cars have carried one billion two hundred twenty-five million people, and during that length of time there has not been one fatal accident." I make mention of this for the simple reason, to bring out the fact, that they do business on a conservative basis, and that there is cooperation on the part of all, in protecting the population of the country. This conservatism is shown, not only in their business life, but also in their social and spiritual life.

My brethren and sisters, to me this latter-day work is worth my life. In the silent hours of my life, when I have the opportunity, and that is often, I reflect upon that great vision of the Prophet Joseph Smith, when he saw God, the eternal Father, and his Son Jesus Christ and heard the voice of God introducing his Son. I think that is one of the greatest events in the history of human life. Indeed, there is no other event recorded, that equals it. It is true that we read in the scriptures that Stephen saw the Son of God sitting on the right hand of God; but nowhere do we find that both God the Father and the Son have appeared at the same time to mortal man. This event, wherein God introduced his Son to this young prophet, clearly indicates the character and magnitude of this great latter-day work. Indeed it was so important that it required the introduction of it into the world in this great and last dispensation by both the Father and the Son. I thank God, my eternal Father, that I have been counted worthy to bear this testimony, not only upon his occasion, but upon the many occasions that have come to me during my life. May God bless us to the extent that we may appreciate more fully, our relationship to him, and praise him for the testimonies that all of us enjoy, I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN G. ALLRED

President of the Northcentral States Mission

One of the ancient prophets who had his mind centered upon this great latter-day work used words somewhat like these:

"Stay yourselves, and wonder; cry ye out, and cry: they are drunken, but not with wine; they stagger, but not with strong drink.

"For the Lord hath poured out upon you the spirit of deep sleep, and hath closed your eyes: the prophets and your rulers, the seers hath he covered.

"And the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed:

"And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this I pray thee; and he saith, I am not learned.

"Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men:

"Therefore, behold I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people."

Not long ago a letter fell into my hands that was written in this city, in the year 1876. That letter, written by one of our enemies, said:

"Brigham Young is fast trotting toward the grave, and in a short time he will be laid beneath the sod and with him will come the death of 'Mormonism.'"

The following year, 1877, Brigham Young died, but "Mormonism" did not die, and our answer to the world is: "Mormonism" will never die, for it is the work of God, and will be consummated in the coming of Jesus Christ the Lord, who shall come to reign as Lord of lords and King of kings. The young men of Israel are today filled with the same faith that filled the breasts of their fathers, who adopted this work and who have so successfully carried it on; and it will never wane for the lack of faith on the part of the young men and women of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

I bear witness to you today that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God and that he has been followed by men who are his legal successors, endowed with the keys of the Priesthood of God, with the authority to speak today, not a thousands years ago, but now. Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, that power is in the earth today, in these valleys of the mountains, in the Church of God, as it was established, and I bear witness to these truths, testifying that I know as I know that I live, that this work is of God, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER KENNETH HAYMORE

Acting President of the Mexican Mission

I am very pleased to be here this afternoon, my brethren and sisters, to give a brief report of the work of the Mexican mission. I know that the work we are doing in Mexico is indeed the work of the Lord, and that it is not the work of any man. The missionaries, numbering seventy-four or seventy-five, are doing a splendid work there. They are taking the gospel to the descendants of a people who formerly had a thorough knowledge of the gospel. It has already been stated here this afternoon that the people of this continent, the natives of the continent, at one time enjoyed the knowledge of the gospel, but just as an apostasy was brought about on the other continent, so also there was an apostasy upon this continent; but now, thanks to our heavenly Father, he has restored his gospel to the earth. These people are receiving again its teachings, they are coming into a knowledge of their fathers, and are learning that they are indeed of the blood of Israel. They are learning the laws and ordinances of the gospel, and I am happy to say that some of them, at least, are accepting the gospel, and are showing by their lives that they know that they indeed have the truth. We are having success in Mexico in spite of a few disadvantages. We hope that within a short time our missionaries may labor in that country unhindered. In the United States we also have a work going on among the Mexican people with great success.

I shall not attempt to give any further report, but I do wish to testify that the missionaries are working hard; that they are happy, and that they are safe. I don't believe that they are in any danger in Mexico. They are treated courteously in all cases. I testify to you this afternoon that I know that this is not the work of any man. I know it is not the work of President Grant, nor is it the work of President Pratt, with reference to the Mexican mission, but that it is indeed the work of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. This is my testimony, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER LEVI EDGAR YOUNG

Of the First Council of Seventy

My brethren and sisters: The significant and reassuring fact about this conference is that we are growing in a testimony of the truth of the work of almighty God. There is something substantial and unimpeachable about these meetings, for they indicate that we as a people are growing in grace and spiritual power, and that some day we will emerge into our highest selves, and vindicate by our spiritual lives the supreme ideals for which we stand. We appreciate the fact that we are citizens of the United States. This government under which we live was brought into being by the highest concepts of the finest types of men. When Christopher Columbus landed on American soil in October, 1892, he uttered a prayer which is significant and prophetic. From the Latin I give it to you in translation:

"O, Lord God, eternal and omnipotent, by thy sacred word, the heaven, the earth, and the sea, thou hast created. Blessed and glorified be thy name, praise be thy majesty, which has been made worthy through thy humble servant, that thy sacred name be recognized and proclaimed in this other part of the world."

We are told in a book of holy scriptures, namely, the Book of Mormon, that a man, chosen from among the Gentiles should discover this continent and the remnant of the people of Israel. This was Christopher Columbus, and we are further told that others would follow him, and that this land should be dedicated to the highest principles of liberty. When the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Plymouth Rock they drew up a compact which was fundamental to the Constitution of the United States. This compact in part reads:

"In ye name of God, Amen. We whose names are written, the loyall subjects of our dread soveraigne Lord, King James, by ye grace of God, of Great Britaine, France, & Ireland, King, defender of ye faith, &c., haveing undertaken, for ye glorie of God, and advancements of ye Christian faith, and honour of our king & countrie, a voyage to plant ye first colonie in ye Northerne parts of Viriginia, doe by these presents solemnly & mutually, in ye presence of God, and one of another, covenant & combine ourselves together into a civil body politick, for our better ordering & preservation & furtherance of ye ends aforesaid: and by vertue hereof to enact, constitute, and frame such just & equall lawes, ordinances, actes, constitutions, & offices, from time to time, as shall be thought most meete. * * *"

We Latter-day Saints believe in the sacredness of the Mayflower compact, and we hold very reverently in our hearts the Constitution of the United States. This document is the greatest expression of government that has come forth in all history, and its principles, if lived up to, will change the political and civic life of the world. The beautiful thing about the American government is that it is an expression of the lives of the people, and if the people live magnanimous and Christian-like lives, so will our Government become greater and greater. There are problems today to be solved, and I consider that the greatest ills of society are: first, the unprecedented challenge of authority and disrespect for law; secondly, hatred between man and man; and thirdly, the excessive search for pleasure as the aim of life. I believe that we people should be the greatest lovers of the law of any people living, for just law expresses our ideals and concepts of life. We should dedicate our lives to the highest political and civic truths and we should grow in the abiding thought that man is made in the image of God; that the Christian virtues are the highest codes of ethics; and that immortality and the establishment of God's kingdom on the earth are illuminated because of the restored Priesthood which we hold. With such ideals we will be able to contribute more to the solution of the problems of the world than any other people. I pray that we may not only see the problems of human society that lie before us, but that we will be able to meet them with a potency that comes as a result of the deepest faith in almighty God and his purposes. May we not sing:

"Higher yet and higher,
Out of clouds in night,
Nearer yet and nearer,
Rising to the light."

Brother Junius F. Wells has handed to me the following memorandum that I feel sure will be of interest:

PRESIDING AUTHORITIES

"There have been sustained since the Church was organized, seven presidents, 19 counselors in the First Presidency, 54 apostles, 5 presiding patriarchs, 34 of the First Council of Seventy, and 14 of the Presiding Bishopric. A total of 133 besides the three witnesses to the Book of Mormon."

A FEW WORDS ON DEBT

Apropos of my remarks to the effect that we should not run in debt or mortgage our future, I will read a poem that has been handed to me, written by Stoddard King:

SAID THE PIEMAN

A study of pie salesmanship will be made by the National Pie Bakers Association.—News item.

"The story of Simon called Simple
Is one everybody has read;
It is sweet, it is sad, and it tells of a lad
Who wasn't quite right in the head.
When he sought to buy pie of the pieman,
Poor Simon was hopeful but rash,
For he childishly thought that a pie could be bought
Without any transfer of cash.

"But we mustn't speak harshly of Simon,
Who was simply ahead of his time—
Today he could buy a whole carload of pie
By merely investing a dime.
The up-to-date salesman would land him—
Or, rather more likely, his wife—
By letting him pay a few cents right away
And installments the rest of his life.

"It's the way they sell pins and pianos,
And paintings, potatoes and pants—
For a few dollars down you can buy the whole town—
As a prospect you haven't a chance.
The fact that you're broke doesn't matter,
Your only escape is to die—
And as long as they take all the money you make,
You might as well spend it for pie!"

U. S. COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION

I am pleased to state that sitting on the stand Sunday, at the opening session of our conference, was the Commissioner of Education of the United States of America, Honorable John J. Tigert, and he expressed himself as very well pleased with our wonderful gathering.

PASSING OF PRESIDENT THOMAS P. COTTAM

Since our last conference one of the most faithful and diligent of all workers in the Church, for many years a counselor in the presidency of the St. George stake, and subsequently the president of the St. George temple, Brother Thomas P. Cottam, has passed away. He was one of the noblemen of the earth, one of the most faithful, loyal, true, upright Latter-day Saints that it has ever fallen to my lot to know.

EVANGELINE BOOTH ON PROHIBITION

I had intended to read something here from Evangeline Booth, Commander of the Salvation Army in this country, but, like the congressmen, I will beg leave to have it put in my speech when it is printed in the Conference Pamphlet, or when it appears in the Deseret News. It was published in the Literary Digest of March 20, 1926:

"Park benches are emptied of their drunken derelicts, and the men who used to make their wives and children the victims of their thirst and besotted rage have sobered up and returned to work to feed their families. And that one fact, believes Evangeline Booth, Commander of the Salvation Army in the United States, is the most convincing argument in favor of prohibition and against the return of the saloon. She is sure, however, that the Eighteenth Amendment is so firmly entrenched in public favor that it will never be repealed, and equally sure that it can be enforced. Such drinking as is indulged in now, she asserts, is a fad of the idle rich which will die out, or else society—society, that is, with the big 'S'—will be turned upside down and furnish rum wastrels for the Salvation Army to salvage. Miss Booth's utterance is no careless statement of fact and possibility, for there is no more seasoned worker among the submerged tenth than she, none among the world's greatest moral clean-up organizations more familiar with the sodden aspects of drunkenness and debauchery and their devastating influence on the home. It was while convalescing from an attack of appendicitis that she issued her statement on prohibition, which is quoted in part by the New York Times as follows:

"After all these years of hard fighting to protect the home, emancipate the neglected children and wipe from our national escutcheon the disgrace of the evils arising from drink, it is good to find that the people of America have come to a correct judgment concerning the drink evil. It is unthinkable that the country will ever return to the deadly saloon system and a resumption of liquor vending.

"Surely it will be conceded that the Salvation Army knows something about the evils of strong drink. From the day my father founded the organization in England to combat the degradation and vice that are inevitable consequences of liquor drinking, the Salvation Army has held rigidly to its purpose, and feels that it had a great deal to do with the enactment of prohibition in America.

"It is an illogical thing to say that because a new law has not worked like magic it is best to cast it aside and return to the original state of vice which, because of its awfulness, prompted the enactment of that law. Such a thing would make civilization march backward. It is rather the duty of the citizen, the State and the Government to find ways and means to make the law work out its unquestioned benefits to humanity. It can be done. It is being done.

"Enemies of the Volstead Law waste their time when they try to tell organizations like the Salvation Army that national prohibition will not work. Vast changes have come about, and to undo them would be to strike a blow at every fireside and every industry in this country.

"Why try to tell the Salvation Army that the park benches are crowded with drunken men, as they were before prohibition when we used to gather them in on Thanksgiving Day, for example, and fight to salvage them? They are gone. The benches still remain, but the occupants are not drunk any more; they are climbing upward to better things while the public rushes by all unheeding. Why try to tell us that workingmen spend their wages before their families can get the money for food, and that men beat their wives and children as in the old days? It simply is not the case.

"If the idle rich persist in making a sport of the prohibition law, the day may come when the boulevardiers, vastly in the minority, will have to be salvaged out of their attractive places for secret drinking and rescued, if possible, by the Salvation Army, just as the poor saloon victim used to be. In that event the sober and progressive working classes will automatically become the aristocrats, and society, so-called, will be turned upside down in its system of organization.

"In other words, drinking and flouting the prohibition law are a fad and will die out."

In testimony of Miss Booth's experience and of her fitness to pass judgment on prohibition, Arthur J. Davis, State Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, says, as he is quoted in the same paper:

"She led her band of salvationists against the drink evil in the United States and consistently opposed the saloon while she salvaged its wrecks and bound up the wounds of its victims. Evangeline Booth has been knocked down by drunkards and so badly injured that she spent months in hospitals. In the early days of her work in New York slums salvationists were murdered by drunkards. She, therefore, knows what she is talking about when she attacks the illegal liquor traffic and upholds prohibition. For seventy years her organization has fought the saloon and she knows the advantages of its banishment."

A study was made in Munich by a professor in which it was discovered that in that great beer-drinking city seventy-two out of every one hundred babies that were born there were unsound. The same professor visited prohibition Maine and found that 71.5 per cent of the babies there were born sound. There have been born to me twelve babies and forty-four grandchildren, all of whom were sound, and I am convinced that among the Latter-day Saints who are observing the Word of Wisdom not more than one to two per cent of the babies are born unsound. And yet, I quoted from an article published in one of our local newspapers that if any woman believed that tobacco would injure her child she would not be guilty of using it.

ON MOVING FROM PLACE TO PLACE

I would like to appeal to the Latter-day Saints who are thinking of moving from one place to another, from Canada on the north to Mexico on the south (I believe that four hundred miles north of Lethbridge is the farthest north, or the closest to the north pole, any Latter-day Saint has gone), that before moving they do some consulting with or writing to the presidents of stakes and others in the section where they contemplate going, and ascertain if they can identify themselves with some of the regular organizations of the Church; instead of going beyond the bounds of the Church, and then writing and asking us to please send some missionaries to hunt them up; that they really do belong to the Church, but that they have gotten so far away everybody seems to have forgotten them. Move where you cannot be forgotten and where there is an organized stake or ward of the Church. There is plenty of opportunity in the organized stakes of Zion for those who want to change their location here in Utah and in Idaho and in Canada.

ON SMOKING CIGARETTES

There are two items which I had intended to quote here this afternoon, but I shall not do so; instead, as before stated, I will adopt the system of the congressmen, and beg leave to print.

I quote a statement which profoundly impressed me, from Mr. Henry Ford's pamphlet:

"Several of my young acquaintances are in their graves who gave promise of making happy and useful citizens," declares Luther Burbank, the wizard of the plant and vegetable kingdom whose experiments have caused the civilized world to wonder, and whose experiments have benefited the civilized world by millions upon millions, in increase of prosperity, by the increase in the various things that he has done in improvement in flowers and in seeds and in fruits and in the redemption of the cactus in Arizona, taking the thorns; he is in very deed the wizard of the agricultural world and one of the benefactors of mankind. He says: 'And there is no question whatever that cigarettes alone were the cause of their destruction.' No boy living would commence the use of cigarettes if he knew what a useless, soulless, worthless thing they would make of him."

I quote from David Starr Jordan, President Emeritus of the Stanford University:

"The boy who smokes cigarettes need not be anxious about his future. He has none."

BENEDICTION

I rejoice beyond measure in the rich outpouring of the Spirit of the Lord during our conference, from the first session until the present time; and, insofar as God has endowed me with ability and power and his Priesthood, I bless the people. I bless each and every soul who has taken part in this conference, in singing, in praying and in speaking, and I bear witness to you that they have spoken under the inspiration of the living God, and that they are entitled to the blessings of God. I bless the people of the Latter-day Saints who have come here and listened so patiently and in such great numbers to the testimonies which have been borne. May God's choicest blessings attend all Israel, and the honest world over, and I ask it in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir and congregation sang, "For the strength of the hills we bless thee;" and the benediction was pronounced by Fred A. Caine, president of the Idaho Falls stake of Zion.

The conference adjourned for six months.

Professor Anthony C. Lund conducted the singing, assisted by B. Cecil Gates; accompaniments and interludes on the great organ were played by Edward P. Kimball, Tracy Y. Cannon, Alexander Schreiner and Frank W. Asper. Stenographic reports were made in the Tabernacle by Frank W. Otterstrom, assisted by Joseph Anderson; in the Assembly Hall by Frederick G. Barker.

WHENCE THIS GOSPEL WE TEACH?

Read:

By OSBORNE J. P. WIDTSOE

“This book prepared by Elder Osborne J. P. Widtsoc, dealing with the important subject of the Restoration of the everlasting Gospel, should be read and its contents carefully considered by those who are seeking after truth. It treats the Restoration clearly, and places before the people many things that have not been generally considered heretofore. It will be a means of strengthening the faith of the youth of Israel and will impart information that is invaluable. May the spirit of truth accompany the work and rest upon all those who diligently read it with a desire to learn of and profit by the Restoration of the Gospel!”

Discourses of Brigham Young

This Great Book Should be in Every Home Library

No Latter-day Saint home library is complete without the unique volume, "Discourses of Brigham Young." Thousands still living were thrilled with the inspired wisdom of the great colonizer. They heard the words fall from his lips that were a comfort and a guide to them in their daily living.

Those same words, now in print, can help and inspire the new generations. The youth should be encouraged to read this great book. It will help them to know Brigham Young as they have never known him before. They can appraise his doctrine, not by tradition or garbled account, but by the perusal of sermons accurately transcribed.

"Discourses of Brigham Young" will be sent to any address for $2.50 postpaid. Special price to members of Priesthood Quorums—$2.00 postpaid. Orders will be filled mail C. O. D. at $2.00 each, if desired.

WHAT DID JOSEPH SMITH KNOW ABOUT SCIENCE?

Read:

Joseph Smith as Scientis

By JOHN A. WIDTSOE

"In the life of every person, who receives a higher education, in or out of schools, there is a time when there seems to be opposition between science and religion; between man-made and God-made knowledge. The struggle for reconciliation between the contending forces is not an easy one. It cuts deep into the soul and usually leaves scars that ache while life endures. There are thousands of young people in the Church today, and hundreds of thousands throughout the world, who are struggling to set themselves right with the God above and the world about them. It is for these young people, primarily, that this book has been written."

Ninety-Seventh Semi-Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

FIRST DAY

The 97th Semi-Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was held in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah, commencing Sunday morning at 10 o'clock, October 3, 1926.

President Heber J. Grant presided. There was a large overflow meeting in the Assembly Hall, and in the Tabernacle every seat was occupied, with large numbers standing in the side aisles and other available places of the main hall and galleries. The proceedings were broadcasted by radio for the benefit of the general public.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES OF THE CHURCH PRESENT

Of the First Presidency: Heber J. Grant, Anthony W. Ivins and Charles W. Nibley.

Of the Council of the Twelve: Rudger Clawson, Reed Smoot, George Albert Smith, George F. Richards, Orson F. Whitney, David O. McKay, Joseph Fielding Smith,* Stephen L. Richards, Richard R. Lyman, Melvin J. Ballard, John A. Widtsoe.

Presiding Patriarch: Hyrum G. Smith.

Of the First Council of Seventy: B. H. Roberts, J. Golden Kimball, Rulon S. Wells, Joseph W. McMurrin, Charles H. Hart, Levi Edgar Young, Rey L. Pratt.

Of the Presiding Bishopric: Sylvester Q. Cannon, David A. Smith, John Wells.

OFFICERS AND OTHER AUTHORITIES PRESENT

Church Historian and Recorder: Joseph Fielding Smith, and the following assistants: Andrew Jenson, Brigham H. Roberts, A. William Lund, Junius F. Wells.

Presidents of stakes with their counselors were well represented from the ninety-six stakes of Zion.

The Priesthood Quorums, including the high priests, seventies and elders, and bishops and their counselors, from all parts of the Church, were in attendance; officers of the auxiliary organizations both of men and of women were present, and also members of the Board of Education.

Mission Presidents were in attendance, as follow: Brigham H. Roberts, Eastern States; John H. Taylor, Northern States; Samuel O.

*James E. Talmage absent, presiding over the European mission.

Bennion, Central States; John M. Knight, Western States; Joseph W. McMurrin, California; Brigham S. Young, Northwestern States; Joseph Quinney, Jr., Canada; John G. Allred, Northcentral States; Charles A. Callis, Southern States; Rey L. Pratt, Mexico; Benjamin Goddard, Bureau of Information, Temple Block, Salt Lake City, Utah.

President Grant announced that Elder Charles H. Hart, of the First Council of Seventy, would preside at the Assembly Hall overflow meeting.

The choir and congregation sang, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Edward J. Wood, president of the Alberta stake.

The hymn, "An angel from on high," was sung by Cyrus Martin, Irene Rich and the Tabernacle choir.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I am very thankful indeed for the opportunity of meeting with the Saints in another General Conference. I rejoice in the very splendid turnout that we see here today, and realize that, even with the overflow meeting in the Assembly Hall, there are many who will be disappointed in not getting room in this building or the adjoining one. But it is estimated that fully one hundred thousand people will hear these services today over the radio.

I understand that the amplifier installed here will make it entirely unnecessary for me to raise my voice beyond that which would be needed in an ordinary hall. I am very glad of this for the reason that exerting oneself in order to be heard is very much more of a strain than to talk in just an ordinary voice. I should be very glad to know if any in this audience are failing to hear distinctly what I am saying at the present time. If so, will they kindly raise their hands. I discover that everybody is hearing my remarks, and I am not talking any louder than would be necessary in a room containing only a few hundred people.

I earnestly and sincerely desire the faith and prayers of the Latter-day Saints to attend not only myself but all of the speakers during this conference, that they may be inspired by the Lord to say those things which will be calculated in their nature to encourage the Saints to renewed diligence in discharging the duties and obligations that rest upon them as members of the Church.

CHANGES IN OFFICERS

It will be interesting to you, no doubt, to know regarding the changes that have taken place since our last conference.

The Wayne stake now has a new president—Brother William F. Webster.

Mission presidents released and appointed during the past six months:

Mark V. Coombs has been released as president of the Tongan mission, and J. A. Cahoon appointed to succeed him.

Eugene J. Neff has been released as president of the Hawaiian mission, and William M. Waddoups appointed to succeed him.

J. Wyley Sessions has been released as president of the South African mission, and Samuel Martin appointed as his successor.

Melvin J. Ballard has been released as president of the South American mission, and Karl B. R. Stoof appointed as his successor.

Brother Kenneth L. Haymore has been released as acting-president of the Mexican mission on account of the return of Rey L. Pratt, president of that mission, from South America.

Hyrum W. Valentine has been appointed to succeed Fred Tadge as president of the German-Austrian mission.

The following new wards have been organized:

Eden ward, Minidoka stake; Emerson ward, Minidoka stake, Hazelton ward, Minidoka stake; Ogden 19th ward, Weber stake; Conda ward, Idaho stake; Wendell ward, Blaine stake; Jewett ward, Young stake; Ely ward, Nevada stake.

NEW STAKES ORGANIZED

Lyman stake, formerly a part of Woodruff stake, President Melvin H. Rollins.

Nevada stake, formerly a part of North Weber stake, Carl K. Conrad, president.

Bishops who have died: William C. Hegstrom of Central ward, Bannock stake, and Bishop John A. Hunt of St. Charles, Bear Lake stake.

At the present time we have 96 stakes of Zion, 915 wards and 74 independent branches, making 989 wards and branches. And we have 27 missions.

ALMA'S CRY FOR REPENTANCE

I will read from the 29th chapter of Alma in the Book of Mormon:

"O that I were an angel, and could have the wish of mine heart, that I might go forth and speak with the trump of God, with a voice to shake the earth, and cry repentance unto every people!

"Yea, I would declare unto every soul, as with the voice of thunder, repentance and the plan of redemption, that they should repent and come unto our God, that there might not be more sorrow upon all the face of the earth.

"But behold, I am a man, and do sin in my wish; for I ought to be content with the things which the Lord hath allotted unto me.

"I ought not to harrow up in my desires, the firm decree of a just God, for I know that he granteth unto men according to their desire, whether it be unto death or unto life; yea, I know that he allotteth unto men according to their wills, whether they be unto salvation or unto destruction.

"Yea, and I know that good and evil have come before all men; he that knoweth not good from evil is blameless; but he that knoweth good and evil, to him it is given according to his desires, whether he desireth good or evil, life or death, joy or remorse of conscience.

"Now, seeing that I know these things, why should I desire more than to perform the work to which I have been called?"

"Why should I desire that I were an angel, that I could speak unto all the ends of the earth?"

"For behold, the Lord doth grant unto all nations, of their own nation and tongue, to teach his word, yea, in wisdom, all that he seeth fit that they should have; therefore we see that the Lord doth counsel in wisdom, according to that which is just and true.

"I know that which the Lord hath commanded me, and I glory in it. I do not glory of myself, but I glory in that which the Lord hath commanded me; yea, and this is my glory, that perhaps I may be an instrument in the hands of God to bring some soul to repentance; and this is my joy."

THE JOY OF MISSIONARY WORK

I believe that every Latter-day Saint who has received a testimony of the divinity of the work in which we are engaged has this same feeling that Alma had—a desire that all the world might hear the testimony of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. When men and women receive a testimony of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith, they are anxious that all the world should have that same knowledge and faith. They are anxious that the gospel should go to every honest soul. And there is no other labor in all the world that brings to a human heart, judging from my own personal experience, more joy, peace and serenity than proclaiming the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. I remember that while I was laboring in Japan, on account of my failure to learn the language, I was not entirely happy in my work there. I remember going out into the woods, kneeling down and praying to God that when my work was finished there I would appreciate it if I were called to the British Isles to succeed Brother Francis M. Lyman. Shortly after uttering that prayer I received a cable: "Come home on the first vessel." When I arrived home President Smith told me that they had decided to send me to Europe to succeed Brother Lyman. He said, "We realize that the two years or more that you have been in Japan have been anything but satisfactory from the standpoint of the joy that comes into the hearts of the missionaries in bringing souls to a knowledge of the truth, and we want you to have at least a year of real, genuine, missionary experience." When I went into his office and bade him goodbye, and said, "I will see you in a year," he said, "We have decided to make it a year and a half." I said, "Multiply it by two and say nothing about it, and it will please me," and that is exactly what he did. I was there a little over three years, and never have I had sweeter joy, more genuine satisfaction in my life than during those three years, when I had no thought except the spreading of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

THE WORTH OF SOULS

We have recorded in the 18th section of the Doctrine and Covenants the following:

"Remember, the worth of souls is great in the sight of God;

"For, behold, the Lord your Redeemer suffered death in the flesh; wherefore, he suffered the pain of all men, that all men might repent and come unto him.

"And he hath risen again from the dead, that he might bring all men unto him, on conditions of repentance.

"And how great is his joy in the soul that repenteth!

"Wherefore, you are called to cry repentance unto this people.

"And if it so be that you should labor all your days in crying repentance unto this people and bring, save it be one soul unto me, how great shall be your joy with him in the kingdom of my father!

"And now, if your joy will be great with one soul that you have brought unto me into the kingdom of my father, how great will be your joy if you should bring many souls unto me!

"Behold, you have my gospel before you, and my rock, and my salvation.

"Ask the Father in my name, in faith, believing that you shall receive, and you shall have the Holy Ghost, which manifesteth all things which are expedient unto the children of men.

"And if you have not faith, hope and charity, you can do nothing. * * *

"Behold, Jesus Christ is the name which is given of the Father, and there is none other name given whereby man can be saved."

The foregoing revelation was given through the Prophet Joseph Smith to Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, and they were instructed to seek out twelve apostles who should have the spirit of the mission to go forth and proclaim the gospel of glad tidings which the voice out of the heavens declared to the Prophet Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon, as follows:

"And this is the gospel, the glad tidings which the voice out of the heavens bore record unto us—

"That he came into the world, even Jesus, to be crucified for the world, and to bear the sins of the world, and to sanctify the world, and to cleanse it from all unrighteousness;

"That through him all might be saved whom the Father had put into his power and made by him." (Doc. and Cov. 76:40-42.)

MEN HAVE SEEN CHRIST IN OUR DAY

In that same revelation we find, and I have repeated it time and time again:

"And now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him: That he lives!

"For we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the only begotten of the father—

"That by him, and through him, and of him, the worlds are and were created, and the inhabitants thereof are begotten sons and daughters unto God."

We have this testimony to bear to the world, that men in our day have seen Jesus Christ; that he has restored to the earth the gospel of life and salvation; that in the Kirtland temple the Savior appeared to Oliver Cowdery and Joseph Smith, also Moses, Elias and Elijah and that the keys of every dispensation of the gospel were committed into the hands of those two men. They were given this authority and it is a source of great joy. (Doc. and Cov. 110.)

WHAT THE CHURCH IS DOING TO PROCLAIM THE GOSPEL

I rejoice in announcing that the Church is doing more today in the spreading of the gospel, and it has a larger body of missionaries in the field proclaiming the gospel, than at any other time in its history. A year ago we called for volunteers of men of maturity, men of experience and testimony, men who were seasoned in the gospel, to go out into the field for a period of six months. Hundreds responded to that call, and I have listened to some of the most remarkable and wonderful testimonies of the manifestations and blessings of the Lord to those men, as I have conversed with them upon their return home, that I have ever heard. The signs verily follow the believer in this Church, and people receive the witness of the Spirit wherever the gospel is preached.

THE COMMAND TO PREACH THE GOSPEL SUPREME

I have culled out a few quotations from the Doctrine and Covenants that I would like to read here:

"Go ye into all the world, preach the gospel to every creature, acting in the authority which I have given you, baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost."

"And he that believeth shall be blest with signs following, even as it is written."—(Section 68: verses 8, 10.)

"And this gospel shall be preached unto every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people.

"And the servants of God shall go forth, saying with a loud voice: Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come;

"And worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of water."—(Section 133:37-39.)

"I the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."—(Section 82:10.)

The one supreme thing that devolves upon me, upon you and upon every Latter-day Saint is the preaching of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, in public and in private, and above all to proclaim the gospel in our lives, by being absolutely honest in keeping the commandments of the Lord.

WHO IS FITTED TO TEACH THE GOSPEL?

No man can teach the Latter-day Saints under the inspiration of the Spirit of the living God, or proclaim to the world, that there has come a commandment from the Lord in our day for men to observe the ancient law of tithing, unless that man is a conscientious and honest tithe-payer. On the other hand, the inspiration of the living God attends those men who proclaim the law of tithing when they are obeying it themselves. No man can, under the inspiration of the Spirit of the Lord, warm the hearts of the Saints, or benefit the people of the world, by proclaiming the Word of Wisdom, who does not obey it himself. But the man who obeys the Word of Wisdom can touch the hearts of the Latter-day Saints in proclaiming that wonderful revelation that the Lord has given to us for our health and our benefit, and above all that has been given to us with a promise attached thereto. I desire to read that revelation from first to last:

THE WORD OF WISDOM

“A Word of Wisdom for the benefit of the council of High Priests, assembled in Kirtland, and the Church, also the saints in Zion—

“To be sent greeting; not by commandment or constraint, but by revelation and the word of wisdom, showing forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation of all saints in the last days—”

And let me say right here that I am convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that if the Latter-day Saints had observed the Word of Wisdom, and if the money that has been worse than wasted for tea, coffee, tobacco and liquor, had been utilized for missionary service, we would have had the millions of dollars for the work of the Lord that has been expended for that which the Lord Almighty says is not good for man.

“Given for a principle with promise, adapted to the capacity of the weak and the weakest of all saints, who are or can be called saints.

“Behold, verily, thus saith the Lord unto you: In consequence of evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days, I have warned you, and forewarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation—

“That inasmuch as any man drinketh wine or strong drink among you, behold it is not good, neither meet in the sight of your Father, only in assembling yourselves together to offer up your sacraments before him.

“And, behold, this should be wine, yea, pure wine of the grape of the vine, of your own make.

“And, again, strong drinks are not for the belly, but for the washing of your bodies.

“And, again, tobacco is not for the body, neither for the belly, and is not good for man, but is an herb for bruises and all sick cattle to be used with judgment and skill.

“And, again, hot drinks are not for the body or belly.

“And again, verily I say unto you, all wholesome herbs God hath ordained for the constitution, nature and use of man—

“Every herb in the season thereof, and every fruit in the season thereof; all these to be used with prudence and thanksgiving.

“Yea, flesh also of beasts and of fowls of the air, I, the Lord, have ordained for the use of man with thanksgiving; nevertheless they are to be used sparingly;

“And it is pleasing unto me that they should not be used, only in times of winter, or of cold, or famine.

“All grain is ordained for the use of man and of beasts, to be the staff of life, not only for man but for the beasts of the field, and the fowls of heaven, and all wild animals that run or creep on the earth;

“And these hath God made for the use of man only in times of famine and excess of hunger.

“All grain is good for the food of man; as also the fruit of the vine; that which yieldeth fruit, whether in the ground or above the ground.

“Nevertheless, wheat for man, and corn for the ox, and oats for the horse, and rye for the fowls and for swine, and for all beasts of the field, and barley for all useful animals, and for mild drinks, as also other grain.

“And all saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their navel and marrow in their bones;

"And shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures;

"And shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint.

Let me read again:

"I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when you do not what I say, ye have no promise."

PROMISES OF GOD CONDITIONED ON OBEDIENCE

There is no promise made to you or to me or to any Latter-day Saint that the destroying angel shall pass us by, or that we shall have hidden treasures of knowledge, unless we obey the Word of Wisdom, and the way above all other ways for men and women to teach their children the necessity of obeying the Word of Wisdom is by obeying it themselves.

"There is a law irrevocably decreed in heaven before the foundations of this world, upon which all blessings are predicated—

I believe beyond the shadow of a doubt that there are hundreds and thousands of Latter-day Saints who but for the obeying of the Word of Wisdom would not be here today. When they have been attacked by serious diseases and have been in a critical condition physically, having obeyed that law, having fulfilled an irrevocable law of God, he was bound to bestow the promised blessings, and they have come to the afflicted ones.

PARENTS MUST TEACH THEIR CHILDREN BY EXAMPLE

We find recorded in section 68:

"And again, inasmuch as parents have children in Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized, that teach them not to understand the doctrine of repentance, faith in Christ the Son of the living God, and of baptism and the gift of the Holy Ghost by the laying on of the hands, when eight years old, the sin be upon the heads of the parents."

"For this shall be a law unto the inhabitants of Zion, or in any of her stakes which are organized.

"And their children shall be baptized for the remission of their sins when eight years old, and receive the laying on of the hands."

"And they shall also teach their children to pray, and to walk uprightly before the Lord."

And the best way in the world to teach your children to pray and to walk uprightly before the Lord is to pray yourselves, thus setting an example of prayer, and to walk uprightly before the Lord yourselves. When a man fails to be honest as a tithe-payer, when he fails to observe the Word of Wisdom, the teaching of his children to obey those laws will have but very little effect. There is more in example than can possibly come by teaching. No amount of knowledge will save a man; no amount of marvelous revelations and visions and dreams will save a man. But the keeping of the commandments of the Lord and the obeying of those things which the Lord has revealed to us for our salvation, will give us a power and influence with our children for good, and we will be able to make an impression upon their hearts that will keep them in the straight and narrow path which leads to life eternal.

JOSIAH QUINCY'S TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH SMITH

When I picked up the memorandum that is supplied to me of the songs that are to be sung here this morning, I found that the first song that we were to sing today was, "We thank thee, O God, for a Prophet," and I remembered and immediately hunted up the quotation, a very remarkable tribute to the Prophet Joseph Smith, from Josiah Quincy, at one time the mayor of the great city of Boston; and while it has been read time and time again in our hearing, and published often at home and abroad, I thought I would like to read to you again the wonderful testimony of Josiah Quincy, from a book entitled, The Figures of the Past. He says:

"It is by no means improbable that some future text-book for the use of generations yet unborn will contain a question something like this: 'What historic American of the nineteenth century has wielded the most powerful influence upon the destinies of his country-men?' And it is by no means impossible that the answer to this interrogatory may be thus written: 'Joseph Smith, the "Mormon" Prophet.' And the reply, absurd as it doubtless seems to most men now living, may be an obvious commonplace to their descendants. History deals in surprises and paradoxes quite as startling as this. The man who established a religion in this age of free debate, who was and is today accepted by hundreds of thousands as a direct emissary from the Most High—such a rare human being is not to be disposed of by pelting his memory with unsavory epithets. Fanatic, imposter, charlatan, he may have been; but these hard names furnish no solution to the problem he presents to us. Fanatics and imposters are living and dying every day, and their memory is buried with them; but the wonderful influence which this founder of a religion exerted and still exerts throws him into a relief before us, not as a rogue to be incriminated, but as a phenomenon to be explained. The most vital questions Americans are asking each other today have to do with this man and what he has left us. * * A generation other than mine must deal with these questions. Burning questions they are, which must give a prominent place in the history of the country to that sturdy self-asserter whom I visited at Nauvoo. Joseph Smith, claiming to be an inspired teacher, faced adversity such as few men have been called to meet, enjoyed a brief season of prosperity such as few men have ever attained, and finally, forty-three days after I saw him, went cheerfully to a martyr's death. When he surrendered his person to Governor Ford, in order to prevent the shedding of blood, the prophet had a presentiment of what was before him, 'I am going like a lamb to the slaughter,' he is reported to have said, 'but I am as calm as a Summer's morning. I have a conscience void of offense and shall die innocent.'"

(And a further quotation: "And it shall yet be said that I was murdered in cold blood," which is not in Josiah Quincy's statement.)

"I have no theory to advance respecting this extra-ordinary man. I shall simply give the facts of my intercourse with him.

"A fine looking man is what the passer-by would instinctively have murmured upon meeting the remarkable individual who had fashioned the mold, which was to shape the feelings of so many thousands of his fellow mortals. But Smith was more than this, and one could not resist the impression that capacity and resource were natural to his stalwart person. I have already mentioned the resemblance he bore to Elisha R. Potter of Rhode Island, whom I met in Washington in 1826. The likeness was not such as would be recognized in a picture but rather one that would be felt in a grave emergency.

"Of all men I have met these two seemed best endowed with that kindly faculty which directs, as by intrinsic right, the feeble or confused souls who are looking for guidance.

"We then went on to talk of politics. Smith recognized the curse and iniquity of slavery, though he opposed the methods of the abolitionists. His plan was for the nation to pay for the slaves from the sale of the public lands. 'Congress,' he said, 'should be compelled to take this course, by petitions from all parts of the country; but the petitioners must disclaim all alliance not recognized by the Constitution and which foment insurrection.' It may be worth while to remark that Smith's plan was publicly advocated eleven years later by one who mixed so much practical shrewdness with his lofty philosophy. In 1855, when men's minds had been moved to their depths on the question of slavery, Ralph Waldo Emerson declared, that it should be met in accordance 'with the interest of the south and with the settled conscience of the north. It is not really a great task, a great fight for this country to accomplish, to buy the property of the planter, as the British nation bought the West Indian slaves.' He further says that the United States will be brought to give every inch of their public lands for a purpose like this.' We who can look back upon the terrible cost of the fratricidal war which put an end to slavery, now say that such a solution of the difficulty would have been worthy a Christian statesman. But if the retired scholar was in advance of his time when he advocated this disposition of the public property in 1855, what shall I say of the political and religious leader who had committed himself, in print as well as in conversation, to the same course in 1844? If the atmosphere of men's opinions were stirred by such a proposition when war clouds were discernible in the sky, was it not a statesmanlike word eleven years earlier when the heavens looked tranquil and beneficent?"

It was a statesmanlike and an inspired proposition from a man who was in very deed a prophet of the true and living God.

"General Smith proceeded to unfold still further his views upon politics. He denounced the Missouri Compromise as an unjustifiable concession for the benefit of slavery. It was Henry Clay's bid for the presidency. Dr. Goforth might have spared himself the trouble of coming to Nauvoo to electioneer for a duellist who would fire at John Randolph, but was not brave enough to protect the Saints in their rights as American citizens. Clay told his (Smith's) people to go to the wilds of Oregon and set up a government of their own. Oh, yes, the Saints might go into the wilderness and obtain the justice of the Indians, which imbecile, time-serving politicians would not give them in the land of freedom and equality. The prophet then talked of the details of government. He thought the number of members admitted to the lower house of the national legislature should be reduced. A crowd only darkened counsel and impeded business. A member for every half million of population would be ample. The powers of the president should be increased. He should have authority to put down rebellion in a state, without waiting for the request of any governor; for it might happen that the governor himself would be the leader of the rebels. It is needless to remark how later events showed the executive weakness that Smith pointed out—a weakness which cost millions of treasure. * * *

"Born in the lowest ranks of poverty, without book learning and, with the homeliest of all human names, he had made himself at the age of 39 a power upon the earth. Of the multitudinous family of Smiths, none had so won human hearts and shaped human lives as this Joseph. His influence, whether for good or evil, is potent today, and the end is not yet.

"I have endeavored to give the details of my visit to the 'Mormon' prophet with absolute accuracy. If the reader does not know just what to make of Joseph Smith, I cannot help him out of the difficulty. I myself stand helpless before the puzzle."

JOSEPH SMITH'S PROPHECY OF THE MIGRATION WEST

The Latter-day Saints do not stand helpless before the puzzle. They rejoice in the wonderful inspiration of the man who prophesied that "the Latter-day Saints would continue to suffer much affliction and many would be put to death by their persecutors, and others would lose their lives in consequence of exposure or disease, but some would live to go and make settlements, build cities and see the Saints become a mighty people in the midst of the Rocky Mountains."

What kind of a place was the Rocky Mountains when this remarkable prophecy was uttered? One of the greatest American statesmen, Daniel Webster, is reported to have said regarding it:

"What do we want with this vast, worthless area? This region of savages and wild beasts, of deserts of shifting sands and whirlwinds of dust, of cactus and prairie dogs? To what use could we ever hope to put these great deserts or those endless mountain ranges, impenetrable and covered to their very base with eternal snow? What can we ever hope to do with the western coast of three thousand miles, rock-bound, cheerless, uninviting and not a harbor on it? Mr. President, I will never vote one cent from the public treasury to place the Pacific coast one inch nearer Boston than it now is."

GOVERNMENT PLACED STAMP OF DIVINITY ON PROPHET'S UTTERANCE

I rejoice in an individual testimony of the truth of the statements of Joseph Smith, that his name should be had for good and evil in all parts of the world; that the time would come when not only a city, a county and a state should be arrayed against the handful of people called "Mormons," but the day would come when the whole United States of America should be arrayed against them. And the army of the United States was sent against them, and the government of the United States did confiscate all of the property belonging to the Church. Day after day and month after month during the litigation for the return of the Church property I picked up the paper and read, "The United States of America versus the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints." And I have laid the paper down and said, "Thank the Lord that the United States have placed the stamp of divinity upon the utterances of the Prophet Joseph Smith."

THE GREAT OBLIGATION OF THE SAINTS TO DECLARE THE RESTORATION

Our boys and girls go out into the world with a love of the gospel, young, inexperienced men and women, and God gives to them the witness of the Spirit and an individual testimony so that they can stand up and say before all the world, "I know that God lives, I know that Jesus is the Christ, I know that Joseph Smith is a prophet of the true and living God, and that the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, the plan of life and salvation, has been restored to the earth through his instrumentality. "The one and great thing that devolves upon me, upon you, and upon all Latter-day Saints is that this proclamation shall be sent to all the world, and I rejoice in knowing that it has never been carried with more force and by a greater number of faithful, diligent workers than at the present time.

May God bless each and every one of us who has a testimony and a knowledge that He lives and that Jesus is the Christ, and that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the true and living God, so to order our lives that all men seeing our diligence, our humility, our charity, our love of our fellows, may be led to investigate the gospel of Jesus Christ, is my prayer, and I ask it in the name of the Lord our Redeemer. Amen.

CONCERNING PLURAL MARRIAGES

Here is a statement that I would like to read: "Notwithstanding frequent verbal and printed instructions issued by President Joseph F. Smith and counselors to the effect that the solemnization of plural marriages was prohibited by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and these instructions having been reiterated time and time again by myself as President, cases occasionally arise where certain individuals are teaching that it is legitimate to enter into plural marriage, and that such marriages can be performed by certain members of the Church claiming to have authority to do so.

"The revelations of the Lord inform us most plainly that there is but one man on earth at a time who holds the keys of this sealing power; namely, the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. As President of the Church, I once again solemnly declare that no man living has the authority to solemnize a plural marriage; and I hereby announce that it is the bounden duty of every Latter-day Saint, male and female, who knows of any such pretended marriage being performed, to inform the proper officers of the Church, in order that the Church's honor may be maintained, and that such individuals may be dealt with according to the rules and regulations of the Church and excommunicated therefrom."

PRESIDENT ANTHONY W. IVINS

My brethren and sisters: I rejoice greatly, and praise the Lord, who is our strength, and upon whom we depend for guidance and support, for the manifestation of his goodness to us as it is exemplified in this large assembly of Latter-day Saints who are gathered here for the semi-annual conference of the Church.

As I look upon this congregation and review the circumstances which have brought it together, going back into the remote past, and see, or appear to see, how literally the Lord fulfills his promises to people with whom he enters into covenant, my heart is made to rejoice.

PURPOSE OF THESE GENERAL ASSEMBLIES

The purpose of these general assemblies of the Church is that those who have been chosen to preside over it, and its members may be brought together from time to time where report of the progress and development of the work of the Lord may be made, when instruction may be given, when we may be admonished, where admonition is necessary, and encouraged where we need encouragement.

FEATURES WHICH DIFFERENTIATE OUR CHURCH FROM OTHER CHURCHES

There are so many distinctive features which differentiate the Church from other religious denominations that it is impossible, in a short period of time, to refer to even a comparatively small number of them. This is one of those distinctive features, this great gathering of the Church, which occurs twice during the year. Another distinctive feature is that these people who are assembled here, who make up the membership of the Church, are its controlling influence and power under God. Those who preside are placed here by the voice of the Spirit of the Lord, and sustained by the voice of the people. The people uphold them with their faith and prayers and they depend upon the Lord for inspiration and wisdom to properly direct the affairs of the Church for the benefit of all its members. It is not a Church in which the individual members depend entirely upon the instruction and testimony which come to them from their presiding officers. The testimony of the truth which brings them together is their individual gift and right, and they are here and adhere to the faith because the Lord has manifested his truth to them by the power and gift of the Holy Ghost, and they are not dependent upon others for this knowledge.

AN ALLEGED RETROGRADE MOVEMENT IN THE CHURCH

Only a short time ago, just a few months, during the present year, a gathering of representatives of other religious denominations, from all parts of this intermountain country, assembled at Salt Lake City. They discussed the interests of their various organizations, and among other things, as usual, discussed the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, which they continue to refer to as a non-Christian organization, and they took great comfort, apparently, in the reports which were made from various representatives of those denominations to the effect that they had at last succeeded in battering down the walls of this American Islam, that Christianity was making way among the Latter-day Saints; that the activities of our elders were decreasing; and the tithes of the Church gradually being depleted. In other words, that there was a retrograde movement in the Church which appeared to encourage them in the hope that its members might eventually be converted to the Christian faith. I shall not enter into a discussion of this matter. The proceedings of this great convention were published and may be read. I thought, as I looked upon this congregation of men and women, that it is sufficient answer to these people. We encourage and bless them in their righteous efforts, and the Lord will bless them for all the good that they accomplish. But they are ignorant of the fact that these Latter-day Saints, these people whom they are endeavoring to convert to Christianity, have been converted, not by argument, not by reason alone, but by the gift of the holy Spirit through which they bear testimony to the divinity of the mission and character of the Redeemer of the world as no other people.

THE CIVIL GOVERNMENT AND THE DOMINANT CHURCH IN MEXICO

Reviewing the occurrences of the past six months, and to a careful observer they have been pregnant with events indicating the rapid approach of the consummation of the work of the Lord, I have been impressed with two occurrences more particularly than others during that period of time. The present attitude of the civil government in the Republic of Mexico toward the dominant church in that Republic is of greater importance to the world than we generally understand. It is not a question which involves Mexico alone, but is one which involves all of the churches of the world, and the results which shall be achieved there, whether the civil government of Mexico shall prevail in its present attitude, or whether the church which is opposed to it shall prevail, will have a great influence upon the relationship of the church and state everywhere.

RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN CHURCH AND STATE MUST BE DETERMINED

It appears to me to indicate that a time has come when the proper relationship which should exist between Church and State, between civil and ecclesiastical law, between those who administer civil government and those who stand as representatives of the church or the various religious denominations of the world, must be determined.

That there is a proper relationship is clearly defined in the word of the Lord, and in the teachings of the Redeemer himself. Give to Caesar that which belongs to him; render obedience to the civil law. Give to God that which belongs to him, and render allegiance and service to him. This can be done very readily if people can only be brought to understand the proper relationship of these two great administrative powers. One of the accusations made against Christ our Lord was that he had declared himself to be a king. Yes, he said before Pilate, I am a king, but my kingdom is not of this world. I am not here in antagonism to the kingdom of Herod, or to the empire of Rome. My kingdom pertains to the life to come. I am here to teach people the way which will lead them back to God, where they will attain to everlasting life, and where they may be crowned as kings and priests of the Most High.

L. D. S. MORE THAN OTHERS DIRECTLY INTERESTED IN THE QUESTION

I shall not enter into any lengthy discussion of this question. I only desire to call your attention to it. Latter-day Saints are perhaps more directly interested in it than any other people in the world, from the fact that the Republic of Mexico is made up in the great majority of its citizens of people whom the world calls Indians, but to whom the Latter-day Saints refer as Lamanites, people whom we believe to be of the chosen and promised seed of Abraham, brought to this continent and established here under the direction of God our Father, under the leadership of their inspired prophets.

THE LAMANITES OR INDIANS OF MEXICO

They developed a great civilization, but finally through unbelief, infidelity, and indifference to the word of the Lord, and the teachings of the Christ who ministered among them, fell into darkness, became divided into tribes, were decimated by civil war until they finally so far lost the spirit of the gospel of Christ that they became idolaters and offered human sacrifices, practices that were entirely foreign to the teachings of their fathers. It was in this condition that the conquerors of Mexico found them. Their prophets had warned them that this would come to pass. They had exhorted them to turn from idolatry, had declared to them that they should be trodden down of the Gentiles, who would come to this promised land, but just as definitely and surely as their subjugation by foreigners had been declared, so did the Lord promise to their fathers that they should be redeemed; that a remnant of them should survive and be brought back to a knowledge of the truths of the gospel of Christ and of their real origin. And so we look forward to the evolution of conditions in that country that will bring about the fulfilment of this latter promise. No people of modern times have been so down-trodden, so persecuted, so afflicted, so burdened with unreasonable burdens as have the people of Mexico during the past four hundred years. Nothing in the way of suffering could be inflicted upon humanity that has not been inflicted upon them. Mercilessly treated by their conquerors, reduced to slavery, they have suffered throughout all these generations. The Lord in his mercy, and undoubtedly by means so natural and common that many will not see his hand in it, will redeem them from that condition.

RETRIBUTION HAS COME TO THEIR PERSECUTORS

And retribution has come to their persecutors. It is a remarkable fact that of these men who brought that nation into subjugation, there was not one, so far as I am aware, who did not pay the penalty for the suffering he inflicted upon them during his mortal life. Columbus, the discoverer of this country, the man who was entitled to honor and glory far greater than he ever received, consented to the traffic in these peoples as slaves and sent them by shiploads to the old world. You all know how he died at Valladolid, in Spain, how he was cast into prison, how he was stripped of the honors which belonged to him, and died in that condition.

Hernan Cortez, the conqueror of Mexico, suffered the same fate. Francisco Pizarro and his friend Almagro, the conquerors of the Peruvian empire, likewise suffered. Pizarro killed Atahaulpa, and later killed Almagro, his bosom friend. The younger Almagro killed Pizarro, and he in turn was killed by the governor of the country. Thus one by one retribution came to them. I believe this law to be as inevitable as fate itself; that we reap that which we sow.

SHALL CHURCH OR GOVERNMENT RULE, OR EACH IN ITS SPHERE?

So, my brethren and sisters, we feel interested in this movement, this conflict which is now on in that country and which shall determine whether or not the civil government or the church shall rule, or whether the church and the civil government will join hands and in harmonious obedience to both civil and ecclesiastical law go on to the development of this continent as God our Father would have it develop.

THE BRITISH-ISRAEL MOVEMENT

Another thing in which I thought you would be interested is a great movement which is just on in Great Britain, which has been of exceeding interest to me. An association is in existence there which is sponsored by many of the great scholars and statesmen of Great Britain, called the British-Israel movement. The British people are undertaking to determine who their ancestors were. They have become obsessed with the thought that they are of Israel, and are investigating and studying, going back into the old traditions and folk-lore of Wales, of Ireland, of England and Scotland, in an endeavor to determine the origin and destiny of the British race. And this in brief is what they are finding out: In the first place that the word "British" itself is very significant. I asked a Jewish Rabbi the other day the derivation of the word "British." He said in Hebrew it was composed of two words, "Brit"—a covenant, and "ish"—a man. A covenant man, or a man of the covenant, the covenant which God our Father made with Abraham, the covenant in which he promised him that his seed should become as numerous as the stars of heaven—a covenant in which he promised him that kings should come out of him, and that through him all of the nations of the earth should be blessed.

DEVELOPMENTS IN THE INVESTIGATION

I cannot take the time to go into detail, but it is sufficient for me to say that these investigations show very conclusive, if not definite, evidence that at an early date in the history of the world, not long after the ten tribes were led away captive into Assyria by Shalmaneser, the tribe of Dan appeared in Ireland and went over into the Scandinavian countries, and there again you will find this singular coincidence, (Dan is one of the tribes of Israel) that Denmark means Dan's Land, or the Land of Dan.

I noted down here, that I might not be too long, just a few of the developments in this investigation. It was after the scattering of the ten tribes that Troy was established, and it is made almost definitely certain that the Trojans, and the nations who lived in the time which we call the age of fable, where the remnants of those scattered tribes of Israel which left the head of the Euphrates river and traveled north over the mountains into Northern Europe. They say that the early appearance of the tribe of Dan is very clearly proven. Later came another division of this same people to Scotland, where they were established. There appeared in Ireland, six hundred years before Christ a great Israelitish lawgiver, who enforced the observance of the Ten Commandments and established a school of the prophets, who was called Ollam Fodhla, two Hebrew words said to mean "wonderful prophet." A medallion now in existence in Great Britain is said to identify this man with the Prophet Jeremiah.

An old manuscript which has been dug up in the British Museum identifies a great character who came there about the same time as Joseph of Arimathea, who came with his daughter Anna to that country. This man, the evidence indicates, was a younger brother of the father of the Virgin Mary, thus Anna became the cousin of the Virgin. The royal family of Great Britain trace their genealogy back direct to this woman Anna. There can be no doubt in regard to this. The only question in doubt is the identity of Anna and some of the scholars in Great Britain agree that she appears to have been a cousin of the Virgin Mary.

SYMBOLISM OF THE BRITISH COAT OF ARMS

The British coat of arms I desire to refer to just for a moment. I think that none of us has very seriously undertaken to define its symbolism and meaning: The lion of the house of David is shown on it; the unicorn, to which the Lord likened Joseph when he said that his horn should be like the horn of the unicorn, which should push the people together from all parts of the earth; the harp, which was the banner of David. There are ten symbols on the British coat of arms, which appear to represent the ten tribes of Israel. And these were not put there because of the knowledge which modern Britain had of their significance at the time of their adoption. It was the heraldry which had been handed down to them from generations long past.

WHAT THE SAINTS HAVE TRIED FOR YEARS TO TEACH THE BRITISH

The thing which interested me most was that these British people are just beginning to find out what the Latter-day Saints have been trying to teach to them for nearly a hundred years. This great congregation of people which is assembled here this morning—if you should go to the Presiding Patriarch of the Church, whose right it is because of his calling to designate your genealogy—he would almost without exception declare you to be the seed of Joseph, and in the great majority of cases through the lineage of Ephraim, for this is the land which was given to Ephraim—these everlasting hills. His blessing was greater than that bestowed upon his ancestors. Jacob said that it extended to the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills. And so this pushing together is occurring, and here Ephraim is gathering in fulfillment of the unchangeable words of the prophets of the Lord.

Now, my brethren and sisters, there is much more—oh, a world of interesting evidence that is being unearthed, not by enthusiasts, not by foolish people, but by scholars, by Egyptologists, by men who understand—until the thought is becoming almost universal in the British Isles, that Israel is there, where we have always known them to be.

A STUDY OF THE PYRAMID OF GIZEH

Another interesting development is a more careful study of the great pyramid of Gizeh in Egypt. What is it? Why was it put there? It is one of the most wonderful things that exist in the world, a miracle in stone. We cannot call it anything else. It stands in the spot where the Prophet Isaiah said the Lord should establish an altar which would stand as a sign and a witness to the Lord in the land of Egypt in the latter days. It is said to be the only perfectly oriented structure in the world, and yet it was put there at a time when the civilization of the world was not supposed to have developed as it is developed at the present time. It is the largest structure in the world. It is said to record the history of the Adamic race during the six thousand years of its existence. It was called by the ancient Egyptians, Khuti, which in Hebrew means the Urim, or Urim and Thummim. Its exterior was polished so that it reflected light as nothing of similar kind had ever done before. It is not the tomb of a king. Its measurements are said to be the most accurate that the world knows at the present time. Its proportions are in exact measurement and harmonize with the surface of the earth. It represents the relationship of the earth to the heavenly bodies.

I opened the Pearl of Great Price a few months ago and read the story of Abraham in Egypt, where the book tells us that he was sitting upon Pharaoh's throne, discussing with those people astronomy and the mysteries of godliness with which they were not familiar. According to eminent scholars of Great Britain the pyramid is so accurately arranged in its measurements and symbols that it has outlined many great and important events which have occurred since its erection, which apply to the Israelitish people. It indicates a date on the 6th or 7th of April—there is a little difference of opinion but some great event was to occur on the 6th or 7th day of April, which is interpreted to be the date of the crucifixion of the Redeemer of the world. Its measurements indicate the beginning of the great war in 1914, and its termination in 1918. More than ninety per cent of the events chronicled, according to measurements, have already been fulfilled. The scholars of Great Britain tell us that between the present date and 1936 or 1938, the record so far as it applies to this monument in stone will have been completed. There is nothing which appears after that date. And so they look for the accomplishment of great events during this period.

I do not give this to you, my brethren and sisters, as correct in every detail, but it is the conclusion of some of the best informed men of the British Empire, and is not out of harmony with the word of the Lord as he has revealed it to us. It is not out of harmony, if you have been a close observer during the past six months, with the things which have occurred in the world at large. It is not out of harmony with the words of the Redeemer himself who warned the world that in this dispensation, and not far from this time, for it is nearly a hundred years since the organization of the Church, that he will consummate his work so far as it applies to the Gentile nations of the world.

PREDICTIONS FROM THE DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS

I am going to take the liberty to read a few words from the Doctrine and Covenants, that my study of these things has brought to my mind. There are here the Presidents of the missions of the Church. There are in this congregation thousands of men and women who have gone out as missionaries from the Church declaring these truths to the people, as President Grant has stated:

“And after your testimony cometh wrath and indignation upon the people.

“For after your testimony cometh the testimony of earthquakes, that shall cause groanings in the midst of her, and men shall fall upon the ground and shall not be able to stand.

“And also cometh the testimony of the voice of thunders, and the voice of lightnings, and the voice of tempests, and the voice of the waves of the sea heaving themselves beyond their bounds.

"And all things shall be in commotion; and surely men's hearts shall fail them; for fear shall come upon all people."

BE PREPARED FOR COMING GREAT EVENTS

Do you see anything, my brethren and sisters, in current events which indicate the approach of a period of this kind? Be prepared then for it. In what way? Just by serving the Lord. Just by continuing in devoted work in the gospel of his kingdom. Just by observing the laws of the land and the laws of the Lord as they are exemplified in the discipline of the Church. There ought not to be a violator of the civil law in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. There should not be a boot-legger, should not be a blasphemer; there should not be a man or woman bearing false witness against his or her neighbor. There should not be a man or woman whose heart and spirit is not in harmony with the doctrines taught by the Redeemer of the world. And if this condition can be attained and shall continue in the Church; if we shall be as we declare we are, subject to kings and to potentates, to presidents and to governors, wherever our lot is cast, and at the same time go on in our devoted service to the Lord our God, keeping his commandments, having faith in the words of his servants, the prophets, looking steadfastly forward to the accomplishment of his purposes, I promise you that when this time of awful trouble comes which the British seers say is at our very doors, and it will come, his protecting hand will be over us, and he who is powerful, he who can deliver, he who can protect, will give us protection and deliverance.

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN PRIESTCRAFT AND PRIESTHOOD

God bless you, my brethren and sisters, keep us all from the sins of the world, keep us clean and unspotted, make us more devoted if possible to his word and more loyal and patriotic to the government of which we form a part. For without this government the Church of Christ could not exist, unless God should manifest his power in an unusual manner in our behalf. He has raised up this government and the men who direct its affairs for our protection and benefit, for the protection and benefit of the people of the world in righteousness. But whenever people depart from the way of righteousness, whenever priestcraft shall take the place of Priesthood, God's mercy will be withdrawn. (Distinguish between the words—priestcraft is that system by which men pretend to speak and act in the name of the Lord without authority and without power; Priesthood is the keys and authority to properly act and speak in the name of the Lord, and the power of the Priesthood will be manifest in the works of those who exercise it. And that characterizes the lives of these men, these apostles who are before you, these presiding seventies, and presidents of missions. They exercise the Priesthood of the Lord our God through proper authority, and they exercise it in a proper way.)

When priestcraft shall assume that which does not belong to it, then God's mercy and protection will be withdrawn. Go on and read the remainder of this eighty-eighth section of the Doctrine and Covenants, (I do not like to read it here) because it tells us what is going to happen to priestcraft, and it is coming with those other manifestations of the power of the Lord which are so prevalent.

May the blessing of the Lord be with you, my brethren and sisters. We pray for you, we work for you, we love you. Our only desire is to be of service to you, forgetting ourselves. And I want to bear witness that never in the history of the Church have men more unselfishly directed its affairs than at the present time. I know this from my association with these men, with the Presidency, with the members of the Council of the Twelve. They are here to sacrifice everything for the welfare of the members of the Church of Christ. God help us all to follow that example, I pray through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir sang, "Inflamatus," Laurinda Brewerton, soloist.

The benediction was offered by Elder Geo. W. Middleton of the Ensign stake.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON SESSION

The meeting opened at 2 p. m., Sunday, October 3, 1926; President Heber J. Grant presiding.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn, "Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah."

Prayer was offered by Elder John M. Baxter, president of the Woodruff stake.

The choir sang the hymn, "Go, ye messengers of glory."

PRESIDENT CHARLES W. NIBLEY

My brethren and sisters: It has always been a considerable task for me, at the general conferences, to address these large gatherings of Latter-day Saints, although I have had many years' experience. Approaching a task of this kind gives one a feeling of awe.

A GREAT WORK ACCOMPLISHED BY THE SAINTS

I rejoice in the work that the Lord has accomplished with the help of his Saints, imperfect as most of us are. Under his guidance and direction we have been able to accomplish a great work. I believe that he would say now, as he said to the Church in former days, that he is well pleased with his Church collectively—not individually, but collectively.

GRATITUDE TO GOD FOR THIS AGE AND NATION

I feel very grateful for the privilege of being here. I often think what a grand thing it is to be permitted to live in the world today—this wonderful age of the world, with its marvelous developments of science and art, and the great progress that has been made from the conditions of the world as they existed two or three hundred, or even a hundred years ago. What a different world! And what a wonderful land of liberty we are living in—a choice land; under the freest and best of all governments on the face of the earth; where there is more security, more protection for the rights and liberties of the people, than there is in any other nation. The hand of the Lord has guided the destinies of this great nation, for he it was that planned it.

He tells us in a revelation to the Prophet Joseph Smith which we often quote: "I, the Lord, raised up wise men for this very purpose"; that is, to found this government; and it has had divine guidance all the way through. The people here in the United States, even those who are not so well off financially, are housed better, fed and clothed better, and better situated than the rich and well-to-do in most other nations. Never before in all the history of the world has there been a nation like this, of such commanding importance, and yet not desiring anything but what rightfully belongs to it.

REVERENCE FOR GOD

I was glad to read the inaugural address of President Coolidge, delivered a year ago last March, particularly the closing paragraph wherein he showed such reverence for God. He concluded the address with these words:

"America seeks no earthly empire built on blood and force. No ambition, no temptation, lures her to thought of foreign dominions. The legions which she sends forth are armed, not with the sword, but with the cross.

"The higher state to which she seeks the allegiance of all mankind is not of human, but of divine origin. She cherishes no purpose save to merit the favor of Almighty God."

"She cherishes no purpose save to merit the favor of Almighty God". These words constitute an acknowledgment of God in the affairs of the nation, and a desire to be governed by the spirit of righteousness and justice, to do good and to uphold the principles of freedom.

THE STRUGGLE FOR LIBERTY

The liberty that we enjoy today has come only after a hard struggle in the world. Four hundred years ago the fight for freedom was on. The reformers, as they are called—Martin Luther, John Knox and others—rose up and protested against the tyranny to which they were subjected. They demanded more liberty. They were few in number compared to the many millions, but under the blessing of the Lord they conquered. Finally, little by little, liberty was conceded to the people by the potentates and popes that then ruled the world. But it was a hard struggle and cost some of the best blood of that period. The Rise of the Dutch Republic, by Motley, gives a graphic description of the terrible sufferings endured by the Dutch people in this long fight for liberty. For the liberties that we enjoy today we are indebted in large measure to the people of the Netherlands. For many years they fought most valiantly for religious freedom and the extension of the rights and liberties of the citizen against all the might and power of Catholic Spain, backed by the Spanish Inquisition. They were small in number and weak indeed compared to the thousands and tens of thousands of Spanish troops, led by the notorious Duke of Alva. But they finally conquered. Why? Because the guidance of the Lord was with them, and he gave them his favor and blessing.

A hundred years later the same desire for liberty was again manifested. Oliver Cromwell was raised up, and he fought a good fight and kept the faith. We are also largely indebted to him, and to those who fought with him, for the freedom that exists in America today.

A hundred years after that we find George Washington and the patriot fathers contending for the liberties of the people, and the Lord gave divine guidance to them. They could not have succeeded without his help. His power and his hand were over them.

So, as we heard from President Ivins this morning, it comes about in the progress of the spirit of freedom and liberty, that the Lord has prepared the way in this nation for his Church to be established.

DISTINCTION BETWEEN DIVINE GUIDANCE AND DIVINE AUTHORITY

But here let me emphasize one thought. To all of these men—Luther, Knox, Cromwell, Washington, and their compères—there was given divine guidance. But they did not have divine authority. The Lord today gives divine guidance to good people of the world who seek him—and many millions do. It is true that there is a divinity that shapes our ends (and the ends of nations, too) rough-hew them as we will. But he has not given to them divine authority. As we heard this morning, religious denominations sometimes meet together and pass resolutions against us. They are without divine authority. And there is a marked distinction between divine guidance and divine authority. People can see and acknowledge the guiding hand of Almighty God in the formation of this government and in its growth and development. It is plain to many that we have enjoyed his favor as a nation. But as to divine authority, that is different. Let me read from the very first revelation in the book of Doctrine and Covenants:

“And the voice of warning shall be unto all people, [We heard from President Grant this forenoon of the necessity of preaching this gospel to all the nations of the earth] by the mouths of my disciples, whom I have chosen in these last days.

“And they shall go forth and none shall stay them, for I the Lord have commanded them.

“Behold, this is mine authority, and the authority of my servants.”

That is a little different from divine guidance.

In a revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith, when he was only seventeen years of age, in 1823, we read:

"Behold, I will reveal unto you the Priesthood, by the hand of Elijah the prophet, before the coming of the great and dreadful day of the Lord.

"And he shall plant in the hearts of the children the promises made to the fathers, and the hearts of the children shall turn to their fathers.

"If it were not so, the whole earth would be utterly wasted at his coming."

DIVINE AUTHORITY CONFERRED BY HOLY MESSENGERS

Was that divine authority bestowed? Let me read another section. On the 15th day of May, 1829, an angel of the Lord, known as John the Baptist when he lived upon the earth in the days of the Savior, appeared to Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery and conferred upon them, in these words, the Priesthood of Aaron:

"Upon you my fellow servants, in the name of Messiah, I confer the Priesthood of Aaron, which holds the keys of the ministering of angels, and of the gospel of repentance, and of baptism by immersion for the remission of sins; and this shall never be taken again from the earth, until the sons of Levi do offer again an offering unto the Lord in righteousness."

Here is divine authority. Do any of our friends or neighbors make such a claim? We know the claim of the Catholic church, and all we say in response is that "By their fruits ye shall know them." These were the words of our Savior, and that is enough on that score. But our Protestant friends do not even have that much of a claim. They have a form of godliness, but deny the power thereof. And because they do not have the authority themselves they think no one else has.

I have read to you how the Lord conferred the lesser Priesthood upon the Prophet Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. Let me read from the 27th section of the Doctrine and Covenants. The Prophet Joseph, in preparing for a sacramental meeting in August, 1830, started to go to a neighbor's house to secure wine for the sacrament, because that is what had been used. He was met by a messenger from the Lord and instructed that he need not go for wine; that pure water should be used instead:

"It mattereth not what ye shall eat or what ye shall drink when ye partake of the sacrament, if it so be that ye do it with an eye single to my glory—remembering unto the Father my body which was laid down for you, and my blood which was shed for the remission of your sins."

Then this messenger goes on to tell the prophet that the day will come when he, Joseph Smith, would be able to sit down with Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, with Moses, with Elias, with others of the ancient worthies and partake of the sacrament "and also with all those whom my Father hath given me out of the world." So, some of us may have the privilege of being there. But he said further, that the Prophet would have the privilege of sitting down "with Peter, and James, and John, whom I have sent unto you, by whom I have ordained you and confirmed you to be apostles, and especial witnesses of my name, and bear the keys of your ministry and of the same things which I revealed unto them."

Here was divine authority in these last days, conferred by holy messengers, the same men, Peter, James and John, of whom the Lord Jesus Christ said, in his time: "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you and ordained you." The Lord Jesus himself ordained those three men, and they came, as I have read, and conferred the holy apostleship upon Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery. So here is divine authority to act in the name of the Lord. Our claim is that the authority of the Priesthood has been conferred upon men and given to this Church which is the Church of Christ. It is not given to the nation. But the nation has had divine guidance, as I have said. Individuals not of our Church may have divine guidance; but divine authority, to act in the name of the Lord, to baptize, to lay on hands, to say: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," as the apostles of old said, and then to have them receive it, that is a different proposition.

WITNESSES OF THE BESTOWAL OF DIVINE AUTHORITY

Upon these statements of divine authority we rest our case, as the lawyers say. If these heavenly messengers did not come to Joseph Smith and confer upon him this divine authority, then is our preaching vain and our faith is vain also. But we know, and the world may know also by the fruits of "Mormonism" that there is divine power in this organization. Moreover, we have witnesses. Through Joseph Smith the Lord called three special witnesses, to whom was given the great manifestation of the truth of the Book of Mormon. We have not only three witnesses to the testimony of this divine authority, but we have three hundred thousand of them, and more, that can rise up and testify that by the power and influence of the Holy Ghost they know that this is the work of God, that it is the power of God unto salvation. It is not a form of godliness without any power; it is the power of God unto salvation, the salvation of all those who will accept it, in this land and in every other land. That is the difference between this Church and all other churches in the world. We call upon all the world to know that that divine authority is here, in this Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and that it is nowhere else. God bless you. Amen.

STEPHEN L. RICHARDS

God is in heaven, but he is not far removed from them that seek him. He is a friend who never fails. One can always trust him.

THANKS AND GRATITUDE

I thank God for the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, for the great conceptions of life which it offers for the comfort and the encouragement and the hope of all mankind.

I thank him for the Church with all its great institutions, built up and maintained under the power of the holy Priesthood for the salvation of the souls of men, and for their direction in the great cause of truth.

I thank God for the Saints, the blessed Saints, who make up the Church of Christ, who have testimonies of the divinity of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Master; who know of the great mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and who seek to carry forward the mighty work which he was instrumental in establishing. I am grateful to be identified with the Saints of God.

I thank God for the Priesthood, for that great power just spoken of, a very portion of Godhood itself, which enables men to administer the ordinances of the Everlasting Gospel, in the name of Jesus Christ, and with his authority. I am grateful for the fraternity and the friendship which come from associations in the Priesthood.

I thank God for my brethren of the stakes, where my duties call me, for my associations with them, for their uniform kindness and consideration and love. Brethren, I love you, I love you in the bond of the holy Priesthood, and I trust that that bond may always keep us together. Thank God for the handclasp of a man who is united with me in the Priesthood of God. Never neglect those friendships, brethren, be one and you will be Christ's.

I am grateful, beyond my power of expression, for the companionship of my beloved brethren who surround me, my colleagues, my true friends, men whose examples stimulate and encourage me and protect me from temptation and error. I am grateful for their confidence in me, and I have continually prayed that in some measure I might be worthy of that confidence.

The Lord is good. All his judgments are righteous. He makes no mistakes. Never complain at the judgments of God; never mock him. Always trust him. He will never forsake you. Seek the things of eternity; they are worth while. All other things are of but passing worth and comparatively valueless.

Oh, I thank God for the home and for the great conception of family which we have, for the eternity of these sacred and beautiful relationships that under the power of the Priesthood have been established. If there were nothing else given to the world by the Prophet Joseph Smith than our great and beautiful conception of home and family, he would have made the greatest contribution ever made to humanity by any man who has lived.

I praise his great name, the name of the Prophet Joseph Smith. I know that his mission was divine. My heart, my soul, and every faculty of which I have possession, confirm that knowledge. The work that he established is the work of the living God.

In your presence, humbly, I consecrate and dedicate all that has been given to me to the establishment of that work. May we all make it prosper as God would have us do, I pray humbly, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I wish that it were given to all of the audience to stand here and see this magnificent sight as we are standing and singing our songs. Of course, we get a view that those of you in the audience cannot have. This is a wonderful inspiration—to view such an audience, the main body of this house full of men holding the Priesthood of God, and the power of Almighty God, to declare his will to the world.

REED SMOOT

I could do no better than repeat the words that have been spoken by President Grant. I had it in my heart to do so, and I want to say amen to all that he has just said, also I want to express my appreciation for the privilege of attending this general conference. While we were singing the last song, "Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah," and the one before, I thought, if the author of these two songs were allowed to be present and hear the words sung by this wonderful and enthusiastic audience, such an audience as cannot be found in any other place on earth, his heart would be filled with joy and praise-giving. The fundamentals of the gospel of Jesus Christ are found in the words of these two songs. Where else in all the world could you see an audience of ten thousand people every one of them capable of quoting every word of the song, and every soul interested in singing the praises to God as contained in these two songs?

NEVER DESPAIR

The other day a middle-aged man called to see me. It was about a question in which he was deeply interested, and after I advised him that his wishes, as far as any action on the part of our government was concerned, were useless, he began to talk to me about his life and what he had been called upon to sacrifice for the gospel's sake. He said that he became almost discouraged and was almost at the road of despair. I thought, my brethren and sisters, that that condition, if a man reached it, is a most dangerous one, and at that time if a word of encouragement or a helping hand could be extended, it may save him. I remembered when I was going to school as a young boy of being asked to learn and repeat an article found, I think, in the National Fifth Reader, entitled "Never Despair," and as I had it with me I read it to him. I think, my brethren and sisters, that perhaps it would be a proper thing to call it to your attention, and I shall do so, in part:

"There is no trait of human character so potential for weal or woe as firmness. To the business man it is all important. Before its irresistible energy the most formidable obstacles become as cobweb barriers in its path. Difficulties, the terror of which causes the pampered sons of luxury to shrink back with dismay, provoke from the man of lofty determination only a smile.

The whole story of our race—all nature, indeed—teems with examples to show what wonders may be accomplished by resolute perseverance and patient toil.

"It is related of Tamerlane, the celebrated warrior, the terror of whose arms spread through all the eastern nations, and whom victory attended at almost every step, that he once learned from an insect a lesson of perseverance, which had a striking effect upon his future character and success.

"When closely pursued by his enemies—as contemporary tells the anecdote—he took refuge in some old ruins, where, left to his solitary musings, he espied an ant tugging and striving to carry a single grain of corn. His unavailing efforts were repeated sixty-nine times, and at each several time so soon as he reached a certain point of projection, he fell back with his burden, unable to surmount it; but the seventieth time he bore away his spoil in triumph, and left the wondering hero reanimated and exulting in the hope of future victory.

"How pregnant the lesson this incident conveys! How many thousand instances there are in which inglorious defeat ends the career of the timid and desponding, when the same tenacity of purpose would crown it with triumphant success! Resolution is almost omnipotent. Sheridan was at first timid and obliged to sit down in the midst of a speech. Convinced of, and mortified at, the cause of his failure, he said one day to a friend, 'It is in me, and it shall come out.'

"From that moment he arose, and shone, and triumphed in a consummate eloquence. Here was true moral courage. And it was well observed by a heathen moralist, that it is not because things are difficult that we dare not undertake them.

"Be, then, bold in spirit. Indulge no doubts—they are traitors. In the practical pursuit of our high aim, let us never lose sight of it in the slightest instance: for it is more by a disregard of small things, than by open and flagrant offenses, that men come short of excellence. There is always a right and a wrong; and if you ever doubt, be sure you take not the wrong. Observe this rule, and every experience will be to you a means of advancement."

THE TESTIMONY OF THE GOSPEL IN US MUST COME OUT

My brethren and sisters, it is in us, it must come out. We have the testimony in our souls that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith was and is a prophet of the living God, that God, through him, established this Church in this dispensation, nevermore to be thrown down or given to another people. As I looked at the faces of this vast audience of the priesthood before me, I wondered if there is made that determined effort for success, that firmness maintained that is so essential to success in every vocation of life, and in their belief in any principle; that if it were, what could not be accomplished. I am not afraid of the ultimate success of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. God is at the helm. I can see every year that passes by, step by step, it is gaining its way and men are studying the results of it; men who hold mighty positions, men of affairs. While, of course, they have not the knowledge that it was from God, they can't but look at the results of it, and they can't but see there is something in the gospel of Jesus Christ greater than mere numbers of souls. If we are faithful, if we are true to the covenants that we have made with God, if we have an eye single to his glory, if we think more of God's work and its success than of our own individual success, or our own individual positions in this world, I say to you now that the gospel of Jesus Christ will grow just as fast as God wants it to grow, or knows that the people are ready for it to grow.

PREJUDICES NOT ALL ELIMINATED

The prejudices against our people that have been so bitter in the past are not all eliminated yet. Perhaps they never will be until final success comes, but I want to testify to you that this wall of prejudice is crumbling, it is being destroyed in the minds of the opposition when they see the results of "Mormonism" in the community in which "Mormons" live, and I haven't any doubt, my brethren and sisters, that the final triumph of the work of God will come in his own due time. I thank God for his Spirit made manifest to us this day. My heart gave echo to all that has been said, and I am, with my brethren, interested in the advancement of the Church that it may spread to all the four corners of the earth, that the testimony of the elders shall be heard in all lands.

A WEALTH OF SPIRITUALITY AND FAITH

I wondered when we were singing the last song if every person in the world could have heard it—and that time may come when they can do so, if they desire—what effect it would have had upon them. I know that no stranger, no man, could have been in this building today and heard the song that was sung and the power that was manifested by every one who took part in the singing and not have been touched to the heart. He never could have said there is not faith among the people known as the "Mormons." He never could have claimed that there was not a wealth of spirituality and faith emanating from those who have taken part in the singing and speaking, both would have impressed him with the earnestness and with the truthfulness of the words that were sung and the testimonies of the gospel of Jesus Christ as proclaimed.

GOD LIVES AND THIS IS HIS CHURCH

My brethren and sisters, I want to leave with you today that testimony for which I prayed so long. My mother said if I would keep myself unspotted from the sins of the world it would come, and this is that testimony, that I know that God lives and this is his Church. I hope, as long as I have breath, that whatever is required of me as a servant of God, I shall be perfectly willing to do, to make sacrifice of any name or nature, even unto life itself; and if a humble prayer, offered to my heavenly Father morning and night, will keep me in that same frame of mind, I shall glorify his name and thank my Maker for that testimony.

May God's choicest blessings be with his people. May they increase in wisdom, and may their works be such that the world seeing them will concede that they are directed from other sources than man, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

RICHARD R. LYMAN

We believe that Joseph Smith was a prophet; that Joseph Smith is a prophet; and that the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, through him, has been re-established upon the earth.

BEAUTY, POWER AND GLORY OF THE CHURCH

In this Church organization, as I see it, there is every element that will make people stronger, better and happier, and I am of the opinion, at times, that we ourselves, who are the living elements of this great Church, do not comprehend its beauty, its power and its glory.

ADDRESSES AT THE OFFICER'S MEETING, Y. M. M. I. A.

We had a meeting of the officers of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Associations of the Church, in the Bishop's Building, this morning at 8 o'clock. We listened to addresses given by four of our ninety-six Y. M. M. I. A. stake superintendents. We have one stake superintendent in each of the ninety-six stakes of the Church.

These superintendents are but young men. I wish all of you could have heard the four who spoke this morning. They stood before that great group of Mutual Improvement workers like generals at the head of an army.

I was so profoundly impressed by the scripture which one of these speakers quoted that I am going to read it to you:

"Now behold, a marvelous work is about to come forth among the children of men." (Doc. and Cov. 4:1.)

This, the L. D. S. Church, is that marvelous work. And the more I study it, the more marvelous things I find in it.

MORE BLESSED TO GIVE THAN TO RECEIVE

The whole Christian world is pretty generally agreed, I believe, that there is hardly a more important element in the teachings and in the example of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ than that expressed by the Apostle Paul when he said: "Remember the words of the Lord Jesus, how he said, It is more blessed to give than it is to receive." (Acts 20:35.)

Measured by this matchless measuring stick given by the Lord Jesus Christ, the L. D. S. Church is marvelous. In all the world there is no other institution which, in proportion to its size, has in it so many volunteer workers, or so many who contribute so lavishly, of both time and money, as do its members, into whose souls has come the conviction, as a result of faith, prayer and righteous living, that Jesus is the Christ, that by obedience to the laws and ordinances of the gospel men may be saved, and that Joseph Smith is a prophet. Match if you can in any other organization anywhere the unselfishness of our army of two thousand missionaries who preach the gospel, as we believe it, in nearly every quarter of the globe without money and without price. These not only give their time to this great cause, but they pay their own expenses.

OUR VOLUNTEER WORKERS IN THE CHURCH

It is not, however, of the missionaries abroad, but of the volunteer workers at home that I desire to speak on this occasion.

Each of these ninety-six stake superintendents of the Y. M. M. I. A. has two counselors, a stake secretary, and when completely organized at least five other stake board members. To each one of these board members is assigned the chairmanship of a specific committee. Thus in all the Church we have in the Young Men's Mutual Improvement organization in the neighborhood of a thousand stake officers. We have in addition about five officers for each ward, or approximately four thousand ward officers. There are therefore in the Young Men's organization as stake and ward officers, approximately five thousand men.

Since the Young Men's organization is but one of the five auxiliary organizations of the Church, and, further, since the other organizations probably have approximately the same number of officers as has the Y. M. M. I. A., this means that throughout the Church we have approximately twenty-five thousand officers in these auxiliary organizations. Twenty-five thousand volunteer workers! Where else in all the world can such another volunteer group be found? These are struggling for the good of humanity without any hope of reward, except the satisfaction which comes from living in accordance with that Christian principle that it is more blessed to give than to receive. The L. D. S. Church is the marvelous work referred to which has come forth among the children of men.

Let me make it clear that I am not now speaking of the Church organization proper. I am not referring to the presidents of stakes and bishops of wards and the presiding officers of the various quorums of the priesthood. The twenty-five thousand officers I refer to, are serving in our auxiliary organizations, and these are but helps in the government of the Church, they do not constitute the main Church organization.

MISSIONARY WORK IN THE Y. M. M. I. A.

But let me refer further to the remarks of our Mutual Improvement superintendents who spoke at our 8 o'clock meeting this morning. Another of the four speakers outlined the plan of work which he and the other volunteer workers of his stake propose to carry out. He reported progress regarding the Y. M. M. I. A. card record. His remarks were somewhat like this: "In our stake the organization for doing missionary work is practically complete. We have prepared a card for all the male members of our ward between the ages of twelve and thirty. If one of these, in any ward of our stake, does not attend our Mutual Improvement meetings, our plan is to have him visited at least once each month. These cards are already in the hands of our missionaries. On the back of the card, which contains the name of the individual visited, the visitor will record his own name, the date of his visit and any comments concerning this individual case which may seem necessary."

Thus we propose in this Young Men's organization, to reach every boy in every ward, however poor, however unfortunate that boy may be. We expect to extend the helping hand to the boy who, for any reason whatever, may be required to fight a difficult or an unfair fight. Each and every month we propose to "visit the fatherless in their afflictions," and with the help of divine Providence keep all young men in every part of the Church "unspotted from the world." (James 1:27.)

Let me explain further what we expect to do with these young men, if the missionaries succeed in bringing them to the meetings of our organization. If you have a son who is careless, we are going to try to make him serious and industrious. If your neighbor has a son who is careless, we propose to do the same thing with him also. Wherever we find a boy who is not interested in study, we hope to arouse within him an interest in his school work. Where we find boys who are living in idleness, it is our aim to encourage them to be ambitious and to go to work. If we find a boy who is a spendthrift, we aim to impress upon him lessons of frugality. We aim to teach young men to stand erect, to step with the elastic step, to practice the teachings of the Scout organization, to be true to God and to country, to help other people at all times, to keep themselves physically strong, mentally awake, and morally straight. In short, we are struggling to make these Mutual Improvement members perfect, even as our Father in heaven is perfect.

LABORS OF GENERAL BOARD MEMBERS

We have, as members of our General Board, those who have had extensive scientific training. We have among them men who are teachers, men who are experts in psychology. Many of our General Board members are products of the best schools of our country. Unitedly these Board Members have prepared a program for young men so broad that we hope to be able with it to reach and touch effectively the life of any man's son, whatever may be the qualifications of that son.

PROGRAM OF INSTRUCTION IN THE M. I. A.

Our program is so varied that we expect some portion of it will appeal to something in the life of every boy. And with these numerous activities our plan and hope and expectation is that we shall be able to give to every boy at least enough religion, enough information concerning the teachings and the love and the example of Jesus the Son of God, to fill him with genuine ambition and to keep him walking in paths of virtue.

If a young man is interested in debate, we are providing an opportunity for him to express that impulse. If he is interested in dramatics, here he will find an opportunity to give expression to his natural fondness for playing the part of another. If, perhaps, he has a natural interest in music, opportunity will be provided in our Mutual Improvement program for him to give expression to this musical urge or impulse. Whatever his aim, his desire, his ambition, we are aiming to provide in our Mutual Improvement organization an opportunity for him to express it.

We give to our Mutual Improvement members lessons in honesty. We teach them to be true, to be chaste, to be benevolent. We teach them that we believe in doing good to all men at all times. We teach them, in the language of the Doctrine and Covenants, to "Remember faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, brotherly kindness, godliness, charity, humility, diligence." (Doc. and Cov. 4:6.)

These, the fundamental elements in the gospel of Jesus Christ—these are the doctrines and principles and practices we are aiming to bring into the lives of the young people of the Church. We desire to have them, by keeping the commandments, receive as a part of their lives, their very beings, that something, that unexplainable something, that came into the life of Saul of Tarsus. It was a light from heaven, but it touched his life, it touched his soul, it transformed a heart of hate into a heart of love. It transformed Saul of Tarsus into Paul the apostle. It is the aim of our organization in the teachings of this year so to train our young folks that they may know as Job knew when he said: "I know that my Redeemer liveth." (Job. 19:25.) When we are teaching them to live that prayerful life, that life of faith, we are teaching them to practice that righteous living which brings into human hearts that knowledge for which we seek, that knowledge we desire all our young folks to have; namely, a conviction that Jesus is the Christ, and that Joseph Smith is his prophet.

I shall conclude with the words from the Doctrine and Covenants which one of our superintendents used this morning:

"O ye that embark in the service of God, see that ye serve him with all your heart, might, mind and strength, that ye may stand blameless before God at the last day." (Doc. and Cov. 4:2.) The Lord bless you. Amen.

ELDER MELVIN J. BALLARD

I desire, my brethren and sisters, to read a few verses from the 26th chapter of II Nephi, beginning with the 23rd verse, as follows:

THE GOSPEL UNIVERSAL

"For behold, my beloved brethren, I say unto you that the Lord worketh not in darkness.

"He doeth not anything save it be for the benefit of the world; for he loveth the world, even that he layeth down his own life that he may draw all men unto him. Wherefore, he commandeth none that they shall not partake of his salvation.

"Behold, doth he cry unto any, saying: Depart from me? Behold, I say unto you, Nay; but he saith: Come unto me all ye ends of the earth, buy milk and honey, without money and without price.

"Behold, hath he commanded any that they should depart out of the synagogues, or out of the houses of worship? Behold, I say unto you, Nay.

"Hath he commanded any that they should not partake of his salvation? Behold, I say unto you, Nay; but he hath given it free for all men; and he hath commanded his people that they should persuade all men to repentance.

"Behold, hath the Lord commanded any that they should not partake of his goodness? Behold, I say unto you, Nay; but all men are privileged the one like unto the other, and none are forbidden."

I read now from the 33rd verse:

"For the Lord doeth that which is good among the children of men; and he doeth nothing save it be plain unto the children of men; and he inviteth them all to come unto him and partake of his goodness; and he denieth none that come unto him, black and white, bond and free, male and female; and he remembereth the heathen; and all are alike unto God, both Jew and Gentile."

A BETTER UNDERSTANDING

It has been my privilege in association with my companions, Brothers Rulon S. Wells and Rey L. Pratt, during the past year to come to a better understanding of the Lord's feeling towards his sons and daughters, as expressed in this scripture that I have just read to you. As you have heard, we were assigned to go as the first missionaries of the Church to South America.

FIRST MISSIONARY VISIT IN SOUTH AMERICA

However, you students of our history will remember that Brother Parley P. Pratt made a visit to the west coast of that country about seventy years ago. He remained for a few months, until his means were exhausted, struggling with the Spanish language. He was not so fortunate as we were, because we had his grandson, Brother Rey L. Pratt, who is a master of the Spanish language. That enabled us to do a work that Brother Parley was unable to do. Then I am also sure that there has been going forward in South America, in these last seventy years, a marvelous change that was necessary to prepare the hearts of the people and the governments for the coming of the gospel message. We knew, however, that it was not going to be easy, but we were willing to go to the ends of the earth, to make any kind of sacrifice, to discharge the great obligation which the Lord has placed upon his Church, to bring to all men the glad news that he has spoken again, and has established his Church in the earth, that all flesh, black and white, bond and free, Jew and Gentile, all may know of these good things which the Lord has done.

RECENT MISSIONARY WORK IN SOUTH AMERICA

We took a long journey into that south land—and, by the way, there were some who wondered why we did not go to San Francisco and sail to South America from that point, but if you will look up the map and draw a line straight south from New York City, your line will carry you about two hundred miles west of Valparaiso, on the coast of Chile. So practically all of South America lies east of New York City. We sailed from New York City on the 14th day of November, and after six days and six nights we reached one of the islands of the West Indies. We felt sure that we were a long distance from home. We might have been in Europe by that time. Then we sailed nine days and nine nights without seeing land, and then found ourselves opposite the eastern point of South America, and not many hundred miles west of the British Isles. Then three days more and we were into the harbor at Rio de Janeiro, off the coast of Brazil. Then five days more and we reached our destination at Buenos Aires, the great southern capital, a city of two million two hundred fifty thousand people. I said to some of the brethren that it was a strange experience as we passed out of New York City in a cold winter's wind, to go into the balmy summer climate of South America, where summer there is winter here: to pass under the equator and have the sun move off to the north and arise in the northeast and set in the northwest and the moon to follow likewise; and all the stars we knew to disappear, and a new heaven and a new earth came into view, for it was a different kind of earth from ours, different vegetation, climate, people, and to me a different language, until I felt like one entirely removed from the world I knew. I am grateful that we had Brother Pratt's assistance in speaking the Spanish; and Brother Wells' assistance in speaking the German, for we had two families of German-speaking people in Buenos Aires who had joined the Church in Germany. With Brother Wells' assistance we succeeded in carrying the work forward among the German-speaking people of that section, and before Brother Wells had to return it was our privilege to take six of them into the waters of baptism, the first converts baptized in South America. Brother Wells' return was a great sorrow to us because of his companionship and his knowledge of the German language, but his illness was such, and it continued to recur, that we felt his life was in danger. He was an exceedingly sick man, and yet Brother Wells would have been glad to have stayed there and laid down his life. It was a great disappointment to us to have him go home, but it was necessary, and he was willing to respond to the suggestion and as cheerfully go as to stay.

Then Brother Pratt and myself continued our work with the German people as best we could, but it was difficult. I had to tell Brother Pratt in English what to tell them, and he told it in the Spanish to a German girl who could speak a little Spanish.

She interpreted it in German to our friends, and the answer came back in the same grapevine way. But we were successful in holding them and in increasing interest among others until our little group grew. When Brother Stoof reached us, being a master of the German language, he was able to take up that work and push it forward, so that it is in a very prosperous condition today. There are a number of others who have become interested.

DIFFICULTIES ENCOUNTERED

The principal work that Brother Pratt and myself undertook was among the Spanish-speaking people, and I would like you to know that Spanish is the language of South America. While there are here and there small groups of English and small groups of German-speaking people, practically all of them speak Spanish. So that one is as helpless down there without Spanish as he would be in the United States without English. We undertook to secure a hall, but there were no halls such as we have in this country. Conditions are different. When we did try to rent some of them, we could not secure them because they were recreation halls, and the chief activities were going forward on Sunday night, and they did not wish a religious service to disturb them. So for two months we battled with that problem. We tried to rent office quarters to make halls out of them, but were unsuccessful.

At last we did secure a place and rented all of it, a store and living quarters, and then we began to invite people to come. In the meantime, however, we had gone to our friends who live in the suburbs or outskirts of the city. That was not the easiest work to do, because we traveled two hours on the street car and then walked two miles, not on paved streets, but on lanes, through fields, in mud, in dust, and all character of weather, and then when we did this all we could get to come to our meetings, for nearly two months, were children.

"A LITTLE CHILD SHALL LEAD THEM"

There was no prejudice against us, in fact the great majority of the people did not even know there was a United States of North America or anything about it, much less did they know anything about the "Mormon" Church. The chief lack of interest was because we were not Catholic. The whole country is Catholic, as you know. Nevertheless we said: "We shall not abandon our effort to reach the people." And we learned anew that "a little child shall lead them." We continued with those children, teaching them to sing, teaching them to pray, to repeat the Lord's prayer, the Articles of Faith, and the Ten Commandments. They carried these prayers and songs into their homes, and then one parent appeared, and another, and another, and we finally organized a group meeting of adults, and continued to teach the children. The children brought their parents—and that was true in several places that had opened for us. Then we moved forward into homes of those who had become interested, and to our great joy we saw that the same wonderful response was being manifest in the hearts of the people of that land as elsewhere, and a splendid Spanish woman, came forward and signified her absolute conviction that we had brought the truth. She resisted all kinds of opposition that was arrayed against her, and it was our privilege to bring her into the fold of Christ. I want to bear witness that there is not in the Church anywhere a more devoted, faithful Latter-day Saint than Sister Sifuentes, in the city of Buenos Aires. I am therefore moved to say that I do believe that the Lord is no respecter of persons or of nations, and that all who will receive him and his message shall likewise have equal privileges in his blessed gospel. She became an active and energetic missionary.

ITALIANS INTERESTED IN THE RESTORED GOSPEL

Then some Italians became interested. There are two million of them in the Republic of Argentina. When our assistants came, Brother Stoof and his wife, Brother Sharp and Brother Stoddard, splendid workers, we introduced them into those places where we had started meetings, and our largest group increased until we had an average attendance of about sixty adults. We left them with places for meetings every night in the week, except Saturday night, and three places on Sunday. We left a small group converted, for eleven of them signified to us their intention of joining the Church and bore testimony to the truth of the message we had brought them. When we finally did leave, there were as many tears shed at our departure in Buenos Aires as there had been in Salt Lake City when we left here a year ago. Since leaving that land four splendid Italians, three men and a woman, have joined the Church, and others in addition to the eleven that I have referred to have become interested.

It was a long, hard fight for us. I have no word of censure for the people. They had prejudices against the religion we were advocating because it was not Catholic. We were foreigners and strangers to them. But I rejoice in saying to you, my brethren and sisters, that God was good to us and he opened the door so that ultimately we had the privilege of laying the foundation of the Church in that land, and from a membership of four adults, when we reached that land, we have left twenty-four Latter-day Saints, with the work started in those three languages. We met no opposition, as far as the government is concerned, notwithstanding there is a union of church and state in all the South American republics, save Chile. There was a separation of church and state in Chile a year ago. Yet there is religious liberty in all those countries for our missionary work.

A DIFFICULT MISSIONARY WORK

I found great difficulty in fully satisfying myself, because of my inability to preach the gospel to them through not knowing their language; however, I learned to read it and converse with the people. I satisfied myself in part, however, by assisting in the splendid work that Brother Pratt was performing, by inviting the people to our meetings, and having him translate into Spanish the testimony I wanted to bear to the people of that land. I had the privilege of visiting twelve thousand five hundred homes, giving them this printed message and inviting the people to our meetings. We held two hundred thirty-four meetings, so that Brother Pratt was very busy preaching to the people. We enjoyed the experience, although we had to do things just like we did when we started out in the commencement of our missionary work, like we did when we traveled without purse or scrip. It was the most difficult piece of missionary work that I have undertaken, but I thank the Lord that success has come out of it, that a foundation has been laid, and I am convinced that it is possible for the gospel to be carried to all the people of that land.

VISIT TO THE INDIANS ON THE GREAT ANDES PLATEAU

It was our privilege, through the permission of the Presidency, to return via the West coast. We were anxious not to go away from South America until we had seen the Indians of that land. So in the Northern part of the Argentina we met them, hundreds of thousands of them. We passed up to the plateau of the great Andes mountains, a plateau five hundred miles long by a hundred and fifty miles wide, at an elevation of twelve thousand feet, inhabited by Indians. We lived for some three weeks with them, slept in their houses, ate at their tables, saw millions of them. There are two million eight hundred sixty thousand people in the Republic of Bolivia, nearly two million of them being pure-blood Indians. There are four million six hundred twenty thousand people in Peru, and more than three million and a half of them are pure-blood Indians. There are two classes of Indians. One is the half-breed, a descendant of the Spanish soldier, and the majority of the leaders of South American countries have Indian blood in them, but unfortunately they do not esteem that Indian blood, but are rather more proud of their Spanish blood. Not until the day shall come when they come to an understanding of who they are, and that the Indian blood is of Israel and is of the best blood in the world, will their hearts turn in sympathy and love to the down-trodden and oppressed of their own brothers and sisters, the full-blood Indians.

CONDITION OF THE SOUTH AMERICAN INDIANS

I have never seen a more industrious, hard-working lot of people in my life than the millions of Indians we saw in Bolivia and Peru. My heart went out to them in anxious desire, for I saw them as they are in Mexico, in poverty, robbed of their lands and their glorious civilization, a much better civilization than was brought by Pizarro. A better civilization than they have in those countries was destroyed ruthlessly, and they were murdered, and their lands taken. They were despoiled and have been trodden down and have remained very largely in a state of semi-slavery until today. With all their toil and labor they ought to be a rich and independent people, if they could only have the returns that come from their labor. But the majority of the returns are taken by the land holders, for fifteen per cent of the men in South America own ninety-five per cent of the land, and these conditions have obtained for many years, until they are in a state of poverty, and yet they are in the majority in many of those countries. But the right of suffrage is only extended to those who can read and write, and the majority of the Indians cannot read or write. Few schools are provided for them to learn to read and write, and they are like a great sleeping giant. Many of them speak the Spanish language. So Brother Pratt and I cannot see why the missionary work shall not quickly come unto them.

THE DAY OF THE INDIANS' REDEMPTION DRAWING NIGH

It was our privilege to call on the government officials of both Bolivia and Peru, and to explain our mission and desire to have missionaries go to those lands. We were assured that our missionaries would be welcome, and that there would be no objection on the part of the Government. It is our desire that those precious promises made to their forefathers shall be fulfilled. They shall pass through the same changes that are going forward in Mexico, but they shall come out of their serfdom and bondage into the light of freedom in religious, as well as in political matters, and the day of retribution and their redemption, I am sure, is not far distant.

SPAIN AND ITALY ENTITLED TO HEAR THE GOSPEL

I desire to bear testimony to what President Ivins said here this morning. I believe that the beginning of this gospel dispensation, as set forth in one of these revelations, was the commencement of the times of the Gentiles. I believe that that generation which saw the dawn of this gospel dispensation shall not pass away until the times of the Gentiles shall be fulfilled, and after the days of the Gentiles cometh the day of Israel. I am anxious, therefore, that in the period which yet remains to the Gentile nations to hear the gospel message, we shall send forth the help necessary, not only to those South American countries, but my soul has been turned towards Spain, since I have been in that South land, and also toward Italy. I do not feel we are justified in the opportunity we have given to either Spain or Italy or France or China or to other nations to hear the gospel; so I am looking forward for the time to come in the very near future when those lands shall be fully given the opportunity. Not many of them may come into the fold, and yet I believe that there is some of the blood of Israel in Spain and in Italy, and that the people are entitled to the opportunity of hearing the gospel before the day of judgment shall come. I bear witness to you that the Lord is already beginning the work for the redemption of the house of Israel.

THE GOSPEL TO DELIVER THE CHILDREN OF FATHER LEHI FROM BONDAGE

God gave us the Book of Mormon and the chief reason, as set forth in one of the revelations, is that it shall be the means of bringing to the descendants of Father Lehi the knowledge of the Redeemer of the world, and to establish them in the faith of their fathers. I bear witness to you that nothing on earth shall ever bring them out of their thralldom save the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. I rejoice, therefore, that the day dawn is breaking, the night is dispelling and the day of their redemption cometh. I have wept over them, as I have seen them dwelling in ignorance and poverty in the midst of the ruins of great and glorious cities their fathers built. Such ruins I have never seen elsewhere of mighty temples and cities, the evidence of their past wonderful civilization; and then, as I looked upon these poor, wretched souls who have reached their state of degradation, of poverty and misery, through sin, transgression and oppression, I have prayed to God to bring to pass their deliverance according to his promises, and I feel sure that that day is at hand. May the Lord put it into the hearts of men and women to continue to respond and carry the gospel message wherever it is wanted, and discharge the mighty responsibility that rests upon this Church before the day of judgment shall come, that the Gentile dispensation, when it comes to a close, will find us having discharged our obligation; then cometh the day of Israel, the day of her redemption in all lands. I bear witness to you that swiftly moving events are at our very doors. I bear witness that God is crying repentance to the world in the testimonies of thunder, of lightning and tempests, and if they do not repent he will thresh the nations.

THE TASK AND DUTY OF THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS

There is no safety, so far as the Latter-day Saints are concerned, only by keeping the commandments of God. As I looked at the Church from the distance of eleven thousand miles, I admired what we have done in subduing the desert and making it blossom like the rose, building our temples, tabernacles, and factories; but rising above them all and more splendid and glorious than all else is the manhood and the womanhood that has been established in the earth by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. It is the biggest thing we have done, and may God help us to use all we have or may possess as but a means to the glorious end of establishing here a civilization the like of which the world does not know; that they may come from the East and the West, from the North and the South, to learn of our ways and to walk in our paths. It is our task to perfect the lives of these men and women, boys and girls, until they shall be the light of the world, the salt of the earth. God give us the vision to see it, to work until we shall be successful, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

TABERNACLE CHOIR VISITS CALIFORNIA

About the first of July members of the choir numbering 250 took an excursion to California, where they gave a series of fine concerts. The expense incurred was approximately $12,000. All of this amount except $991.25 was paid from the receipts of the concerts given. The balance was paid out of the treasury of the choir, it being their proportion of receipts from concerts given locally prior to that time.

Credit should be given the authorities and members of the Los Angeles stake for helping to make this trip a success, for they all gave of their time, and were enthusiastic in their efforts to have the people of Los Angeles and surrounding territory hear the choir.

The choir is worthy of the support of all the people who hear it so often, but when they give a concert many of us do not feel the moral obligation, as well as the small financial obligation, to assist the choir by attending their concerts.

PETER WHITMER FARM PURCHASED

President Brigham H. Roberts was authorized to purchase, and succeeded in purchasing, the Peter Whitmer Farm, where the organization of the Church took place. The deal has been closed, and we are now the owners of the building where the Church was legally organized.

The choir sang the anthem, "Worthy is the Lamb."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder George Albert Smith, of the Council of the Twelve.

The conference adjourned until Monday, 10 o'clock a. m., October 4.

FIRST OVERFLOW MEETING

An overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 10 o'clock a. m., Sunday, October 3, 1926.

Elder Charles H. Hart, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

The singing was furnished by the Tenth ward choir of Salt Lake City, Elder Norman Martin conducting; Elder Tracy Y. Cannon, organist.

The choir and congregation sang, "Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah," after which the choir sang an anthem, "Loyalty."

Prayer was offered by Elder David R. Lyon, of the Ensign ward, Salt Lake City.

The choir sang the anthem, "As the dew from heaven distilling;" Sister Mary Salt, soloist.

ELDER DAVID A. SMITH

Of the Presiding Bishopric

I assure you, my brethren and sisters, it is a pleasure for me to be with you this morning. I regret that we can not be in the Tabernacle where we could listen to the opening address of our President, for no doubt we shall miss something through not having that privilege; yet I am sure that if we have faith, desiring the blessings of the Lord, we shall be blessed with his Spirit and shall have a time of rejoicing here.

As I looked upon the great throng as they were making their way early this morning to find seats in the Tabernacle or in this building, I remarked to Bishop Cannon that they were showing their faith by their works. The fact that so many will come out in a rain storm such as we have this morning, making the atmosphere so disagreeable, shows that these people here hope to be fed the bread of life; and I sincerely pray that those who are assembled will not go away hungry, and that the Lord will bless me while I address you and will give me strength and wisdom to speak to you words of truth and encouragement. We have all, no doubt, discovered that there is always more to be gained through personal contact with the speaker than through reading his addresses alone, for personal contact enables us to catch the spirit of the remarks better than can be done through the written word. This may explain why so many are willing to face wind and rain to be where they can hear the words of those whom God has chosen and whom we sustain as our leaders, for they are anxious to receive that spiritual food which comes to those who attend such gatherings, hungry for spiritual food. Each individual may test for himself the Savior's words: "Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled." What a wonderful privilege it is to partake of this spiritual uplift which brings us together in one great cause!

I found an interesting example of this during the latter part of July. I was called, by the First Presidency of the Church, to take charge of an excursion of the Salt Lake Tabernacle Choir to California. It was a pleasure to accompany them and help to look after them, although a strenuous undertaking. The Choir train carried more than three hundred fifty people, two hundred fifty of whom were choir members. They gave nine concerts in ten days and traveled every night but one. During the trip each member seemed to have a desire to make the most favorable impression upon the people, both in their singing and in their conduct, which was above criticism. Through the help of President McCune, of the Los Angeles stake, and his associates, President McMurrin, of the California mission, and the missionaries laboring under him, we were received cordially and had full houses wherever concerts were given. This enabled us to return home, having paid our expenses through the receipts from these concerts and from others given at home prior to our departure.

On the way, and before we entered the city of Sacramento, an official of the Chamber of Commerce of that city boarded the train, and, coming to the car where I was, he said, "Bishop Smith, I have come up here because I desire to talk to you concerning matters which we consider important and I knew I could not have much of your time when you arrive in Sacramento. It is my business to look after the Tourists' Department and the Colonization Department of the Sacramento Chamber of Commerce and the development of the Sacramento Valley. After studying the situation carefully, we have decided to request that your Church give us a stake organization in this district." I asked him whether or not he was a member of the Church, although I did not think he was, for when he boarded the train he was smoking a cigar. He answered, "No, I am not a member of the Church." Then I asked, "What do you know about a stake organization?" His answer was, "I know that it is impossible to get your people to gather in one place in any great numbers unless they have an organization to keep them at work and supply their spiritual needs, and we want to fill this valley with Latter-day Saints.

"Years ago," he said, "settlers in this valley started to get the water out upon the land. Among these settlers were a few 'Mormon' families. The first year these people failed, and their crops failed, and many of the settlers moved away. The next year they continued their work and planted their crops, but were not successful in getting sufficient water to save all of them, and still more of the people moved away. The 'Mormons' stayed and continued digging ditches to provide a means of getting water on to the land. They worked with one another and for one another, divided their substance, and helped one another in every way, that all might succeed. They showed none of the spirit of selfishness commonly found, and were filled with hope that they should eventually succeed and make prosperous homes for themselves. The next year they succeeded and put water on to the land, and their ground became productive, a garden spot in a desert; and those who had moved away, and others who had come in to look and see what had been done, were encouraged. Then men with money, seeing what had been accomplished, and having dreams of what might be accomplished, came in with their money, and the result is that the Sacramento Valley is today the best watered valley in California."

I have not verified that statement, but the thing of interest to me is that this man and many others have discovered a principle that is a fundamental doctrine of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints: That to succeed we must cooperate one with another, we must help one another, we must set aside all feeling of selfishness which is found in all the world in this day, and we must have an interest in our brother and render assistance to him whenever it is possible to do so, whether that assistance be temporal or spiritual; and this help should be rendered in the spirit of love and good fellowship, following the teachings of the Savior. This spirit must be manifest in great abundance before Zion can be finally redeemed, for Zion is to be redeemed only when the people keep the celestial law; and this is a state preparatory to the coming of our Lord and Savior to establish his kingdom in the earth.

Down there in California men whose only interest is to make money, and who are seeking to bring settlers in upon their land for the main purpose of bringing wealth to them and their communities, see a way of capitalizing this principle, a principle which I believe many Latter-day Saints have not fully discovered, although it is a dominating factor in their success. In order to succeed, we must have the spirit of this work, and when I say we must have the spirit of this work, I mean the God-given power of discernment which keeps before us the vision of eternal life; and unless we serve God we cannot possess this spirit, and the nearer we draw to him, the more this spirit is felt. Having discovered this, his servants find that strength that comes from personal contact with one another and through hearing the word. This is, no doubt, one reason why so many have gathered here today, in spite of the storm, to hear the word of the Lord. It is what causes them to stay where they can serve God as he has commanded them to do. One of the apostles of old has stated in I Corinthians 3:13-19:

"Every man's work shall be made manifest: for the day shall declare it, because it shall be revealed by fire; and the fire shall try every man's work of what sort it is.

"If any man's work abide which he hath built thereupon, he shall receive a reward.

"If any man's work shall be burned, he shall suffer loss: but he himself shall be saved; yet so as by fire.

"Know ye not that ye are the temple of God, and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?

"If any man defile the temple of God, him shall God destroy; for the temple of God is holy, which temple ye are.

"Let no man deceive himself. If any man among you seemeth to be wise in this world, let him become a fool, that he may be wise.

"For the wisdom of this world is foolishness with God. For it is written, He taketh the wise in their own craftiness."

We see how those Latter-day Saints in California referred to were tried, how their work was revealed, how their success came through the spirit of cooperation and unselfishness, just as the pioneers who settled this valley performed their work in unselfishness, and whose sufferings and hardships were tempered with songs of thanksgiving and praise to their God, for through their faith and their works they hoped to get a reward, perhaps not in this life, but surely in the life to come.

Man may easily deceive himself, and say in his heart, "There is no God." He may see no injurious effects from contaminating his body through mental debauchery or physical contamination, and "Why should God interfere?" they may ask. Members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, who have received the gift of the Holy Ghost, should have no trouble in answering these questions, for they believe their bodies to be the temples of the living God and that his Spirit dwells within only when that dwelling place is clean and made fit to house that spirit.

We have recorded in the Doctrine and Covenants the revelation known as the Word of Wisdom. It was not given as a commandment or by constraint, "but by revelation and the word of wisdom, showing forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation of all Saints in the last days—

"Given for a principle with promise, adapted to the capacity of the weak and the weakest of all Saints, who are or can be called Saints."

Since this time, it has been accepted as a revelation and made binding upon the Church. When first given, it seemed revolutionary in its nature, but now, after ninety-three years we find leaders in health movements and physical culturists advocating these principles. They mean more to us than to others, for they look only for physical strength to enable them to enjoy life. We add to that a desire to make of our bodies fit dwelling places for the Spirit of God which, when possessed, brings joy unmatched by physical strength alone. Time will not permit me to dwell at length on the many wonderful promises made in this revelation. I am, therefore, referring only to the use of tobacco and strong drinks:

"Behold, verily, thus saith the Lord unto you: In consequence of evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days, I have warned you, and forewarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation—

"That inasmuch as any man drinketh wine or strong drink among you, behold it is not good, neither meet in the sight of your Father, only in assembling yourselves together to offer up your sacraments before him.

"And, behold, this should be wine, yea, pure wine of the grape of the vine of your own make.

"And, again, strong drinks are not for the belly, but for the washing of your bodies.

"And again, tobacco is not for the body, neither for the belly, and is not good for man, but is an herb for bruises and all sick cattle, to be used with judgment and skill."

It may seem strange, but nevertheless is a fact, that men who use tobacco or liquor soon lose the spirit of Church work. Let me give you an example of what I mean:

The other day I met a young man, a member of the Church who has filled a mission and who knows the doctrines of the Church, and who at one time was active in Church work. He had a cigar in his mouth, and I asked, "Aren't you ashamed of yourself?" He answered, "You don't know how good a cigar is after meals." And I answered, "You and the Lord for it. He says it is not good, and the fact that it is a filthy habit and what the Lord has said, would keep me from it, even though it did taste good." He answered, "This doesn't hurt anybody. It is all nonsense to think tobacco hurts a person. I am just as strong physically today as I have ever been." I asked, "Are you mentally?" He answered, "It has not hurt my mental condition a bit. I can carry on my business as well as ever I could." "How has it affected you spiritually?" "Well," he answered, "I don't think it has hurt me spiritually. I still have a testimony of the gospel." I asked him if he attended his meetings. "No," he answered. "Are you active in your Priesthood quorum?" He said he was not. "Do you pay your tithing?" "Well, I am not a full tithepayer; I pay a little once in a while." I said, "Now, honestly, do you ever do anything in the Church at all?" "No," he answered, "I must admit that I do not." "And why don't you?" After a moment's pause he answered "I don't know." I then quoted for him a part of the passage quoted above, and as he looked at me he said, "Well, I don't know. I have never looked at it in that way before."

My mission calls me, as one of the presidency of the Aaronic priesthood, to study the conditions of the young men in the Church. I have seen them grow into manhood, become active in Church work; and I have seen some drift away and become inactive. In every case investigated—and I have studied many—the cause of their indifference has been traced to the use of tobacco; and I am satisfied that the use of tobacco or liquor will drive the Spirit of the Lord from a person and leave that person to grope in darkness. To partake of and enjoy the Spirit of the Lord and the blessings promised, we must keep the commandments and remember that every man's work shall be made manifest, for the day shall declare it because it shall be revealed by fire.

I don't know that the Lord meant that he would destroy the body in the literal sense of destruction, although there is no sound argument that can be used to show that liquor and tobacco do not have an injurious effect upon the body. They are injurious not only to the physical body, but to the spiritual body as well. I have yet to find one person who has had the Priesthood of God conferred upon him who indulges in the use of tobacco and who insists upon continuing in this habit who has retained the Spirit of God and continued active in the Church. This is evidence to me that it destroys a man's usefulness and spirituality.

I suggest that we give some little thought to this, that we may see for ourselves, not for the purpose of ridiculing our brethren who are so weak that they give themselves over to these filthy habits, but to encourage them and to strengthen ourselves, in order that we might see the dangers lurking in our midst and keep ourselves free from these dangers. Let us cultivate the Spirit of the Lord; let us cultivate that spirit of cooperation and love which the world has discovered exists in our midst, and let us go to those who are engaging in these pernicious practices and encourage them to clean themselves up, in order that they too may be fed spiritually and may partake of the blessings of God which he has promised. Do we truly believe that we are the children of God, created in his image, and that we are bought with a price, the price of the blood of our Redeemer shed for us? If so, let us glorify God in our bodies and in our spirits, which are God's. We should always be in possession of the Spirit of God and should give heed to its whisperings, for without that Spirit, we are told, we cannot know the things of God. His Only Begotten Son suffered and was crucified that we, as his children, might enter again into his presence and partake of his joys. He has provided different degrees of glory and has given us to understand that we are to inherit the degree we earn, through our faithfulness upon this earth, which we are told is a preparatory state. Being a kind and loving Father, he has given every opportunity for us to know of the things that we should know to prepare us for the glory in which he dwells.

One of the ancient apostles has said:

"But if the Spirit of him that raised up Jesus from the dead dwell in you, he that raised up Christ from the dead shall also quicken your mortal bodies by his Spirit that dwelleth in you.

"Therefore, brethren, we are debtors, not to the flesh, to live after the flesh.

"For if ye live after the flesh, ye shall die: but if ye through the Spirit do mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

"For as many as are led by the Spirit of God, they are the sons of God."

May we conduct our lives that we shall never grieve that Spirit or cause it to depart from us, but may we possess it always to guide us and help us in our efforts to serve God, is my prayer which I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER M. HOWARD RANDALL

President of the Morgan Stake

My brethren and sisters: I must confess that this is a surprise to me to be asked to say anything at this conference. I have enjoyed the exercises and the remarks made thus far this morning. My heart is in the work. I know that the gospel of Jesus Christ is true. I know that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints was organized and instituted through the Prophet Joseph Smith, and that he was an instrument in the hands of God in doing this work. I am proud to be numbered as a Latter-day Saint, and to be with you to bear testimony to the gospel of Jesus Christ.

I have had a good many thoughts while sitting here this morning, and I feel that if every one of us responded to the calls made upon us, carried the responsibilities placed upon us as members of this Church, that this work would be more successful. I fear that sometimes there are men and women upon whom we place responsibilities who, to a certain extent, shun those responsibilities, and feel that they are not so important as thought by those who placed the responsibilities upon them. I often wonder why it is that men and women who have accepted the gospel, and have a testimony burning in their souls that Jesus is the Christ, shun these responsibilities. I often wonder why it is that they do not sense the responsibilities placed upon their shoulders.

Not long ago I listened to the testimony of a young man who had been on a mission. What Brother Smith said brought it to my mind. He and another elder had filled missions and were given honorable releases. Just previous to their departure, a family of Saints gave a little banquet in their honor. Just as they closed the banquet, they passed tea around, and asked them if they would have a drink of tea. The elder that was with this young man said, "I have received my release; it is all right for me to drink tea." He drank five cups! After it was over, the lady took the other elder aside and made this remark, "I have always understood that ten cups of tea would kill a man. He drank five cups. I wish I had given him the other five." The elder taken aside said, "I wished I could have given him the other five cups myself. To think I have labored two and a half years preaching the gospel and then the elder I had labored with and associated with do the thing I had been teaching people not to do—the very thing he had been teaching them not to do!" The result was that he left, disgraced; people were disgusted with him.

At this same gathering I heard of a missionary who had labored two and a half years in England and had been successful in converting a young lady and her mother to the gospel of Jesus Christ. They came to the valleys of the mountains, expecting to see the Saints living the gospel, but she told me, "To my surprise, as I walked down the sidewalk in Salt Lake City, I met the very man who had taught me the gospel in England walking down the street with a cigarette in his mouth." And she wrote to this elder, "I am disgusted with 'Mormonism,' with the elders who taught me the gospel in England, to think that, after I have come to Zion, they live as they do live. I looked to see men of God; living the things they had taught me; but on the contrary, I see some of these young men are not living as they ought to live." They bring disgrace upon the cause of God, and upon the great majority who live their religion. I would not have you think, my brethren and sisters, for one minute, that I would justify the woman in leaving the Church, because of this. But I do believe that men and women who accept membership and positions in the Church should live so that when they come in contact with other people, it may be seen that they are living their religion.

I often wonder if I am going through life failing to sound the warning voice that I should sound. When I meet my Maker on the other side, if the question is asked, "Did you do your full duty, as a servant of God and as a Latter-day Saint in teaching the men and women that Jesus is the Christ and Joseph Smith a prophet of God, and in performing every obligation that God asked you to perform, or did you evade the responsibilities he placed upon you?" I often wonder what my answer will be.

One time, when I was stake superintendent of Sunday Schools, a woman came to me and said, "My son has more confidence in you than in any other man that I know of in the stake." I wondered then, as I have wondered since, if my life was of such a nature as to affect this young man growing in this Church, growing in knowledge and information, or taking the downward road that leads to destruction; and whether, if my life affected him in a way that caused him not to live as he should, I would be held responsible in any degree for his action. The thought came back to me that if my life affected men and women so that they did not live right, I would be held responsible in the end for some of those conditions. I believe it is my duty, my responsibility, to live the life of a Latter-day Saint as the Lord intended I should, that I shall listen to the whisperings of the Spirit of God and obey them, that I may not be found in by and forbidden paths, or in company that the Lord does not desire a servant of his to be in. I should be exemplary and carry with me the dignity of my position, the sense of responsibility that God has placed upon me and live and magnify the same before him. I hope and pray that when I meet on the other side with my children or associates that none can say that I did not do as I should, that I did not teach them by the proper example.

I remember a number of years ago visiting a family in our stake. Previous to visiting them, the lady of the house came and asked if we would not please talk to her son about his drinking beer. I remember going into the home. The elder with me talked to the young man and said it was not right to get drunk, as he was doing, that it was breaking his mother's heart. The young man turned around to the elder and said, "I want you to understand that my mother is responsible for the life I have lived. When I was a boy twelve or fifteen years of age, my mother set me down to the table with crackers and beer. It created a desire for beer, and I cannot leave it alone." Could you have seen that mother, as she sat by the old stove, the fire burning bright and showing the tears running down her cheeks, it would have grieved your heart.

I do not know whether the son told the truth. There may have been some truth in it. I felt that a young man should have had respect enough for his mother not to have made the statement in her presence, at least. On the other hand, I have wondered many times since, "Were the words of that young man true? Did his mother's life affect his life in such a manner that he did not care for her teachings?

I want to tell you, brethren and sisters, that these are serious reflections. The souls of the children of God are precious in his sight. It should be the aim and desire of every father and mother to teach the gospel in a way that will impress men and women. I believe with all my soul that it is true. The young men and women of the Church today are growing, and to a great extent, their destiny is in our hands and power to place them in an armor that will lead them upward in the cause of truth, that they may be virtuous and live as God intended, or downward against his will.

We spend thousands of dollars to convert men and women who live in foreign lands and in America, who are not worth any more, or as much, perhaps, as the men and women who are in our midst, who are our neighbors day by day and who are starving for the gospel of Jesus Christ. Perhaps some of you may say, "They have plenty of opportunity to go to the organizations, where the gospel of Jesus Christ is taught." It is true, but the responsibility that God has placed upon us carries with it enough importance to teach wherever we are, that we should bear the testimony that Jesus is the Christ, and in such a manner that it will convince men that it is of God.

A little piece of poetry I sometimes read as I visit the Sunday Schools of our stake, called "The Sunday School Automobile," applies to every organization in the Church:

All rules of success considered, the most essential element is "Getting started." Therefore, use a self-starter on your Sunday School automobile.

Use the brakes of patience and self-control.

Put large quantities of hope in the grease cups.

Use a perseverance brand of gasoline as motive power, instead of hot air.

Have the timer properly set, EARLY.

Have the carburetor properly adjusted, admitting a mixture of equal parts of earnestness and will power.

Use the primer of enthusiasm.

Best results can be obtained by using the four cylinders of knowledge—

The knowledge of self,

The knowledge of company,

The knowledge of work,

The knowledge of children (men).

Advance the spark of ambition for more speed.

Open wide the throttle of faith in yourself, in your work, and in your calling, to secure more power.

Use the polish of courtesy.

Use tires of stick-to-it-iveness, on non-discouragement rims.

Use the Golden Rule steering wheel.

Put on search lights of character, and with the foregoing equipment, the Sunday School automobile will take every hill of disappointment and discouragement on high gear.

I believe, brethren and sisters, if these things were put into the life of every man and woman who accepts responsibility in this Church, if we would sense that responsibility, if we would first take an inventory of our own lives and gather out the weak points and improve upon them, that we would be successful as individuals. It is said the chain is no stronger than its weakest link, and it is so with men and women who accept positions in this Church. I have delighted in working in the organizations of the Church. I consider it an honor to be permitted to work in the organizations for the growth, development, and benefit of the human family. My desire is that we may all sense this responsibility.

My testimony is that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith is a prophet of the living God, that he gave his life as a testimony that his doctrine and teachings are of God. I recall his words when he left Nauvoo to go to Carthage jail. When he looked upon Nauvoo he said, "I have a conscience void of offense toward God and toward all men. I shall die innocent. It shall yet be said of me, 'He was murdered in cold blood'."

My grandfather heard a message delivered to the governor, saying, "They intend to kill the prophet," and he said, "If you know anything about it, keep still." My grandfather said it always seemed peculiar to him that a man who held a responsible position, and who was, no doubt, in a position to prevent certain conditions, should say, "If you know anything about it, keep still." My testimony to you is that the present leaders of this Church are men inspired of God and doing their utmost for the advancement of those who are members of this Church.

I pray that the Lord will bless us with his Spirit, protect us from harm, and extend to us and create within our minds a greater desire to love and honor the authorities and to honor our call, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

A duet, "Come unto me," was sung by Earl Martin and Ronald Salt.

ELDER CHARLES H. HART

Of the First Council of Seventy

The next speaker will be President Soren M. Nielsen of the North Sanpete stake. Brother Nielsen was formerly stake superintendent of Mutuals, and a military leader. He is now proving himself to be a real captain as a president of the North Sanpete stake.

ELDER SOREN M. NIELSEN

President of the North Sanpete Stake

I appreciate the kind words of our presiding authority here this morning. I have learned to love President Hart through my acquaintance and my associations with him. He was present at the time I was set apart as president of the North Sanpete stake of Zion and had something to do, I am sure, with my being chosen.

Last evening after arriving in the city, I was dining with a person from home who said he intended to leave the city some time today for home. I urged upon him to attend some of the sessions of the conference before he returned. When he informed me that time would hardly permit, I rather insisted that he attend at least the opening session of the conference, this morning in the Tabernacle, as that, I thought, was the most important session of the conference, the most interesting, and he would feel well paid for spending that much time in the city. This morning, when the president of the Church read my name as one to speak here, it came as a thunder-bolt from the sky, and I have been wondering since if that is my penalty for singling out one of the sessions of the conference as being better than another. I am sure, my brethren and sisters, whether it is the opening session or the closing session, it matters little to Latter-day Saints who are present to participate in the Spirit of the Lord and to be fed the bread of life. I am sure the message delivered in one session is as important as that in another, provided our hearts are in tune with the mission and purpose of this Church. I am convinced of that this morning, for I have thoroughly enjoyed myself here, and I pray that while I occupy this position, the same Spirit may actuate my thoughts that has prompted those who have spoken before me, and that has influenced the rendition of the songs and the music listened to this morning.

I was impressed with the testimony of Bishop Smith in his conversation with the non-member of our Church in California. We see on every hand where men are trying to capitalize the organization of this Church for the purpose of making money. I remember reading in the public press of a certain organization that had offered to contribute to this Church a site for a temple in one of the California cities. Their sole motive, my brethren and sisters, was to bring Latter-day Saints there in a body, sell them real estate, perhaps, or in some other way enrich their pocketbooks.

I want to contrast that with the motive of a man with whom I held a conversation just recently, a man whom I have known all my life. We have grown up, virtually, together, at least since boyhood—he a member of the Presbyterian Church, and I affiliated with the Latter-day Saints. He said to me, “Brother Nielsen, I have come to the conclusion that if there is a true Church of Christ on the face of the earth today, it is not the Presbyterian church, but that it is the ‘Mormon’ Church. I have learned to appreciate you people. I have marveled at the accomplishments of the membership of your Church. I have learned to love and admire you and others with whom I have mingled all my life. I have learned that there is nothing uplifting or that will tend to uplift the souls of men that the Latter-day Saints are not seeking. There is nothing that will tend to destroy the character of individuals but that the Latter-day Saints are always ready to condemn it. They are constantly striving for the development of the talents of their children; they are anxious to see them grow, and they make liberal provisions for their education and their advancement in life. The social and community life of no other people can be compared with theirs. When I compare a community of Latter-day Saints with one made up of other organizations, I note that when men and women belong to lodges and secret organizations there is a tendency to pull apart, to segregate themselves into classes, each one destroying, or at least tending to destroy, the efforts of the other. I see no good in lodges or fraternal organizations. I see definite good in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. They are banded together working for a common cause—and that always characterized by the highest ideals."

I said to him, "I have noted you in recent years especially, that you have been more friendly to us, and I have predicted to others that you some day would become a member of this Church; I trust that I shall not be disappointed."

And he said to me: "I am ready now, if I only dared, if I only had the courage, to enter the waters of baptism, but I know what will happen to me; I shall be ostracized by my family and friends, those who have been near to me all the days of my life, and I have not the moral courage to break away from those associations to become one of your people. I know the criticism that would be heaped upon me. And yet I am a Latter-day Saint. I am willing to confess that I have accepted of the gospel, that I believe it; and even now, if I had the least assurance that through my membership in the Church I could enjoy a small portion of the growth and development that I have noted in others, in your Church, even though I am pretty well along in life, if I could be able through affiliation with your Church to learn to stand before an audience, to express myself in public (he is a talented man, by the way, but timid), if I could acquire that knowledge and ability, even now I believe I would become a member of your Church, in spite of the criticism that I know would come to me."

I promised him that if he would come into the Church, accept the Priesthood, lend himself to its influences and teachings, he would live to see the day that he would be an active member of this Church and that his voice would yet be heard publicly in the defense of its truth.

Brethren and sisters, I want to express to you my appreciation for my membership in this Church, for the fact that I see, as this brother has discovered, that there is no place in the world I would rather be than here. I thank my Father in heaven for the fact that the missionaries of this Church have invaded foreign lands and preached the gospel to my family and made it possible for me to come here and enjoy the associations and the blessings of membership in this Church. I have heard many of the testimonies borne in this building; I have been here at Mutual Improvement conferences, where our testimony meeting is usually held, and I have heard some inspiring testimonies borne. Usually they begin by saying, "I have been taught the principles of the gospel by my parents. I am thankful that I was born in a Latter-day Saint home, etc. I am thankful that I have been able to go on a mission and receive there a testimony of the gospel."

I want to say to you, my brethren and sisters, that being born in the Church is not necessary. I was not born of "Mormon" parentage, though my mother is a member of the Church. I was not raised in a Latter-day Saint home, strictly speaking. I have never been on a mission. But through my affiliation with the auxiliary organizations and the Priesthood quorums of this Church, I have acquired a testimony of the divinity of this gospel. I have learned to know that this is the Church of Christ, that it was reestablished under the inspiration of our Father in heaven and through the instrumentality of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and that those who adhere to its teachings, make the ideals of the Church their ideals, will enjoy greater blessings than any other people on the face of the earth; also, that we can become a happier people, and more fully comprehend the purposes of life than any one else, through the study of the gospel. I pray, brethren and sisters, that all of us may sense our responsibility as Latter-day Saints.

In conclusion, may I say that I am confident that the influence brought to bear upon the individual to whom I referred has come from the example set by members of his community, not by their sermons. I believe that the family life of the people of that ward, the community life, the social activities, in other words, the conduct of those people as Latter-day Saints, have converted him to the principles of "Mormonism," and not the sermons they have preached on the Sabbath day. May we so order our lives, brethren and sisters, that those who are watching us, and observing our actions, may come into the fold of this Church through the example we set, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER ANDREW JENSON

Assistant Church Historian

In just three years and a half from now the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints will be one hundred years old. It has been, and is, a most remarkable organization. There never has been another one like it upon the face of the earth. We do not have to compare the Church to which we belong with any of the so-called Christian churches of today, so far as members and progress are concerned, but we can consistently compare it with other dispensations that the Lord has established upon the earth for the salvation of mankind; and particularly do we take pleasure in comparing it with the Church which was organized more than eighteen hundred years ago by the Savior himself and his apostles. We can also draw comparison between the Church to which we belong and the Church organized among the Nephites about the same time that the Church was organized in what we call the old world. But the history of the Nephite Church is very brief. And the same might be said of the history of the original Church organized in Palestine, or in Asia.

There are some comparisons that I sometimes think of. Jesus was thirty years old when he commenced to preach. Up to that time we have but very little knowledge of what he did. Joseph Smith was twenty-five years old when he, as an instrument in the hands of the Lord, organized the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in 1830. After one hundred years had passed away from the time that Christ commenced his ministry we find (by referring to the historians of that day, such as Matthew, Mark, Luke and John, the Acts of the Apostles and the writings of the historian Eusebius, who wrote the history of the first 325 years of the so-called Christian church), that there was scarcely anything left of the original church. It is a strange thing that such should be the case, but it was undoubtedly in the providence of the Lord. Before the first century of that dispensation had passed away all the apostles had been killed except John; other leaders of the church had also gone to their rest, most of them falling as martyrs to truth, for that was a time of martyrdom. John, who did not taste death, as we understand it, was the only apostle left. So, at the end of one hundred years from the time that Christ commenced his ministry in Galilee the great majority of the people who belonged to the original church had passed away, either by natural death or had fallen as martyrs, or gone into apostasy. The falling away had become so universal during the latter part of the first century of the Christian era that there was scarcely anyone to speak of left professing the true gospel of Jesus Christ when the century ended. False doctrines had been introduced into the church, and the falling away, which had been predicted by Paul and others, had indeed taken place.

It is different with the dispensation to which we belong. When this Church shall be one hundred years old, the historians will be able to record that it never before was any stronger or its membership more numerous. We can easily judge the condition of the Church three years and a half hence. At the present time we can say that the Church never had so many organized stakes of Zion as it has now, and never before so many bishop's wards, nor so many missionary fields at one time; that is, if we make exception of a few temporary missions established in the early days of the Church; but, taking it all throughout, the Church to which we belong never had a more prosperous existence than it has at the present time, when we refer to the thousands of noble men and women in it. We may regret that there are some weak members, who are not as true to the gospel of Jesus Christ as they might be, but there is a sufficient number of faithful men and women, both young and old, to warrant my statement; the majority of the members of this Church would be an honor to any community. That really should prove to all that we have borne good fruit, and our actions are now being copied by many of the people of the world who have figured with organizations that have been less successful than ours has been.

It is one thing to make history, another thing to write it. If it had not been for the writers I have mentioned, who belonged to the original Church, what would the doings of Christ mean to us? We would have known next to nothing of his activities. The doctrines he taught would have been hid in mystery and conjectures. For instance, if Matthew, or some other historian, had not recorded the Sermon on the Mount, we would not have had that splendid exposition of gospel truths. And if somebody had not recorded the many other beautiful sayings of Christ and his apostles, what would we have known of the ministry of Christ and of his apostles? We would merely have had some vague ideas handed down by tradition that would lead astray more than lead aright; but because these things that are written, we have at least some knowledge of these earlier dispensations.

In our day, the first thing the Lord did after the Church to which we belong was organized with six members, in the little village of Fayette, Seneca county, New York, was to command that a Church recorder should be appointed, a man who should write down what was taking place. That man was Oliver Cowdery. He had previously assisted Joseph Smith the Prophet in translating the Book of Mormon; and now, after that sacred record had been completed and printed, his labor with the pen was continued through his appointment as the first Church recorder. Since that time we have had recorders and historians in the Church who have been more or less faithful, and more or less efficient in doing their work. Soon Oliver Cowdery was appointed to other positions in the Church, and another man was called to be Church recorder. But as that man was not very faithful in the discharge of his duties the early history of the Church is not as complete as we would like it to be. There are certain very important dates lacking because John Whitmer did not do his duty. Nevertheless, we have sufficient to show that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is a most complete and successful organization, and we also rejoice in the promise made that it shall never come to an end. Other dispensations have ceased to exist, but this one to which we belong will continue, and the Church shall finally grow into the Kingdom of Heaven, over which Christ shall reign as King of kings, and Lord of lords.

It requires much effort and labor to keep track of the thousands and tens of thousands of missionaries who have gone out from the headquarters of the Church to preach the gospel. We are, at the present time, engaged in making a list of them. In a few weeks we expect to complete the same, and we will then be able to state approximately how many elders, and how many missionary sisters, have been sent out from the headquarters of the Church to preach the gospel in different lands and climes. We will also have a good idea of how many people have been baptized since the Church was organized, notwithstanding the fact that many important Church records have been destroyed or lost. We will also know approximately how many branches of the Church have been organized in the different countries of the world, where our missionaries have labored. You will, perhaps, be surprised to learn that they are numbered by thousands, and you will be astonished to know that at one time there were nearly a thousand branches of the Church in Great Britain alone. We will surely have something interesting to tell the Latter-day Saints when the Church is one hundred years old.

It has already taken much time and money, and also necessitated much travel, to gather material and record the events of the history of the Church from the beginning to the close of the nineteenth century. Years ago we found, at the Historian's office, that we could not locate ourselves within the walls of that little building which stood across the street from where the large Church building now stands, and there write histories of the stakes of Zion and of the different missions of the Church. We found it was necessary to go abroad, travel extensively and gather material for history in many lands and climes. Your humble servant has had the pleasure, if I may call it such, to be a globe trotter. Some people have thought that I have traveled more than necessary, but I know better than that, and am convinced that I have not traveled nearly as much as I should have done in order to become a good and reliable historian. Yet I have traveled about 490,000 miles in the interest of the Church, and I have come to the conclusion that the work accomplished could not have been done in any other way than by going into the field for material. We have had Church recorders and historians all the time since the organization of the Church, and they have found it possible to record facts as they have been reported to headquarters from time to time; but the recorders could never make a complete history of this Church unless they go abroad, visit with the elders and saints in different parts of the world, peruse records and become acquainted geographically with the stakes of Zion and the countries of the world. Then, in connection with the reports that are sent in from year to year, they can write history, and it may be said that these reports are now better than they have been before. A complete history of this Church, in my opinion, can never be written unless that mode of procedure is followed.

We do not know what will take place in the near future; only this we believe, that great events are close at hand. But we do sincerely hope and pray for a general awakening in the interest of Church history. Sometimes, when I visit some of the stakes of Zion in the interest of history I am looked upon as a sort of Rip van Winkle, or some ancient of days, who has been asleep for twenty years, or more, and it seems as if some people are actually annoyed by it. I do not say this as a slur upon the Saints generally. This lethargy can perhaps be traced to the fact that for years only very little attention has been paid to Church history in a public way. We preach about the Word of Wisdom. Imagine what the consequence would be, if our brethren from time to time did not open their mouths to draw attention to that particular word of God. Even, after mentioning it and speaking about it repeatedly, such conditions exist as those we have had explained to us in this meeting by the brethren who have preceded me. Now, inasmuch as the importance of history has not been mentioned much of late years, the people have become careless about it, and quite frequently we hear somebody say, "We have enough to do with the present and looking out for the future; let the past alone." It may be true that the present is more important to us than the past; and yet I contend that without knowing something about the past, we do not know where we come in as elders of the Church laboring in the vineyard both at home and abroad. It is necessary for us to know how we fit in as we continue the labors commenced by Joseph Smith the Prophet and continued by Brigham Young and his successors. In Great Britain we need to know how the present missionaries fit in with the labors in earlier days by Heber C. Kimball, Orson Hyde, Brigham Young, Orson Pratt, Wilford Woodruff, and many others. We from Scandinavia need to know how our present missionaries fit in with the labors commenced by Erastus Snow and his fellow-laborers seventy-six years ago. Without some knowledge in regard to the past, we scarcely know where we are at. We know we belong to a great organization, but not always what our particular duties are in building upon the foundation that the heroes and heroines of this Church laid many years ago.

My message as one of the historians of this Church is this: We want cooperation; we need a general awakening in regard to the importance of record-keeping. We must become better posted in regard to the history of this Church, the most important organization of its kind that ever existed upon the face of the earth. We cannot sit still and quietly at the Historian's office and steer the great ship of Zion historically, we need the cooperation of the local authorities and the people generally. We want the stake clerks and ward clerks, and clerks of the priesthood and auxiliary organizations to stand by us. And when we send out, or go out, for information we want to examine and peruse the records that are in existence for historical material. We raise our voice against the destruction or the losing of records, and draw attention to the folly of looking upon record-books in the same light that a school boy looks upon his copy book—when it is written full it is of no further use. The records of a ward or quorum are entirely different from that. A blank book is worth nothing to the historian, but being filled with records it is, in many instances, worth its weight in gold. We would, therefore, earnestly insist that the brethren and sisters in charge of records, or even private journals, do not destroy them or lose them. The time will surely come when they will be wanted. Probably much that is in them may be mere chaff, that never will be worth copying, but there will always be something found in these records that will be of use to the historian. I cannot remember that I ever in my life have perused a record book of any kind—and I have perused thousands of them—but what I have found something in it of historical importance.

Now, brethren and sisters, let us wake up to a realization of the fact, that there is something of vital importance for us to know in the past, as well as in the present and the future. I speak as one who has devoted almost his entire life in the historical field, and who for many years has endeavored to draw attention to the fact that the writing of history is the next thing to making it. May God bless us and enable us to be faithful and diligent in discharging the duties pertaining to our respective callings in the service of God, I sincerely pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

I think you will agree with me, my brethren and sisters, that we have had a musical and spiritual feast here today, and now I am anxious that during the few remaining minutes I may be able to continue the feast that has thus far been served to us.

Among the minor prophecies given to Joseph Smith was the prediction of the angel Moroni, that Joseph's name should be known for good and for evil among every nation, tongue, and people; that is, that good and evil should be spoken of him among all people. For many years the great preponderance of the things uttered and written in fulfilment of this prophecy was against him, but now the tide is turning. Mr. Cody, better known as "Buffalo Bill," in writing the preface to his book entitled, The Great Salt Lake Trail, called attention to the fact that the libraries were full of books written about the "Mormon" people, "generally," he said, "against the people, and usually with an inexcusable ability at exaggeration." There is this to be noted, that wherever there has been one to raise up his voice against the prophet or his people, there has been one equally strong in his defense. The prophet gave the instance of Mr. Reid, the lawyer, who defended him in one of the fifty-five trumped-up cases that were brought against Joseph. Mr. Reid said that the thought came to him that he must go and defend the Lord's anointed. Said he, "I did not know what it meant, but thought I must go and clear the Lord's anointed."

There is this peculiarity, that even those who have attempted to be spiteful toward the prophet and his followers have often unwittingly contributed to their good. That was true in one of the early books written against the prophet by Pomeroy Tucker of Palmyra, in his book entitled, The Origin of Mormonism. He gives us the picture of Martin Harris, one of the most prosperous farmers in the neighborhood, being willing to sacrifice his fertile, eighty-acre farm on the north side of Palmyra, and his wife and family, for the testimony of the gospel. He also tells us of writing to Sidney Rigdon for help and encouragement in the production of this anti-"Mormon" book, at a time when it would have appealed most strongly to Sidney Rigdon, for at that time he had returned to Pennsylvania a disappointed man in his vain ambition to lead this Church. But he got no aid or comfort from Sidney Rigdon.

In a later book, by Gregg, bearing the euphonious title, The Prophet of Palmyra, an affidavit is presented from the ex-Governor of Utah, Mr. Harding, in which he gives his testimony of Joseph and Oliver, walking through the woods every morning a considerable distance with a small "take," as the printer calls it, of manuscript of the Book of Mormon for the publication of that volume by Mr. Grandin of Palmyra; and so sacredly did they esteem that manuscript that they would not permit it to be in the care of the printer or in his office over night, but walked a long distance through the woods to have returned to them the portion of the manuscript of the Book of Mormon which they had delivered in the morning.

It is interesting to note the views of those who attempted to be friendly and who express opinions as to the perpetuity of "Mormonism." Here is Mr. Gregg, seriously declaring at the conclusion of his book in which he purported to write in all fairness, his conclusion that before the end of the twentieth century the story of the Golden Bible would be but a memory—quite a different conclusion from that penned by the writer of a book entitled, A Tramp With a Poet Through the Rockies, to the effect that "Mormonism" "has a great future in America—it is not a dying cult."

Quite recently we have had some very warm commendation by different writers. Many of you have read in the Saturday Evening Post that friendly article in which it was said:

"It is a common practice to speak with admiration of the business organization of large corporations, and there is little doubt that the executives whose powerful intellects are responsible for the economic and efficient operation of the countless departments and divisions of a great steel company or great oil company are entitled to a large amount of respect and esteem. There is little doubt that there is no other organization in the world that obtains from its employees the loyalty and labor and the results that the 'Mormon' Church so bountifully receives from its five hundred thousand unpaid members. This statement may possibly be laughed off, but only after a spell of laughing so protracted and so forced as seriously to damage the most powerful laughing apparatus in existence."

So, if there is any one who wishes to laugh off that thoughtful statement in the way suggested, they are welcome to do so.

In the September number of the Pacific News, Mr. C. I. B. Moore, the Vice-President of the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, who traveled through Southern Utah, wrote this concerning our people:

"I want to say right here that my visit to Utah gave me a very favorable impression of the 'Mormon' people. We saw many evidences of their thrift and intelligence and found those we conversed with most agreeable and hospitable people, and in many instances educated and well informed. As good citizens, I doubt whether Uncle Sam possesses any more favorable type."

A Utah man who travels the United States over in a civic position told me yesterday of some kindly words given to him recently at Atlantic City by the multi-millionaire, C. Z. Mitchell, of New York, sometimes called the dean of electricians, or the dean of the electrical field. He met this man from Utah at the close of a meeting of the electrical convention and expressed very friendly regard for any one from Utah, and then explained to representatives from other states who stood near, "I have a fine feeling toward your state;" and to another, "There is much that can be said in favor of your state;" and to a third, "I could say a good deal in praise of the state you are from, but I want to say that Utah, in my opinion, stands without a peer. I am thinking of her people, and I say that for sobriety, sincerity, industry and honesty of purpose, and the cardinal virtues generally, I feel that the Utah people have no equal." And then he went on to refer to his experience in meeting President Joseph F. Smith and his counselors and said that whatever they said to him they said in great sincerity, and that he was much affected by the simplicity and the democratic attitude of the great president in assisting him on with his overcoat at the close of the interview.

Recently I was told of this incident that occurred in the Michigan University about thirty years ago when there were a number of Utah boys there. Some of the evangelical preachers of Ann Arbor sought to have these boys expelled from school on the ground that they were simply missionaries of the Church and not there for the purposes of scholarship. The dean called one of the Utah students before him and asked him if the accusations were true, and he was assured that they were not true, but that the Utah boys were there as legitimate students for purposes of study only. And then my friend said to me: "I was surprised to hear Dean Hutchinson, dean of the Law Department of Michigan University, say that both morally and intellectually the students from Utah stood higher than the students from any other state in the Union, and that he would strongly oppose any effort to expel them from the institution."

Mr. Frankau, a writer for the Sunday Pictorial, London, gave us some interesting words as the result of his visit here. I think our young sisters may be interested in the compliment he pays them. He is answering, of course, the old theory that existed in his country that the missionaries were in England for the purpose of winning young women to bring them to Utah for questionable purposes. The writer disposes of the question in this language:

"And if anybody after reading this article, still imagines that 'Mormon' missionaries come to Great Britain for the purpose of decoying British spinsters of certain or uncertain ages into secret harems, I can only advise him to take a little walk down State street or South Temple avenue of Salt Lake City, when the high moon is riding molten above the elms and poplars which Brigham Young planted, and observe the many Utah maidens whose bright eyes regard the stranger sidewise from under silken lashes as he passes by; for they are very, very alluring, these Utah maidens, so alluring indeed that 'Mormon' polygamy, if it ever comes to be restarted will most certainly begin, like 'Mormon' charity, at home."

In the future there will be scarcely any excuse for people to be so uninformed as to slander this people, because they can go to such a book as that recently issued by Macmillan & Company, entitled, The Fruits of Mormonism, and can see from United States census figures how this people stand on all the vital questions—of the high birth-rate and the low death-rate, the high marriage-rate and the low divorce-rate, the low insanity percentage, the high charitable-rate, the high educational standing, and from all those things that are known as vital statistics, determine from impartial government statistics the true standing of this people.

Time will not permit to continue along this line, but it is for us to be prepared to receive praise as well as censure, and we may appropriate praise without immodesty, knowing that it is said concerning the people collectively and not individually—a very telling distinction, which the Lord made through the Prophet Joseph Smith in speaking of this Church, as recorded in the first section of the Doctrine and Covenants. May we always merit the good spoken of us. Amen.

The choir sang, "And the glory of the Lord," by Handel.

The benediction was pronounced by Elder Quayle Cannon, of the Bountiful First ward.

SECOND OVERFLOW MEETING

The second overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 2 o'clock p. m., Sunday, October 3, 1926.

Elder Levi Edgar Young, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

The singing was furnished by the LeGrande ward choir of Salt Lake City; Elder Charles C. Martin, conducting; Elder Frank W. Asper, organist.

The choir and congregation sang, "Redeemer of Israel," after which the choir sang the anthem, "Song of the Redeemed."

Prayer was offered by Elder David R. Lyon, of the Ensign ward, Salt Lake City.

The choir sang the anthem, "By Babylon's Wave."

ELDER WILLIAM JONES

President of the Moapa Stake

If I can but control my fluttering heart, I shall be pleased, my brethren and sisters, to respond for a few moments to this call made on me by the President of the Church. In doing so, I desire that the blessings of the Lord shall be with me to direct what I shall say, for I realize that of myself I am not capable of saying anything that will be profitable to you who have assembled this afternoon to be instructed upon the word of the Lord. Therefore I pray that the blessings of the Lord shall be with each of us, that our time here will not have been spent in vain.

I was thrilled, beyond my words to express, with the meeting of this morning, by the spirit that was manifest, by the things that were uttered by the President of the Church, and by President Ivins, and also with the things we listened to this morning in the officers' meeting of the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association, and I am grateful that I have had this opportunity of assembling and listening to these valuable thoughts. I hope I shall get fresh inspiration from them, and from the meetings to follow in this conference, so that, as I return to the stake over which I preside, I may be able to carry back to the people the spirit of this great gathering and the valuable things imparted, and to be imparted, by the servants of the Lord called upon to speak to the Latter-day Saints.

I thank the Lord, above all else, that I have a testimony concerning this great latter-day work. I hope and trust that this testimony the Lord has given to me will be an abiding one, that during the rest of my life I shall be able to retain it in my soul and make it a part of my very being. As I enjoy this blessing, my brethren and sisters, I desire that this same blessing may be upon you and upon every Latter-day Saint who has gone down into the waters of baptism, and had hands laid upon his head for the reception of the Holy Ghost, and who has been given a testimony concerning this great latter-day work. I hope and pray that each one who has entered into covenants with his Maker may have the Holy Ghost to abide with them.

I was impressed very much this morning in listening to what was said, and the words of the Savior came to me and have been upon my mind since then. If you will bear with me for a moment, I would like to read some of his words, as recorded in the 14th chapter of St. John, beginning at the 14th verse:

"If ye shall ask any thing in my name, I will do it.

"If ye love me, keep my commandments.

"And I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter, that he may abide with you forever;

"Even the Spirit of truth; whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth him not, neither knoweth him: but ye know him; for he dwelleth with you, and shall be in you.

"I will not leave you comfortless: I will come to you.

“Yet a little while, and the world seeth me no more; but ye see me: because I live, ye shall live also. * * *

“He that hath my commandments, and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me: and he that loveth me shall be loved of my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him.”

The very fact that we have gathered ourselves together in this conference is an indication to me that we love the Lord and that we are exemplifying in our lives the words of the Redeemer of the world wherein he says, “If ye love me, keep my commandments.” The people in this conference have gathered from all parts of the Church, some of them coming hundreds of miles, paying their own expenses on the railroads and in the hotels, and all because of their love for the Redeemer of the world and the work that he has established in the dispensation in which we live. We are sending missionaries into the nations, and to every part of the known world, with the message of the restored gospel, and they go out, as you are aware, bearing their own expenses, meeting the scoffs and the scorns of the people of the world and many of them enduring the hardships because of the love they have for the gospel which has been made a part of their lives. Where else can you find such love manifest in all the world as is shown by the Latter-day Saints, willing upon every occasion (it matters not what the sacrifice might be) to go where they are sent, to bear this message of glad tidings of great joy to people who do not know as we know, that the Redeemer of the world liveth?

I rejoice in the fact that we have identified ourselves with an organization that has for its object the love of humanity. Members of this great organization realize the responsibility of carrying this great message to the nations, regardless of cost, regardless of their time and means, and even the sacrifice of their own lives, if it becomes necessary. It is because of this love that our parents and our grandparents accepted the gospel in their native lands, and emigrated from the various parts of the world to this intermountain country, the place that the Lord spoke of through his servants as the dwelling place of latter-day Israel.

I thank God that I was born of parents who had the love of God in their hearts, that when the gospel came to them they accepted it in the circumstances that it found them. They were willing to make sacrifice, willing to leave all that they had and journey westward to this land surrounded by these lofty peaks that we see on every hand. Many are the trials and hardships that our grandparents endured. My grandparents on my mother's side accepted the gospel in Sweden. They suffered much persecution prior to and during their journey here. They had but very little means to migrate to this western land. They had to stop upon various occasions and earn money, that they might continue their journey, and upon one occasion, when they were earning money in order that they might proceed upon their journey, it was necessary that they leave some of their children with friends. The friends with whom they left the children became attached to them, and when they had earned sufficient money to take them on a little farther, they went to gather their children. Some of the people were unwilling to give them up, and it was necessary for them to go into court in order to get them. They did so, and the court gave them their children, but after the court had decided in their favor and they went on their way, the people that were after some of their children waylaid them upon the road and took from them one boy, and from that day until the day of their death, they never had the privilege of again beholding the face of that son. That is just one instance, my dear friends, of the many trials and hardships that they had to endure because of the love in their souls of the gospel. It enabled them to journey thousands of miles to this western country and establish their children here. Upon their foundation we can build, in the enjoyment of the blessings of the Lord. I rejoice with you that we are surrounded with the comforts that the Lord has blessed us with, that we have plenty to subsist upon, to make ourselves comfortable and happy, and that, above all else, we still retain in our hearts that same love manifest by our fathers and mothers who accepted the gospel in the land of their birth. This knowledge and this love came to them through earnest prayer and through seeking after the word of the Lord. They were honest in heart, they desired to serve God and keep his commandments, and when the servants of the Lord found them, they recognized the voice of the true shepherd and embraced the truth, but it was because of earnest prayer and desire upon their part to know the will of the Lord, and to keep his commandments. The Lord has told us in the scripture that I have read to you that he will manifest himself to us. I bear witness to you that the Lord does manifest himself to the Latter-day Saints. He may not do it by personal contact in each individual case, but, through the promptings of the Holy Ghost; he manifests himself to the Latter-day Saints from time to time as needed, that they may be kept in the path of truth and righteousness. I know beyond any doubt that if we study the Spirit of truth, the Holy Ghost, and put ourselves in condition to detect its promptings, that it will continue to manifest itself to us. But I want to say to you that it requires study. We must conduct ourselves in a way and manner that when the Lord speaks to us we may recognize his voice and carry out the instructions given to us as individuals. The Prophet Moroni, you know, gives the keynote, as recorded in the Book of Mormon, Moroni 10. The Lord says, speaking through Moroni:

“Behold, I would exhort you that when ye shall read these things, if it be wisdom in God that ye should read them, that ye would remember how merciful the Lord hath been unto the children of men, from the creation of Adam even down until the time that ye shall receive these things, and ponder it in your hearts.

“And when ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the Eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true: and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost.

I bear record to you that our fathers and mothers, when the gospel came to them, asked, as Moroni here gives us to understand, in His name, and when they asked, they received knowledge concerning the doctrines, as to whether they were of men or of God. The injunction given by the Savior, the Redeemer of the world, is that you ask in his name and you shall know whether the doctrine is of man or whether they come from our heavenly Father.

I pray that the Lord will bless us as individuals, as members of this great organization and as elders of Israel, that each one shall perform his part well, that we shall realize the responsibilities we owe one to another, and especially the responsibility that we owe to our heavenly Father in bearing our part, in helping to preach the gospel and do the work at home and abroad, for the salvation of the living as well as the dead. I bear record that there is no joy, no pleasure, no happiness to be enjoyed in all the world, outside of the service of the Redeemer of the world. It matters not how much money men may have to spend in getting happiness in this world, there is no real joy outside of his service. I bear you this as my testimony, my brethren and sisters, in all humility, and in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JUNIUS F. WELLS

Assistant Church Historian

It is an unexpected pleasure accorded me to be sent over from the Tabernacle to speak before this congregation, taking the place of someone else who was expected to come. I shall not detain you for more than a few minutes; but, while I am before you, I desire to bear my testimony: the testimony that we are endeavoring to establish in the hearts of the young people of Zion. The slogan of the Mutual Improvement Associations for the current year, runs somewhat like this, "We stand for a testimony of the divine mission of Joseph Smith." We cannot be effective missionaries, promulgating the doctrines of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, unless we have a testimony of the divine calling of Joseph Smith, the prophet. We cannot have a testimony of his divine calling unless we have also a testimony of the divinity of Jesus Christ, the Savior of the world, the Redeemer of mankind.

The arguments which establish faith in the divinity of our Lord and Savior apply particularly to the establishment of faith in the divine calling of Joseph Smith; for Joseph Smith was raised up of God, and he received his commission through the personal ministry of the Father and the Son to bear witness that they live and are interested in the affairs of men. He had nothing to give the world except what they commanded him. His visions, visitations of angels and revelations were all directed by, and in the name of, the Lord to give to mankind anew the doctrines which Christ taught in the meridian of time with the ordinances and principles, organizations and governments necessary in the dispensation of the fulness of times to the establishment of the kingdom of God on earth; never to be taken from the earth, never to be given to another people; but to remain here triumphant over every obstacle and foe, over all other governments and institutions of men. Associated thus as the testimony of the divinity of Christ is with the testimony of the divine mission of Joseph Smith, how invaluable, my brethren and sisters, it is to us. What distinction a testimony of the truth of Joseph's mission gives us, and what joy, in going about in the midst of our fellow creatures upon the face of the earth, even among those professing Christianity, to say nothing of those of the heathen world!

We are called upon, because of the testimony that we do receive concerning Joseph Smith's mission, to be instructors, to be leaders. We cannot be otherwise. I will illustrate it. Take our young men called to go as missionaries to the various nations of the earth. Usually the injunction put upon them, in the blessings they receive when they are set apart, is to get the spirit of their mission—the spirit of their mission! I remember President Brigham Young said to me when he laid his hands upon my head, "Get the spirit of your mission." My father's only instruction was, "Get the spirit of your mission; do not know too much, but believe all you can." I did not know at the time what that sentence meant, but I was not long in my field of labor before I discovered it. There came upon me the spirit of my mission. Now, what was that? It was the exercise of the gift of the Holy Ghost conferred upon me when I was a child. It was the exercise of the authority to minister in the name of Jesus Christ, given me when I was ordained an elder. I found within three weeks after engaging in my mission that I was veritably, in effectiveness I will say mildly, an authorized representative of the Savior of this world; having the right to speak in his name, having the right to call upon my fellow creatures to repent; promising them that if they would do so they would receive forgiveness of their sins; showing them the way and proving it.

Does not all that constitute leadership among men? What would not the ministers of the world give for so potent a power, so actual an authority? It cannot come and it has not come and does not, in this world, in this time, in this generation, in this age of the world, except through the ministry of Joseph Smith, whom God called, and to whom the Father appeared, to whom the Son spoke and delivered that message of life and salvation to all the children of God that dwell upon the face of the whole earth. Joseph Smith knew that he had that vision; he could not deny it. A minister tried to get him to; his supposed friends, his associates, his relatives, and others tried to dissuade him from the assertion that he had seen such a vision, had received such an authority, had obtained such power; but he knew whereof he spoke, and in the integrity of his heart he maintained his testimony and he maintained it throughout his life to the day of his death. He sealed that testimony with the blood of a martyr for the truth, not less, but for God and the truth, for the fact that God is and had spoken to him, and had delivered through him a message to all of his children.

My brethren and sisters, I would not speak thus if I were not able to bear witness that I have received such a testimony. I know that Joseph Smith was a prophet, not alone because of the spirit, I will say, of my mission, which confirmed that testimony and that knowledge, and indeed awakened my soul to its reality and to know the life of Joseph Smith—I have studied it.

I remember one day in England, President George A. Smith, first counselor to President Brigham Young, was upon his return journey home after having visited Europe and Asia, the Holy Land, and he sent for me to come and stay with him at the little hotel in London, and to be his companion and guide for about ten days, during which time we visited a great many places of note, of historical interest and value. I knew them pretty well, for I had been there for more than a year. We also visited a great many notable people. We were taken by noblemen of England to their homes. We were entertained at their tables. We were taken into the House of Lords and House of Commons and the Law Courts. We were shown by several men of renown courtesies and attentions that were in exchange for courtesies and attention they had received, perhaps, as travelers going across the continent and stopping for a few days in Salt Lake City.

It was most delightful for me, an education to accompany President George A. Smith, who was a historian and who knew history. We would go into St. Paul's Cathedral, for instance, and stand before statues of generals, men of letters, and men of renown of one kind and another, and he would tell me little personal incidents in their lives. My accompanying him was one of the most valuable educational incidents in my life. But I have not time to dwell upon that, but upon this: Before he left London to come home he said to me, "Junius, I want to see if it is possible to find the home of my ancestors; the place that they went from in going to America. They went to America about the year 1635. They settled in Topsfield, Essex county, Massachusetts, and that is the only clue I have as to where they might have gone from in England. Can you find Topsfield, Essex county, England?" "Well," said I, "I have been all over Essex county, because my field of labor was there, but I do not recall Topsfield." So I got a geography and searched but there is no Topsfield in all England spelled as it is in Massachusetts. There is a place in Essex county named Toppesfield, and I presume it would be pronounced Topsfield. He said, "That is near enough." So we set out, took a train to a station, not knowing we could have gone nearer; that was seventeen miles away from that little country village upon the Colne river, in Essex. Then we hired a trap and rode across country for seventeen miles, a beautiful drive. We came to the little village of Toppesfield, and it was nightfall, and we went into the inn there to stay over night, the "Green Man Inn." Before we retired we ordered supper. Brother George A. could not wait for supper nor wait for morning, but thought we should try and see if we could not confirm the suspicion that we were on the sacred ground that was trodden by his ancestors. And so we went into the churchyard, and I got down on my knees before headstones and traced out the inscriptions with my finger. Presently I came upon some Smiths, upon some Thomas Smiths, Samuel Smiths, the same names that were among the Smiths, and one generation ahead of those that were found in Topsfield, Essex county, Massachusetts. Brother George A. Smith said, "We have struck the right lead. Let us go and get some supper." And so we went back to the little inn and had a very delicious supper of country things—some fresh eggs, and home-cured ham, and some lettuce, and pepper grass, I remember, and some other things. The reason I mentioned those is because of something witty that Brother George A. said. In the course of the supper, after eating quite heartily, he said, "Junius, pass the forage"—referring to the green stuff.

After supper, we went up into an upper bed room. It was under a thatched roof with a dormer window. There was a little old fashioned bedstead, and there we knelt down by the side of the bed and Brother George A. Smith poured out his heart in prayer and in thanksgiving to the Almighty. George A. Smith knew that the gospel was restored to the earth. George A. Smith knew that God had appeared to Joseph, his kinsman, and had revealed the everlasting gospel. He knew that Joseph Smith had been true to his testimony. He poured out his heart and soul in prayer, and in that prayer he thanked God for the opportunity he had had of going abroad, of traveling over Europe and meeting the peoples of the different nations, of going to the Holy Land, and of traversing spots that were made sacred to us because the Savior of the world had trodden those same paths and places. He had seen all that. Then he came to this humble little village in Essex and said, "And above all, O Lord, I thank thee that I am permitted to tread the lanes that were trodden by my ancestors, that I am permitted to receive here information that will open the doors for those of my kindred that have gone before, and may do a work for them that will effect their salvation eternally, according to the gospel revealed through thy servant, Joseph." I could almost repeat his prayer; I never before listened to such a prayer. I never before felt that I was so near, so close to the Almighty. I will say, yes, I never before felt the nearness of the Savior of the world as I felt it while we knelt in that room and Brother George A. Smith poured out his soul in thanksgiving and praise to God.

Well now, from that time I have studied and followed the history of the Smiths. I have written a good deal upon it. I have had the privilege of doing some things to help to commemorate and hold up in honor his name before mankind—the name of Joseph Smith, unto whom the angel of God, Moroni, standing before him said, "I am a messenger sent from the presence of God to you," as he called him by name,

“and there is a work for you to do, and your name shall be spoken for good and for evil among all people, and nations and kindreds and tongues. It shall be had for good and for evil among all nations.”

Now, my brethren and sisters, I will clinch my personal testimony. I have a right to. I know through traveling very extensively in the world, pretty well all over Europe, having crossed the Atlantic Ocean ten times, and pretty well all over America, for I have been in every state but two, and among this people called “Mormons.” You know, young men and young women—who were young when I was—you know whether I have borne my testimony. It is this: I have discovered that the world has spoken the name of Joseph Smith for evil; they have traduced his name; they have wickedly attempted to break down and destroy the influence of his mission; they have lied about his kindred, about his ancestors, about his family, about their lives. I went all through that in Vermont and in New York. I have said time and again to people there, “Why, Joseph Smith and his family were just like you and your families,” and proved it to them. “Go to the records, in building your churches, your schools, and in holding every office that anybody else held. They had the respect of their neighbors. They were industrious, they were upright, they were an honorable family, and here their descendants are, holding up their names in honor. And we, Latter-day Saints, a million of us, have held up Joseph Smith’s name in honor, that his name might be spoken for good.”

This is my testimony to you, as I have said to many people, while standing on the hearthstone of the cottage where he was born, where his mother washed and dressed him as a babe. Over the mantle-piece there is hung his portrait by the side of his mother’s, at the other side his brother Hyrum’s, and under Joseph Smith’s painted portrait, framed in a little gold frame, are the printed words which I have just quoted to you, from the lips of Moroni, saying that his name should be spoken for good and evil. I have said to hundreds, and those who have succeeded me in the management of that memorial in Vermont have said to thousands since, “Read that now; you of the world, unbelievers in ‘Mormonism,’ have been speaking the name of Joseph Smith for evil; we Latter-day Saints have built this monument and this memorial to show our love, our admiration and our testimony and bearing our witness for good, that his name might be spoken for good. So, between you and us we have fulfilled the words of the angel of God, and proved Joseph Smith, who quoted them and gave them to the world, a prophet of God.”

May the Lord bless us all with a testimony that shall abide in our souls, a light to our paths, a guide to our footsteps. There is nothing so precious as this; there is no truth so certain as this; there is no institution, there is no purpose of Almighty God, against whom none can prevail, so certain as the triumph of this work known as the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. Amen.

ELDER A. E. PARKS

President of the Gunnison Stake

My brethren and sisters: I do not suppose that I shall again have the same peculiar feeling that I had when my name was announced in the conference this morning, as a speaker for this afternoon's session. It was a feeling of great fear, and yet into my heart came a desire to perform the mission that the president of the Church had called me to perform. I came into this building with the same fear—a fear of you and a fear of myself, but as I heard you sing that wonderful song, “Redeemer of Israel, our only delight,” the fear of you left me, because I knew that I should have the privilege of talking to men and women who had in their hearts a testimony of the gospel, and that when the spirit of that testimony was upon them, who had time and again borne testimony to the fact that they knew God lives, that Jesus is the Christ, the son of the living God, that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the true and living God, and that notwithstanding their many weaknesses, God had blessed them. I knew that I would have the privilege of talking to men and women who, in their hours of trial, had called into their homes the bishop of their ward, the president of their stake, who had been with them, who had laid hands upon the heads of their loved ones and to their loved ones had come health and strength, and into their hearts had come the peace of the gospel, and my fear of you had left me entirely, though for myself it still remains, that I might not have the ability, the power to make the contact with the Spirit of our Father in heaven that might leave a message with you today. May I not ask that the few moments I stand before you that you offer a silent prayer in my behalf, that God may give me the power to say something that you may carry home, that will make you a little better, make you a little happier, that will give us a little more power that we may perform the mission to which God has called us, and also that he will give to you an understanding heart, that what I say may find lodgment therein?

I know, brethren and sisters, beyond the shadow of doubt, that there is in this gospel of Jesus Christ a power beyond the power of men, that will take men and women of mediocre ability and raise them up and magnify them so that they may perform a wonderful service to which they have been called by God, so that they may perform the service of representing our Father in heaven upon this earth, so that they may come to the people and convey to them, under the authority of God, the power of the Priesthood, that they may be changed in their minds, so that the Spirit of God may actuate them, may impel them forward to do the thing that God would have them do.

I think there is one principle of the gospel that is more important, probably, than all else, and it is that of which I wanted to speak this afternoon. It is this principle announced by our Savior, through Joseph Smith, that we should be one, and if we are not one, we are not his.

The question has often come to me, "How may we be one?" It has come to you, too, I know. Some of our brethren and sisters think that it is to carry out their own particular ideas, their own views, and a few have gotten together and tried to carry them out. I do not believe that it is true. I believe that when the Lord said we should be one, he meant that we should be one with those who preside over us, be one with the prophet of God. Is not that true? The Lord has said some marvelous and wonderful things for the blessing of those who would be in harmony with those whom he calls to leadership. In the matter of priesthood, he says, in the 84th section of the Doctrine and Covenants:

"For whoso is faithful unto the obtaining these two priesthoods of which I have spoken, and the magnifying their calling, are sanctified by the Spirit unto the renewing of their bodies.

"They become the sons of Moses and of Aaron and the seed of Abraham, and the church and kingdom, and the elect of God.

"And also all they who receive this priesthood receive me, saith the Lord;

"For he that receiveth me receiveth my Father;

"And he that receiveth my Father receiveth my Father's kingdom; therefore all that my Father hath shall be given unto him."

How could that be possible, that all the Father hath should be given unto them? And to make it sure.

"This is according to the oath and covenants, which belongeth to the priesthood, * * * which he cannot break, neither can it be moved. * *"

And I have often wondered how it could be, how I could be one with God, how we could be one with God. And a testimony of it came to me. We shall never have the authority of God; he will always preside. We brethren who have received the Priesthood have received authority to act in the name of God, and to the extent of that authority we may act, and any act we perform in righteousness under that authority is a binding act and God will recognize it. But there needs to come something else into our lives, and that is, if we would be one with God, if we would have the power of God, we must exercise that Priesthood, must magnify it by our lives, by our clean living, and by our service.

It is a wonderful testimony borne to you by Brother Junius F. Wells, who received the spirit of his calling and was the means in the hands of God of establishing our wonderful Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association.

Now, my brethren and sisters, the Lord has said that the time would come that those who would not receive the servants of the Lord, nor hear the words of the prophets and apostles, and the servants of the Lord, should be cut off from among the people. The prophet Mormon bore that testimony but he said some other marvelous things. There is one marvelous promise, with which I am going to close, after warning you, if I may, against those who would come into your lives and sow the seeds of discord and put a bar between you and the men whom God has called to lead this Church; between you and the bishop of your ward, or the ward teachers, or the president of the stake, or the president of the Church. I would warn you that those men and women who would do this are not actuated with the spirit of God but by the spirit of evil. I will read to you what the Lord says in regard to that in the 121st section of the Doctrine and Covenants:

"Cursed are all those that shall lift up the heel against mine anointed, saith the Lord, and cry they have sinned when they have not sinned before me, saith the Lord, but have done that which was meet in mine eyes, and which I commanded them.

"But those who cry transgression do it because they are the servants of sin, and are the children of disobedience themselves.

"And those who swear falsely against my servants, that they might bring them into bondage and death—

"Wo unto them; because they have offended my little ones they shall be severed from the ordinances of mine house.

"Their basket shall not be full, their houses and their barns shall perish, and they themselves shall be despised by those that flattered them."

Let me read again:

"But those who cry transgression do it because they are the servants of sin, and are the children of disobedience themselves."

Do not permit it. As you love your lives, your salvation, the salvation of your boys and girls, brethren and sisters, never let a word be said in your house or hearing against the constituted servants of the Lord, because I tell you, when they go out of the way, the Lord himself will remove them, that his people will not be deceived. But there is one thing, brethren and sisters, that you can do, and it will make a tie between yourselves and our Father in heaven, between your children and our Father in heaven that can never be broken—they may drift one way or another, but ultimately they will come back and receive the blessings of the gospel—and that is the thing that the Lord has revealed in the 21st section of the Doctrine and Covenants, in which he said:

"Wherefore, meaning the Church, thou shalt give heed unto all his [speaking of the president of the Church] words and commandments which he shall give unto you as he receiveth them, walking in all holiness before me;

"For his word ye shall receive, as if from mine own mouth, in all patience and faith."

Here is the most wonderful promise, one which would make this gospel an absolutely vital force in your lives:

"For by doing these things the gates of hell shall not prevail against you; yea, and the Lord God will disperse the powers of darkness from before you, and cause the heavens to shake for your good, and his name's glory."

I want to leave with you my testimony, my brethren and sisters, that I do know beyond the shadow of a doubt that God does operate through these men whom he has called to lead in Israel. You may go to your bishop with any problem, and if you will act on his advice given you as you go prayerfully to receive it, you may know it is the word of God to you. You may go to the president of the stake and president of the Church in their proper order, and receive that same blessing. I do know that President Heber J. Grant is the prophet of God, and is actuated by the power of God, and the counsel he gives us in these conferences is the word of God, the living scripture to us, and if we obey it, we and our families may return to the presence of God and receive those blessings that are ours. May this be the lot of all of us, I ask, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A male quartette, consisting of Leland I. Acomb, C. C. Martin, Leon G. Smith, W. S. Holdaway, sang, "The last chord."

ELDER JOHN WELLS

Of the Presiding Bishopric

I desire to endorse all that has been said concerning the divinity of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, who came in the meridian of time and at the close of his earthly mission died that we might live; also all that has been said concerning the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith whose spirit was reserved to come upon the earth in the latter days to establish the gospel of Jesus Christ again, with all its powers and keys and blessings. It is the privilege of every Latter-day Saint to know that Jesus is the Christ, the Redeemer of the world, and that the Prophet Joseph Smith was divinely appointed and ordained for the great work which he performed in his brief ministry in these latter days. No Latter-day Saint should be satisfied until these testimonies burn within him.

It is the mission of this Church to declare to the world these two great truths. The Christian world today is greatly concerned with the problem of the divinity of Jesus Christ as the Son of God, and this problem arises from the lack of testimony concerning these two great personages. Confusion and dissension will be with the churches of the earth until they conform to the laws and ordinances of the gospel. The members of these churches will have to exercise faith in the Redeemer as the Son of God and sincerely repent of their sins; then go down into the waters of baptism for the remission of these sins, and receive the Holy Ghost by the laying on of hands by those who have authority to do so. Then by prayer, faithfulness, obedience, humility and meekness they may obtain a testimony of Jesus Christ and Joseph Smith, knowing that Jesus is the Redeemer of the world and that through the Prophet Joseph the gospel was restored to the earth.

The work of the Lord is moving rapidly. More missionaries are in the field than ever before. Mature men are sparing time to go into the mission field again for a period of about six months, and they have carried the message of the gospel to old acquaintances as well as new. It is hoped that from year to year the number of missionaries who are carrying the gospel message to the inhabitants of the earth will increase.

Another temple is almost finished, being located in Mesa, Arizona. Five temples are now in daily operation, and this new one will, no doubt, be ready early in the coming year. It has been built from the donations and gifts of the Latter-day Saints and from the tithes. It is a wonderful building, everything being of the latest in temple architecture. Thousands of men and women are waiting to enter that House of the Lord to do ordinance work for the living and the dead.

Elder Junius F. Wells mentioned the old landmarks of the Church, the Memorial Farm in Vermont, the Hill Cumorah in New York, and other places. The Church has recently acquired the farm of Father Peter Whitmer in Fayette, Seneca county, New York, consisting of about one hundred and twenty acres of land. It was on this farm that the Church was organized on the sixth day of April, 1830. Some may say, Why purchase this property? I am satisfied that the day will come when these historic places will be visited by tourists and Latter-day Saints in great numbers, who will stand in reverence in such hallowed spots. On this farm, and probably in the very house on it, the first Sacrament was administered by the Prophet, after those present had gone through the formality of organizing the Church in accordance with the laws of the State of New York.

The late President Seymour B. Young spent years of his life in trying to gather sufficient funds to erect on the Temple Block here in Salt Lake City a memorial to those who came across the plains with hand-carts, people who came mainly from England, Scotland and Scandinavia. With these companies were a few wagons, carrying some of the people's heavy belongings, and also carrying food. The remainder of their effects was placed in hand-carts, which were pulled for a thousand miles or more across the plains, where the only road was the trail made by the wagons that had gone before. A beautiful monument in memory of these brave people is now cast in enduring bronze and is placed in the front entrance to the Bureau of Information. Do not go home until you have looked at it, thought about it, and seen how the artist has depicted the sufferings of the Latter-day Saints, showing the pathos of it, showing the indomitable spirit that brought these people across the plains.

One of the great Christian churches has held a celebration in the United States, during which special stress was given to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. Because of statements found in the Bible, this Church declares in its doctrines that when the wafer or bread and the wine are blessed they are actually transformed into the body and blood of our Lord Jesus Christ. Such instances as this show how important it is that the Latter-day Saints should have prophets and apostles who may receive the word of the Lord in this day and properly interpret the instructions given in former days.

The Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is one of the most solemn services that the Latter-day Saints hold. In these latter days, the first Sacrament was administered in the home of Father Whitmer, as stated before, according to instructions contained in section 20 of the book of Doctrine and Covenants. This Sacrament was instituted by Jesus Christ on the eve of his crucifixion.

Shortly before his death he had raised Lazarus from the dead. It had become known in all the region round about that he had done this, and thousands of people who were gathering for the Passover heard of it. His enemies, the Pharisees, chief priests and scribes, were afraid of his popularity. He visited the temple and the voice of the Father was heard acknowledging him to be his Son. The following day he visited the temple again and drove out the money changers, and that was the last time he entered that sacred building. He resided with his friends in Bethany, where a feast was held at the home of Lazarus. The day following, Wednesday, he gave his disciples private and final instructions in some secluded place on the Mount of Olives. On Thursday he asked his disciples to prepare for the feast, and no doubt that remarkable ceremony was carried out in the style customary to the Galileans, for all the disciples of Jesus were Galileans, with the exception of Judas Iscariot. The supper being over, he took off his outer garments, girded himself with a towel, and washed the feet of his disciples. Peter objected, but when his Master told him that if he did not do this he would have no part or lot with him, the impulsive man said, "Lord, not my feet only, but also my hands and my head." After that, he gave his disciples some advice and encouragement and uttered that wonderful prayer contained in the 17th chapter of John. And then he brake bread and blessed it and gave it to his disciples, saying, Take, eat, this is my body; as oft as ye meet do this in remembrance of me. Then, after this had been partaken of by those present in the room, he blessed the wine and said, Drink, for this is my blood which is shed. No doubt the disciples partook of this solemnly and remembered his injunction that as oft as they should meet they should do this in remembrance of his sufferings and death.

He left no ritual, he did not say how the religious ordinances of the new Christian Church, composed of his followers and believers, should be carried out. It is presumed that he expected they would carry out the old Jewish services, but in addition to this He said, in effect: As oft as ye meet, partake of the emblems of my body and blood in the shape of bread and wine, and do this in remembrance of me. Evidently he gave to his disciples the true form of prayer which he desired them to repeat when blessing the bread and the wine, and that same prayer has been given to the Latter-day Saints and is contained in section 20 of the book of Doctrine and Covenants.

No Latter-day Saint can keep alive in his heart the testimony of Jesus Christ and live the gospel unless he partakes of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper frequently, with clean hands and a pure heart, remembering the purpose of this Sacrament is to remind us of the death and sufferings of our Lord and Master until he comes again. We Latter-day Saints should go to our meeting-places regularly and in the most solemn manner center our thoughts upon the great sacrifice made by our Lord and Savior; and we should not partake of the bread and the water unthinkingly or carelessly. This partaking of the Sacrament should be done on the Lord's day, for on that day the Lord has said we should go to his house and partake of his Sacrament.

May the Lord bless us that we may sense our responsibilities and privileges as Latter-day Saints, I humbly pray in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Redeemer. Amen.

ELDER LEVI EDGAR YOUNG

Of the First Council of Seventy

My brethren and sisters: The great inspiring idea of this conference to me has been the admonition of Christ: "Rise up and be God's child." God created man in his own image, and the divine within man teaches him the truth and value of character and righteousness based upon a supreme faith in the Father of us all. The Latter-day Saints hold sacredly to the fundamental teachings of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. In all their history they have believed that Christ is the sure guide to the way of life. This was true of the brave souls who crossed the plains in the very early days and made their way to Zion here in the tops of the mountains.

The handcart immigrants mentioned by the previous speaker suffered untold hardships, not for the purpose of obtaining wealth and power, but fundamentally for the glorification of God and bringing to pass his divine purposes. May I just add a thought or two more concerning the handcart pioneers. Like their other brethren and sisters who came to Utah in the days of the old trail by ox-team and on foot, they did a great deed; and the result of their work stands ineffaceable and beyond forgetfulness. They had strong characters and unyielding courage. They came to work out their destiny. Religious freedom was one of their motives, and they possessed a very fine and lofty courage, and are to be reverently admired by all the people of this state. They put above all things the possessions of the mind and the heart. When they achieved their purpose, through much tribulation and suffering, they opened their doors to the honest in heart, and told them to enter. In the law of progress, these pioneers stand forth as exemplars of certain great principles, which never can grow old. They set character first; and revered intellectual and religious achievement.

President Brigham Young saw this wilderness country in radiant vision, and the unconquered soil was a symbol of spiritual regeneration. And what did those pioneers of yesterday, and the Saints of today stand for? It is the gospel of Christ Jesus which speaks to us with so much power that it cannot be mistaken. It is a revelation of the meaning and responsibility of life. It involves great and illuminating ideas and truths that if mankind will work for them, the security of the race in peace and understanding will be assured. If we take a general view of Christ's teachings we will find that they emphasized the truth of the Kingdom of God and its coming; that he taught the Fatherhood of God and the infinite value of the human soul, and that out of his teachings grow the higher righteousness and the commandment of love. Louder and more confident voices proclaim these truths today, because in the infinite goodness and mercy of God his divine Priesthood has been restored, and man has again been made free to find eternal life.

It is religion, the love of God and neighbor, which gives life radiancy; and in this divine feeling we realize better the meaning and aim of life. The knowledge of the meaning of God's Kingdom grows steadily and silently in the heart of the man who grows in faith and allows his soul to be illumined by the spirit of Christ our Lord. This Kingdom of the Master can be understood only from within. While the Kingdom of heaven is to come to us, it will be understood only by our spiritual natures. Every doctrine that he taught was a message of the Kingdom.

God placed a value on the human soul, and taught that it is capable of endless spiritual and intellectual development. The Glory of God is intelligence; so intelligence is the glory of man. This glory is the Spirit of truth, which "leads man into all truth." The soul is man perfected, and a man perfected is one who knows not only truth, but is "a man of the truth."

What a divine duty the gospel of Christ imposes upon you and me; the duty to develop our spirits and intellects to the highest degree and to their infinite possibilities. Then there is the higher righteousness and the commandment of love. When Jesus was asked what the great commandment is, he replied: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind * * * and thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." This is a sphere of ethical thought that is peculiarly expressive of the gospel of Christ. It is in this sense that Jesus combined religion and morality. The higher morality depends upon the conception of Christ's teachings, and the developing of the simple faith in God. No system of ethics has ever bettered this system of the Master, and the pure Christian virtues are the most secure force today to heal the sins and ills of the world. The world cannot be far from religious feeling. Religion is a natural outgrowth in man. When man began to think and feel and wonder, he had longings to find out the infinite. So he naturally came to God, and God blessed him with divine power. "Wherever there is man, there is religion." My friends, we cannot be much until we have touched the infinite religion of spirits. Step by step we must rise to the demand of religion, and set before us the aesthetic ideals of Christ, our Lord, and abide by his thought that the love of God is the abhorrence of evil. Jesus had a great loving world purpose. There cannot be true victory in life until every activity of man—economic, political, social, ethical, and intellectual—be influenced by the divine purpose of Christ, our Lord. That is victory.

I must not speak longer. May God help us to see the greater laws of righteousness; may he strengthen our testimonies from day to day. May we lift up our thoughts to him, and know that life and light come as we approach God. It was a mighty sage who wrote: "God ever works with him who works with God." The religion of Christ has a personal appeal to us all. "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts: and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy on him; and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon." Amen.

The choir sang, "God is our refuge and strength."

The benediction was pronounced by Elder Orson Allen of the Ensign stake.

SECOND DAY

MORNING SESSION

The Tabernacle was comfortably filled, both on the lower floor and in the galleries, when President Heber J. Grant, on Monday morning, 10 o'clock, October 4, 1926, announced that the congregation would sing, as the opening hymn, "Come, come, ye Saints."

Following the spirited singing, Elder George H. Brimhall offered the opening prayer.

A sacred soprano solo was sung by Pearl Kimball Davis, entitled, "Eye hath not seen."

ELDER JOHN A. WIDTSOE

I have enjoyed greatly, my brethren and sisters, the addresses and the music of this conference. My soul has been fed. I always delight to know that I belong to an organization that speaks with authority, and I glory in the fact that those who stand at the head of this great Church exercise the right of their authority. May I add to President Grant's remarks that whenever we sing the hymn, "We thank thee O God for a prophet," we have in mind Joseph Smith, the prophet of the restoration, and also the living prophet whom we sustain and uphold, and who guides us, under God's inspiration, in his day.

THE BEGINNING OF THE WORK

Perhaps the most impressive thought that comes to me as I look over these vast congregations of Latter-day Saints and recall all that they represent in social and economic conquest and in rich spiritual living, is that all this has come out of a very simple beginning. A lad, seeking for truth, cried in the darkness for light. Out of that simple, humble beginning, has come this mighty work. In my reading I turn most frequently to the Prophet Joseph Smith's own story of his first vision, and I return invariably refreshed and strengthened, inspired and thrilled, by that simple story. Joseph Smith, not yet fifteen years of age, in the midst of contending religious opinions, set out to find the truth. To God, the author of truth, he stated his desire and the Father, in his graciousness, in his mercy, gave to the boy that for which he asked.

THE FIRST VISION—A LESSON TO ALL

It seems to me that this Church has been given no greater lesson—one that should be remembered by the Church by all people and by every individual. Men cannot live by untruth or near truth. Spiritual contentment is won only when one has the full truth, or the truth just as fully as it may be available to him. Out of such individual desire and search for truth has come this great body of people, men and women, who know for themselves—they having gone to God in their search—that this is the truth. In this Church and kingdom we stand upon individual testimonies of the truth. We depend not upon the prophet, great though he may be, who guides the Church at this time, or upon any other man, but we, having a witness of the spirit, know for ourselves that this is the truth. Out of such training, desire and high knowledge has come a people the like of which has not been known before upon the face of the earth—a kingdom of priests and priestesses such as the prophets of old dreamed about and wrote about.

TRUTH DEFINED

In one of the great revelations given to the Prophet Joseph Smith, now known as Section 93, there is a splendid discussion of truth. In that section there is a comprehensive definition of truth. "Truth is knowledge of things as they are and as they were and as they are to come."

ALL TRUTH ACCEPTED

It is a happy claim, and may I say a proud claim on the part of Latter-day Saints, that they accept all truth, no matter whence it comes, or what its nature may be, whether it be scientific, philosophical or religious. If it be the truth, we accept it, and know that there is a place for it in the great plan of truth, known as the gospel of Jesus Christ. We Latter-day Saints welcome the great advances of these latter days. The remarkable conquests in pure and applied science: the telegraph, the telephone, the radio, the airplane, all the marvels of this day, we accept gladly and have no quarrel with them. Whenever the chemist discovers, as a few months ago, an element that had not been known before, we Latter-day Saints welcome that new knowledge, for we recognize that another step toward the ultimate conquest of nature, and of the universe, has been taken by man through the inspiration and good will of our Heavenly Father. When the astronomer tells us that a new star has been found in the high heavens, we are glad that more truth has come to us and therefore greater power. We support those who, in the laboratory or in the field, as earnest and honest searchers after truth, are seeking to unravel the mysteries of this great universe. As a Church we support such endeavors and sustain those who labor in the search of truth, no matter what the truth may be.

RELATIVE VALUE OF TRUTH

While Latter-day Saints understand that all truth is from God, and is desirable, and will be ours in time, yet we also know that all truth is not of equal value to humanity. Some knowledge is chiefly of physical help. It makes possible houses and roads and automobiles, and it feeds the body, thus making it easier for us to live on this earth. Another type of knowledge feeds the mind. Literature, art, and many other branches of knowledge contribute chiefly to the up-building of man's intellect. While we accept all these things, grateful for physical conveniences, glad to have the opportunity of mental development, yet Latter-day Saints understand that the truth of the greatest worth to humanity is that which controls and shapes human actions, that which interprets to us our relationship to God, our Maker, and to our fellowman; that which lays before us the great plan of salvation and explains why I am here, whence I came, where I am going and what I must do to conform to the greater laws of life. Such knowledge becomes the greater truth. Men frequently fail to understand the relative value of truth, and, therefore, set things that minister only to the physical world upon high pedestals, and place low the truth that deals with man's eternal journey, and with his eternal relationship to the greatest Being in the universe. It would not be quite wise or consistent for any one of us, no matter what views he may hold, to say that men of the type of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of Moses, Elijah and John the Baptist and of other notables who knew little about the great discoveries of the last hundred years, were not so great in stature before God and before men as we are. They did possess the higher and more valuable knowledge and they were seekers also after the lesser knowledge; and in our day, were they here, they would stand as we do, lovers of all truth, but with a clear understanding that some truths minister to man's greatest and others to his lesser needs.

RELATIVE VALIDITY OF TRUTH

Not only do Latter-day Saints distinguish carefully between the greater and the lesser truths, but they also recognize that not all truth has the same validity. We cannot accept all knowledge as being of equal certainty. Some knowledge I know to be absolutely certain, some appears to be true, and some I hope may be true. The man who looks through a microscope into the infinitely small is limited in his search for knowledge by the power of that instrument. He can go no further. The man who looks through a telescope into the starry heavens must guess at the things that hang just beyond the reach of the instrument; and the man who builds a theory out of observed facts builds only a ladder, a scaffolding, by which he hopes to rise into that greater truth for which he seeks. Therefore, Latter-day Saints are careful to examine the validity of the truths set before them. We make the satisfying claim that the truth of greatest validity, that of greatest certainty, is the truth that has come from the mouth of God by revelation to his children in this and in every age through the history of the world. Is the microscope a great instrument for the gaining of knowledge? Is the telescope a great instrument for the obtaining of knowledge? If they are, then man himself, with his immortal spirit, may be able to touch the unseen forces of life, to learn from the spirit of the Almighty, who is the greatest revealer of knowledge. Through the spirit of man God may speak with greater power and with greater conviction than through any man-made instrument. In this Church we stand firmly, before all the world, upon the doctrine that that which the Lord has revealed to his children directly is of the highest value and of the greatest validity. Upon revealed truth will be built, as the years go on, the whole structure of truth.

READ SECTION 93

I delight to know that I can build in this manner the philosophy of my life; that I can thus accept the gospel of Jesus Christ, the existence of Almighty God, my relationship to him, and his words given to his prophets at various times in the history of mankind; and that beginning with such knowledge I can accept, step by step and fact by fact, all knowledge and all truth as they come through any channel here on earth and in the hereafter. I would suggest to all Latter-day Saints that they study section 93 of the book of Doctrine and Covenants, in which the truth, our eternal quest for it, its meaning, and the fundamental nature of the truths of heaven, are beautifully set forth.

I am grateful for the gospel of Jesus Christ. I thank God for the possession of it. I pray God to be with us and bless us, to be able to search out truth continually, to live it, to accept it, to make it a part of our lives, to grow in it daily, and yet to understand in our search clearly and reasonably the limitations placed upon us so that we may not be carried away by those who do not understand the full truth, and, having made a wrong beginning, may lead us to an incorrect end.

God bless us and be with us continually, I pray, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT RUDGER CLAWSON

It is not expected, brethren and sisters, that any new doctrine or revelation will be brought to the people at this time.

WHERE THE WORD OF THE LORD IS FOUND

The word of the Lord is to be found in reasonably full measure in the standard works of the Church—in the Bible, in the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price. Any man or woman who can master these sacred books, so to speak, will be fully informed as to the purposes of the Lord.

When further scripture, or revelation, is needed for the guidance of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, it will be given by the Lord through the President of the Church who is the prophet of God.

A GREAT MYSTERY EXPLAINED

The gospel of Jesus Christ is the power of God unto salvation, to all who believe, to the Jews first and also to the Greek. The doctrines of the gospel are set forth in the scriptures in simple language, and in great plainness; but, strange to say, the natural man cannot comprehend them, for the apostle tells us in I Corinthians, 2: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

"For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God." And thus does the apostle explain a great mystery. How beautiful this explanation is, how simple, how direct—that the things of man are to be comprehended by the spirit of man, that the things of God are only discerned by the Spirit of God.

NO SINGLE PRINCIPLE OF THE GOSPEL WILL INSURE SALVATION

In the gospel there are many doctrines, all of which are necessary to a plan of salvation. If any one of the doctrines is separated from the others—for they are all closely connected and are to be taken as a guide—that doctrine will come short of insuring salvation, it will lose its power. Take for instance the principle of faith. It seems to be the moving principle of action in almost all things. The Apostle Paul says of it in Hebrews 11:

"Through faith we understand that the worlds were framed by the word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear." * * *

"By faith they passed through the Red Sea as by dry land: which the Egyptians assaying to do were drowned.

"By faith the walls of Jericho fell down, after they were compassed about seven days. * * *

"And what shall I more say?" the apostle observed, "for the time would fail me to tell of Gedeon, and of Barak, and of Samson, and of Jephthae; of David also, and Samuel, and of the prophets: Who through faith subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the violence of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, out of weakness were made strong, waxed valiant in fight, turned to flight the armies of the aliens."

WORKS MUST ACCOMPANY FAITH

You will see by this principle of faith that it is a doctrine of mighty power, but if it is separated from the gospel principles and taken as a single guide it will be lacking as a means of salvation. James said:

"Yea, a man may say, Thou hast faith and I have works: shew me thy faith without thy works, and I will shew thee my faith by my works."

Faith without works is dead, being alone.

WHAT ARE SOME OF THESE WORKS?

So it would seem that works must accompany this mighty principle of faith. What works are there which are related to it and essential to salvation? One of them is repentance. It is said that without faith it is impossible to please God, and I think we may say also that without repentance it would be impossible to please him. He is a holy being, and if we expect to come into his presence we must become like him.

John, the Baptist, cried repentance in the wilderness. Jesus preached the doctrine of repentance. It was the burden of his mission, and so it is the burden of our mission.

REPENTANCE

There is another very important principle that follows repentance, and involves the question of works. That principle is baptism. Peter, on the day of pentecost, warned the people regarding this important matter. They were pricked in their hearts. They wanted to know what to do. He said: "Repent and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins, and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Ghost." Thus it became necessary that the repentant believer should receive this vital ordinance of baptism. But the ordinance itself is not sufficient if administered with water only. Baptism is dual in its nature. It has two very important phases. This was brought out with great clearness by the Savior who, in conversation with Nicodemus, said:

"Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God." And then further he said:

"Except a man be born of water and of the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God."

So that baptism represents a very important work and is closely associated with faith and repentance.

BAPTISM OF THE HOLY GHOST

The other mighty companion principle that was emphasized by the Savior, and is so widely neglected in the world today, is the baptism of the Holy Ghost. How beautiful, how important, how imperative it is! I fancy I hear somebody say: "Baptism of the Spirit? What does that mean? We have not been taught such a principle. It is not in our church; we have not seen it in any of the other churches. What do you mean by baptism of the Spirit?" Well, Jesus said to his apostles, as he breathed upon them: "Receive ye the Holy Ghost." That was the baptism of the Spirit, which is sometimes referred to as baptism by fire and the Holy Ghost. When the apostles laid their hands upon converts and blessed them and said unto them, "Receive ye the Holy Ghost," they did actually receive this divine Spirit, the Spirit of truth which was to be to them a special gift from heaven, to enable them to comprehend the word of God, to discern things of a spiritual nature, to bring to their minds the remembrance of things past, things present, and to show them things to come. What did John, the apostle, say in respect to this matter? He said: (I John 5:7-8.)

"For there are three that bear record in heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one.

"And there are three that bear witness in earth, the spirit, and the water, and the blood: and these three agree in one."

THREE WITNESSES IN HEAVEN, THREE ON EARTH

Three great and important witnesses in heaven and three upon the earth. This doctrine is put forth in a little greater clearness in the Pearl of Great Price, which shows that the ordinance of baptism is a profound doctrine of the gospel, and is essential to salvation. Let me read a few words to you, my brethren and sisters:

"And the Lord spake unto Adam, saying: Inasmuch as thy children are conceived in sin, even so when they begin to grow up, sin conceiveth in their hearts, and they taste the bitter, that they may know to prize the good.

"And it is given unto them to know good from evil; wherefore they are agents unto themselves, and I have given unto you another law and commandment.

"Wherefore teach it unto your children, that all men, everywhere, must repent."

The doctrine of repentance is here greatly emphasized:

"Or they can in nowise inherit the kingdom of God, for no unclean thing can dwell there, or dwell in his presence; for, in the language of Adam, Man of Holiness is his name, and the name of his Only Begotten is the Son of Man, even Jesus Christ, a righteous Judge, who shall come in the meridian of time.

"Therefore I give unto you a commandment, to teach these things freely unto your children, saying:

"That by reason of transgression cometh the fall, which fall bringeth death, and inasmuch as ye were born into the world by water, and blood, and the spirit, which I have made, and so became of dust a living soul, even so ye must be born again into the kingdom of heaven, of water, and of the Spirit, and be cleansed by blood, even the blood of mine Only Begotten; that ye might be sanctified from all sin, and enjoy the words of eternal life in this world, and eternal life in the world to come, even immortal glory."

Thus these three witnesses are mentioned with emphasis—the Spirit and the water and the blood.

"For by the water ye keep the commandment; by the Spirit ye are justified, and by the blood ye are sanctified;

"Therefore it is given to abide in you; the record of heaven; the Comforter; the peaceable things of immortal glory; the truth of all things; that which quickeneth all things, which maketh alive all things; that which knoweth all things, and hath all power according to wisdom, mercy, truth, justice, and judgment."

FULL PLAN OF SALVATION REVEALED TO THE SAINTS

Thus we have in the gospel of Jesus Christ these important doctrines which, in connection with many other doctrines, constitute a complete and full plan of salvation; and this plan has been delivered to the Latter-day Saints. We have rendered obedience to these saving principles, we have accepted them in our lives and have shown our faith by our works.

The Lord bless you, my brethren and sisters of the Church strengthen you in faith and prepare you for all things that may come to pass in the providences of the Lord, I humbly pray, in Jesus' name. Amen.

ELDER GEORGE F. RICHARDS

I think I may say without question that all men are or ought to be candidates for the blessing of eternal life and celestial glory, seeking to know what is necessary to be done in order to obtain this boon and blessing, and then doing all in their power to accomplish that end.

ETERNAL LIFE AND CELESTIAL GLORY

The gospel teaches us what is the meaning of eternal life and celestial glory and how it may be obtained. My understanding of it is that in order to obtain eternal life and celestial glory, we must receive all the ordinances of the gospel, keep all the laws and commandments of God and be willing to consecrate to his service our lives, our time, our talents, and our substance, as far as may be required for the building up of the Church and kingdom of God upon the earth, and the establishment of righteousness, looking to the salvation of the souls of men and women.

HOW TO GET FAITH, THE MOVING CAUSE OF ACTION

To meet this obligation we must have great faith, for faith is the moving cause of all action. It is the first principle of revealed religion and the foundation of all righteousness. It is a gift from God. How are we then to obtain this blessing, for faith is indeed a blessing from God to those who enjoy it? We must try to live in his favor, and when we are living righteous lives, according to our conception of what is right, being honest, true, chaste, benevolent, virtuous, and conscientious, the Lord will help us to that blessing as to all other blessings, for all blessings cometh from God. The Savior said "to search the scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." The scriptures of the Old and New Testament and also modern scripture, the Book of Mormon, Doctrine and Covenants and Pearl of Great Price, all testify, not only of the Son, but of the Father and the gospel plan. We ought to search the scripture. I believe it is a great weakness of the membership of this Church that we do not search the scriptures more than we do, because I am sure if we would do so we would have more faith, and the requirements made upon us by the gospel would be easier for us to comply with. The Lord has said also to his servants that faith cometh by hearing the word, and so we preach and so the scriptures teach, "how beautiful are the feet of them that bringeth glad tidings and publisheth peace." The assistance of the Lord and the gift of faith cometh from him, by the inspiration of his holy Spirit, to those who are thus seeking honestly for truth and light. We must have faith in order to meet the requirements of the gospel necessary for obtaining eternal life. So I speak as do my brethren, that the Latter-day Saints and all who hear may be led to an investigation, to the obtaining of faith, to the engaging in good works, to the meeting of all of the requirements of the gospel that they may obtain that boon and blessing of eternal life and celestial glory.

AN APPEAL PERTAINING TO FAITH AND RELIGION

Now I desire, my brethren and sisters, to make an appeal to you, as the appeal is made to me, in regard to these matters, pertaining to our faith and religious life. The young people of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints have adopted as their slogan for the ensuing year: "We stand for an individual testimony of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith." The story that Joseph tells of his experience when he was a boy fourteen years of age appeals to different people in different ways. Some who are more credulous, perhaps, than others, and whose minds are not biased, who are not prejudiced by things which have been said against Joseph Smith, against this people and against this work, receive more readily the testimony of Jesus and evidences of the truth of this work. Others will not give a serious thought that they might understand these things.

CONCERNING JOSEPH SMITH THE PROPHET

I want to refer to something that appeals to me, and I think it should appeal to all of us concerning the story of the boy Joseph Smith. We are told in the scripture that known unto God are all things, even the end from the beginning; and also we are told that the Lord doeth nothing but he revealeth his secrets to his servants the prophets. The scriptures contain the things of God as he has revealed them to his prophets. The scriptures declare an apostasy to take place in the Church, and they also declare a restoration, when all things that have been spoken by the mouths of all the holy prophets since the world began would be restored. There could be no restoration had there not been an apostasy. Historians tell us very minutely of how an apostasy did take place. The thing that men and women of the world, religionists, ought to have been looking forward to is a restoration of the gospel, which was to be in the last days. It was to be a gospel dispensation of the fulness of times.

In connection with these statements of the scripture, I have in mind what the Lord revealed to his servant Abraham. He showed unto Abraham certain intelligences, spirits of men, and told Abraham that they were some of his noble ones whom he had chosen to be his rulers, and said he: "Thou, Abraham, art one of them. Thou wast chosen before thou wast born." Now the kind of ruling that Abraham did is the kind of ruling the Lord had in mind, servants of the Lord and servants of the people, and it is most natural to my mind, that the Lord, looking forward to the establishment of his Church, and the restoration of the everlasting gospel in this the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times, in preparation for the second and glorious coming of our Lord, would reserve one of the greatest and noblest of these noble ones whom he showed to Abraham, to head his work, to be his mouthpiece, to be his prophet, to restore the gospel, to establish his Church, and to do all things that are necessary in this the dispensation, at least in the starting of this great work. And it seems reasonable, too, my brethren and sisters, in the light of the scriptures that he should choose a boy fourteen years of age for this work, for we read in the scripture: "Ye see your calling brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called; but God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise, and God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty, and base things of the world and things which are despised hath God chosen: yea, and things which are not, to bring to naught the things that are. That no flesh shall glory in his presence." To me it seems most consistent, the time being ripe and the Lord desired to restore the gospel, that he should raise up one of those noble spirits, take him in young boyhood, educate him and prepare him for the mighty work that he had to accomplish. So I believe that the life's work of Joseph Smith will prove this to be true. The Lord did take him in hand, and from the time Joseph had his first vision of the Father and the Son, every step taken was in the narrow way, forward, and he never had to recede from a position he had taken or a principle he had taught. Besides, inasmuch as he had this mighty work to do of standing at the head of this dispensation, it was right and proper that he should have a correct conception of God the eternal Father and of his Son, Jesus Christ, and of the Holy Ghost, for the faith of all intelligent beings is centered in God. In order to have a perfect faith such as will lead one to endure all that is necessary for him to endure in this life, and especially when called to so high a calling, he must have a correct conception of God, and of his Son Jesus Christ. And this he could not obtain from the religious creeds; for example, in the great Church of England of which my grandparents on my mother's side and other ancestors for generations were members, and were brought up in that faith. The first article of that religion reads:

"There is one living and true God, everlasting, without body, parts or passions; of infinite wisdom, power and goodness, the Maker and Preserver of all things visible and invisible, and in the unity of this Godhead there are three personages of one substance, power and eternity, the Father, the Son and the Holy Ghost." Three personages, one substance, nobody. What kind of a being would answer that description? That is the kind of a God our parents and our grandparents were taught to believe in and to worship. It is a marvel, when Joseph Smith came forth with this story of his vision and the declaration that the Father and the Son were separate individuals, glorified, immortal beings, and exalted, stating that they had appeared to him and had told him that these religionists had gone astray, and that he was going to restore his true gospel, that our parents accepted the story and believed in it? The scriptures are replete with evidence that God is as Joseph Smith declared that he appeared unto him. Not only that, but men who are not tied down by the creeds of the world have been frank in their admissions and conclusions, endorsing the scripture, which is an endorsement of the declaration of Joseph Smith. For instance, here is Henry Ward Beecher, one of the greatest preachers that the world has known outside of the true Church of Christ. He said:

"I am compelled to say that I must form an ideal of God through his Son Jesus Christ. Christ is indispensable to me. My nature needs to fashion the thought of God, though I know him to be a Spirit, into something that shall nearly or remotely represent that which I know. I hold before my eyes a glorious form, therefore; but after all the glory, whatever may be the nimbus and the effluence round about it, it is to me a glorified form of a glorified man, and I therefore fashion to myself out of the spirit that which has to me, as it were, a divine presence and a divine being; namely, a divine man."

THANKFUL FOR THE HERITAGE THAT HAS COME TO US

Are we not thankful for this heritage that has come to us, we who have been born in the Church and have been taught the doctrine of the gospel of Deity, and without prejudice we have been able to receive the doctrines taught by Joseph Smith, for not only did he teach us of the personality of the Father and of the Son, but the Lord revealed to him also the personality of the Holy Ghost, the other personage of the Trinity, that personage whose spirit may dwell in our hearts if we are prepared to receive him, and thus we become the temples of God, which we should keep most holy.

JOSEPH SMITH'S WORKS PROCLAIM HIM A PROPHET OF GOD

Now I see my time is about gone; therefore, I will bring my remarks to a close by saying this, that the works of Joseph Smith, including the restoration of the gospel, the establishment of the Church and kingdom of God, all in fulfilment of the predictions of the Prophet, and the correcting of false doctrines and teachings, in fact all his works declare him a prophet of God by the rule which the Savior laid down, that we should know them by their fruits, and also by the logic used by the Apostle Paul to the Romans, speaking of the Deity, even his eternal power and Godhead are understood by the things which he made. Joseph Smith by his accomplishments is known to be a prophet of God, and I do know him to be such, and this work to be the work of God. I bear this testimony in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER ORSON F. WHITNEY

FIFTY YEARS OF SERVICE

There is nothing that I enjoy more, in the way of public gatherings, than the General Conferences of the Church. The present occasion has for me a special, personal interest, in that it marks a distinct epoch in my life. Fifty years ago this very month, at the General Conference in October, 1876, I was called upon my first mission, to preach and teach the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. And I have been preaching and teaching it ever since, both by tongue and pen.

THE CITY OF WILLIAM PENN

My field of labor, during the fore part of that mission, was the state of Pennsylvania, and at the city of Philadelphia a World's Fair was in progress, similar to that which is now being held there. It was the Centennial Exposition. The United States was a hundred years old, and the city of its birth was celebrating the event in befitting style.

It was about four o'clock on the morning of a bleak November day when I landed in the City of Brotherly Love. I had sat up all night on the train from Chicago, not having sense enough to hire a sleeping berth—nor dollars enough, either—and as a result I felt somewhat "rocky." I had no sooner alighted upon the platform than a dapper young fellow stepped up to me and said: "Where would you like to go?"

"To the North Pennsylvania Depot," was my reply—that being the point where I was to take a train for the northern part of the state. I had no desire to visit the Fair, not being in a sight-seeing mood, but only intent upon reaching my destination as soon as possible.

"Jump into my hack," said the young fellow, with the air of the spider to the fly, "and I'll take you where you want to go."

"How much will it cost?" I inquired.

"Three dollars."

"Three dollars for taking me from one depot to another!"

"It's several miles from here," he explained.

"Where is the street car?"

"Oh, there's no street car running at this hour."

At this juncture another fellow came forward, and with a look of "brotherly love" on his countenance repeated the question put to me by his "pal": "Where did you say you would like to go?"

"To the North Pennsylvania Depot."

"Better go with the young man," he philanthropically (or Philadelphically) advised.

Still I hesitated, and was then offered a two-thirds discount.

But just at that moment I saw a policeman standing a few rods away, and remembering a word of counsel given me before leaving home, to the effect that I was not to trust every Tom, Dick and Harry who might offer to serve me, but apply for information to someone in uniform, I pushed past the two fellows who were bent upon fleeing me, and approaching the officer inquired:

"Where is the street car to the North Pennsylvania Depot?"

"Right around the corner, sir," said he. And sure enough, there it was. I got aboard, paid one dime, and saved two dollars and ninety cents by remembering and acting upon that word of wise counsel. Such was my introduction to the City of William Penn.

It is something of a coincidence, interesting to me if to no one else, that as I enter upon another half century of service—all of which I do not expect to spend in the United States, nor in any other place this side of the Spirit World—another great Exposition, the Sesqui-centennial, is in full blast at the famous old town.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

One hundred and fifty years ago, on July 4, 1776, the representatives of the Thirteen United American colonies, which up to that time had acknowledged allegiance to Great Britain, met in Philadelphia for the purpose of declaring those colonies free and independent. They put forth the immortal document known and revered as the Declaration of Independence, the preface to the Constitution of the United States, which the Lord has declared in our day to have been established "by the hands of wise men" whom He "raised up unto this very purpose." The signers of the Declaration were fifty-six in number, and some of the sentiments to which they subscribed their names are as follow:

"We hold these truths to be self-evident—that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of people to alter or polish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

"The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object, the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these States. To prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world."

Then, after enumerating those acts of usurpation and tyranny, the Declaration closes thus:

"We, therefore, the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the name and by the authority of the good people of these colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States; that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved. * * * And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honor."

AN ACT OF HEROISM

These men were not Latter-day Saints—but they deserved to be. They did not bear the Priesthood, nor did they have the fulness of the gospel, with the gifts and powers of the Holy Ghost. They were not members of the Church of Christ—they had no opportunity to be, for it was not then upon the earth. Yet there was something within them that made them willing to imperil their lives, not for personal profit, not for self-aggrandizement, but for freedom and justice and the rights of man.

Their act was heroic, thrilling. Even to read about it almost brings the tears to one's eyes. One of those men, after signing his name and laying down the pen, said: "Now we must hang together, or we shall all hang separately." And this was no exaggeration. Had they failed, they would have been executed as traitors and rebels. It was their success that saved them, and God gave them that success.

JEFFERSON AND ROUSSEAU

Thomas Jefferson was the author of the Declaration, though some of its phrases were current in that day—common property. Jefferson, heaven-inspired, breathed into them the breath of life and made them live forever. It was a glorious achievement.

"All men are created equal." This phrase is Rousseau's—he whose pen kindled the fierce fires of the French Revolution. It does not mean, of course, that all men are equal in intelligence and capacity, any more than they are equal in stature or in weight. But all have equal rights to life, to liberty, to the pursuit of happiness, and are entitled to equal opportunities for possession and promotion.

That is America's doctrine, and it is God's doctrine, too—yet to be emphasized when Zion's children, the pure-in-heart, become equal in temporal as in spiritual things, and are of one heart and mind, "every man seeking the interest of his neighbor, and doing all things with an eye single to the glory of God."

AMERICAN AND EUROPEAN IDEALS

"Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." That also is God's doctrine—the doctrine of common consent, exemplified at every Church, stake or ward conference, where the names of the presiding authorities are regularly placed before the people, to see whether they will sustain them as their leaders and teachers. This they manifest by giving or withholding their consent.

Compare this doctrine with the notion once prevalent in European as in Oriental countries, that the king or hereditary ruler of a nation was the owner of that nation, the proprietor not only of the land, but of the people living upon it. They all belonged to him and he might dispose of them as he saw fit, not being accountable to any human power for his actions. When a reigning princess married the monarch of another realm, all her dominions and all her subjects went with her as part of the bridal dowry.

Such was the case when the Netherlands, largely Protestant in religion, passed into the possession of the Catholic king of Spain, who forthwith undertook to convert his new subjects by force, using for that purpose his pillaging and slaughtering armies. The Stuart kings governed England as if it were their personal property, and the controversy that arose brought forth a Hampden and a Cromwell, and cost King Charles the First his head. He had "lost his head" a little while before. The German Kaiser habitually referred to his people as "my Prussians," and even in democratic England the king, according to the custom of centuries, still speaks officially of "my armies," "my navies," "my government."

A wonderful and startling change was wrought when men arose upon these Western shores who dared to say and maintain: We, the people, are the true sovereigns. We choose our rulers, and they are our servants, not our masters, and are accountable to us for the manner in which they govern the commonwealth and administer the laws enacted by our representatives for the general welfare.

LINCOLN AND JOSEPH SMITH

That is the American idea, "government of the people, by the people, for the people," as Lincoln expressed it in his famous Gettysburg speech.

And nothing proves more conclusively that Joseph Smith, God's prophet, was a real and true American, than his reply to one who inquired of him how he managed to govern a people made up of so many different nationalities, with all their varied languages, customs and traditions. Said the Prophet: "I teach them correct principles, and they govern themselves."

The United States is a Republic, in which the people are recognized as the one source of power. The Church of Christ is a Theo-Democracy, in which God speaks and the people say "Amen." It is the Church of God and his people—the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

THE MISSION OF AMERICA

Were I to say that the founders of this Nation builded better than they knew, few if any would question the statement. But if, in addition to that, I should voice my conviction that this great Government was established purposely to favor the coming forth of the Church of Christ in this dispensation—the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times—many would deem my declaration presumptuous and even preposterous. Great movements are generally so regarded in the beginning.

It was “presumptuous” in Columbus to pit himself against the learned ignorance of his age, and proclaim the earth round, when public opinion held it to be square and flat or shaped like a cheese. But his “presumption” led to the discovery of the Western Hemisphere and the founding of the mightiest nation of modern times. It was “presumptuous” for the American colonies to declare their independence and array themselves against the militant might of the British Empire. But they succeeded, and their “presumption” was swallowed up in victory, amid the thunders of the world’s applause. In like manner it may look presumptuous for a little handful of people, numbering only half a million all told, to claim that a nation originally of three millions and now of one hundred and ten millions, was founded for the express purpose of furthering their God-given mission of preparing the way before Messiah’s second advent. But when the Kingdom of Heaven prevails, and Christ is reigning in person over a glorified planet, such a claim will not be considered presumptuous, preposterous, nor at all out of the way.

All great builders build better than they know. Some realize in part, but others not at all, that they are instruments of Deity, used for carving out his sublime and beneficent purposes.

ALEXANDER THE GREAT

Passing by the patriarchs, the prophets and the apostles of ancient times—all of whom helped to prepare the way for this last and greatest of the gospel dispensations; and dismissing with a word such characters as Nebuchadnezzar and Cyrus—the former referred to in sacred writ as the Lord’s “servant,” and the latter as his “anointed”—let us take as an example Alexander the Great.

When I was a child I was taught to sum up this great man’s career by saying: “He conquered the world, but could not conquer himself, and died a drunkard at the early age of thirty-two.” But, I have since learned that Alexander did something more, which is not often referred to—I don’t know why, since it is quite as important as a dissertation on the wine cup and the evils of intemperance. Alexander’s conquests carried the Greek language as far as the borders of India, and that is the language into which the New Testament was afterwards translated. Thus the Macedonian conqueror paved the way, not consciously, but as an instrument of Providence, for the subsequent promulgation of the gospel. While building for himself an empire that was destined to perish with his passing, he helped to lay the foundations of the Kingdom that shall stand forever.

Dean Farrar, in his Life and Work of St. Paul, says: “The immense field covered by the conquests of Alexander gave to the civilized world a unity of language, without which it would have been, humanly speaking, impossible for the earliest preachers to have made known the good tidings in every land which they traversed."

McCabe the historian dilates upon the same fact as follows: "Alexander was no vulgar conqueror, and his title of Great does not rest simply upon his conquests. * * * Wherever he went he left the Greek language and some portion of Greek culture, as a priceless legacy to the countries through which he passed. This universal spread of the Greek tongue was all powerful in drawing the nations of the old world into a closed and more intimate contact with one another. Greek became the language of commerce as well as of the court. At a later period the Hebrew Scriptures, translated into Greek, were made accessible to the whole world, and the way was thus paved for the mission of him of whom these Scriptures testified,"

"God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform."

ROME'S UNCONSCIOUS SERVICE TO CHRIST

Dean Farrar again: "The rise of the Roman Empire created a political unity which reflected in every direction the doctrines of the new faith. * * * The gospel emanated from the capital of Judea; it was preached in the tongue of Athens; it was diffused through the empire of Rome; the feet of its earliest missionaries traversed the solid structure of undeviating roads by which the Roman legionaries—'those massive hammers of the whole earth'—had made straight in the desert a highway for our God. Semite and Aryan had been unconscious instruments in the hands of God for the spread of a religion which, in its first beginnings, both alike detested and despised."

THE DIVINE PURPOSE

In due time came Columbus, impelled by the Spirit of the Lord to cross the mighty waters surging between European and American shores. To what end? To prove the earth round, and reach India by sailing west? Yes, that was his motive. But the "Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them as we will," had a higher purpose in view. to which the comparatively small objective of the Genoese explorer was but tributary.

The unveiling of a hidden hemisphere, the discovery of the Land of Zion, the predestined theatre of wonderful events in the last days, events connected with the winding up of the Lord's work upon this planet—the Land where the New Jerusalem is to rise, unto which Christ will come as King of kings, to usher in the reign of peace and right. This was God's purpose, accomplished through Columbus.

The lovers of liberty who followed in his wake and were actuated by the same Spirit, as a further preparation for the great Latter-day Development, founded upon this North American continent a nation, the mightiest on earth, under whose protecting aegis, the constitutional guarantee of religious freedom, the Church of God came forth, to be nurtured unto the complete fulfilment of its destiny.

ISRAEL AND THE GENTILES

Did the American patriots who framed and signed the Declaration, who established the Constitution and laid the foundations of this mighty commonwealth, realize that they were bringing to pass the predictions of American prophets and the words of Jesus Christ concerning the Gentiles upon this land? No; for the record of those divine utterances was yet slumbering in the earth, awaiting the set time for coming forth. Nor do the Gentile nations of today realize that with their ships and railroads and other means of transportation and communication, they are helping to gather scattered Israel in fulfilment of ancient prophecy: "They shall fly upon the shoulders of the Phillistines toward the West."

THE GLORIOUS FUTURE

Columbus built better than he knew. Wycliffe, Luther, the reformers, explorers and conquerors all, as well as the founders of this Nation, did likewise. And even the Latter-day Saints, with all their knowledge of divine plans and purposes, revealed from heaven, to enable them to execute another phase of God's "marvelous work and wonder," have no adequate conception of its future greatness and glory.

Nor is it necessary that we should have, at this time. Well for us if we diligently discharge the duty of the present hour, and patiently bide the time of Him whose omnipotent and unerring hand is guiding the Cause of Christ to its glorious consummation.

ELDER REY L. PRATT

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Mexican Mission

I am happy, my brethren and sisters, to be with you in this conference of the Church, and to be associated again with my brethren and sisters, and with my family, after our absence for nearly a year in South America. To me this has been indeed a wonderful conference gathering. I have been very much interested, and my faith and testimony have been strengthened in the instructions and teachings that have come to us from those who have spoken.

I have been led to reflect that we are indeed a distinctive and a wonderful people, and that there is nothing like our organization and our institution anywhere else in all the world, so far as I have been able to come in contact with things in the world.

Our trip into South America brought to my attention many, many things that were new to me. It seemed that we were in another world, and I observed the practices and the customs of the peoples of the countries where we went with a desire to learn and to see things from their viewpoint. We came in contact with people who believed differently religiously. I will say in regard to them that I encountered a sincerity that is very commendable, upon their part, in the faith that they have in God, as they understand him, and in their religion, or their gospel, as it is taught to them, and as they have believed in it, and their fathers before them for many years. But I will say that after this review I came back with the conviction stronger than ever in my mind that we are a people apart from the world, and although I have seen much that is good and much that is commendable in the religions and in the practices of the people of the world, I had in my heart a spirit of thankfulness which I cannot express, that my lot has been cast with a people who know that we have the truth of the everlasting gospel restored to us, that there is no uncertainty in our minds, that we can go forward with confidence and work out our salvation in our Father's kingdom, knowing that we are on the right track.

It has been to me a source of joy, my brethren and sisters, to bear my testimony of the restoration of the gospel to the people of South America. As I listened to Elder Ballard's report of our trip, my mind was led to reflect upon the saying of the Savior, wherein he said: "Suffer the little children to come unto me, and forbid them not." I have had joy that is unspeakable in associating with little children in these foreign nations, and my heart has gone out to them. We asked them if they belonged to any church and invariably they say: "Yes." I have asked them, "What do you believe? What are your teachings? Do you pray?" And brethren and sisters, that which is commonplace with our children, taught to us from infancy, is lacking in the lives of these other children. I wish that each one here could see the faces of those little foreign children light up when we carry over to them the things that seem most common to us. When we taught them how to pray, when we taught them how to sing, when we rehearsed to them the stories of the Savior, and the great love he had for mankind, and the great works that he did among the children of men, we found their eyes wide open and their mouths agape, light in their countenances and joy manifesting itself from the depths of their souls, for the truths we were able to teach them. And they have said: "We have never known these things." It is remarkable to have the opportunity of carrying them to our Father's children who have been left in spiritual darkness through the systems in which they believe. Then, too, the children are not all small as pertaining to the affairs of the kingdom of our Father in heaven. The adults are children. We find them as such, and it has been a joy to me, my brethren and sisters, to be able to assist in teaching these adult children of our Father in heaven the truths they confess to us have brought the greatest joy that they have felt in their lives. I recall the people that Elder Ballard referred to yesterday, when they first came to our gathering, two Italian men came first, out of curiosity, I think. They had been in the United States a little while, many years ago, and they learned that we Americans were holding services in their vicinity. They came to our meetings, but they knew nothing about our religion. They knew nothing about the Bible. They wished to get the scriptures, and we obtained them for these men. After attending our meetings for some time, and hearing us try to teach the children to pray in Sunday school, one of the men came to me and said: "Can you get me a prayer book, so that I can pray, too?" I explained to him, as best I could, that we do not pray out of books, but just like a child would ask its father for what it wants, we ask our heavenly Father for the things that we alone know that we need. "Well," he said, "I have been a member of a church all my life, but I have never been taught to pray that way. I must confess to you that I don't know how to begin. Won't you men do me the favor to come to my house some night when I am home from work and teach me and my family how to pray?" It was one of the greatest opportunities that has ever come to me in my life, my brethren and sisters. I went with him, and we knelt around his family altar, with his wife and children and with the other man whose family was left back in Italy, and who is struggling hard to get means to bring them over there. We were able to teach them how to pray, how to ask a blessing upon the food, and to thank God for those commonplace blessings that we always thank him for, and think very little about the great blessing that we have in knowing how to do those things.

I wish you could see how that man's faith grew. I wish that you could realize and visualize as we did, who were there, how things seemed to open up and unfold to him and his companions in that home. Before we left there, he said: "I am willing to forsake all you say is wrong, for I have an evidence and a testimony that has come to me that you have brought the truth into this land of South America."

"Well," I said, "prepare yourself, quit your tobacco, and do a number of other things, and when the proper time comes these elders that are left here will admit you into the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, through the door of baptism." Just before leaving El Paso I had a letter from Elder Sharp, who labored with me in Mexico City, and who is now in South America, stating that those two men, a boy fourteen years of age, and the wife of one of the men, had come into the Church through baptism, and he said to me: "Brother Pratt, I never have seen so much joy shine in the faces of men and women in all the wide world as there is in the lives of those people since they have joined the Church. This dear brother said to me: 'I would rather lose all I have, and give my life, than to lose faith in the gospel that has been brought to us in this land by you missionaries'." "Suffer little children to come unto me," the Savior said, and we as a people who have his authority have a very great responsibility, and an obligation to carry to the many millions of our Father's children in the world the tidings of which they are ignorant.

I agree with Brother Ballard that my conception of our Father's children has been enhanced and widened, in my contact with Latin people. I was prejudiced against them in a degree. My contact with them, in association with the Lamanite people in Mexico, made me so. They were the conquerors of the people. They had brought them down to where they are. I confess that I had a prejudice against them, but that prejudice has all been removed, and I feel happy that I can include them among our Father's children who are heirs to salvation, through the gospel that he has restored through Joseph Smith. And as our last speaker said, I am willing to agree that even the conquest of Mexico and the conquest of Guatemala and Central America and Peru, and the rest of South America, at the hands of those ruthless Spaniards who brought so much misery, and who have brought so much suffering in the wake of that conquest might, after all, be overruled for good, for at least it has prepared a way through which we can reach those people by having given to them a common language, the Spanish language, where before innumerable tribal languages existed that would have been almost impossible for us to acquire in order to preach the gospel to those people. I am grateful to the Lord for the participation that I have had in opening up this new mission. I am desirous to continue to serve in any capacity where I may be called to labor.

I leave with you my testimony, my brethren and sisters, that I know that God lives. I know that Jesus is the Christ, and I know, as well as I know anything in all this wide world, that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God, and that he was raised up to restore and to establish this great gospel in this day, age and dispensation in which we live, I know that if I live faithful and true to the teachings of this gospel, I will work out for myself a salvation and an exaltation in the celestial kingdom of our Father in heaven. I know that this is true for you and for my family, and for me, and for all whom I love. I know that if it is preached to the people of the world who know it not, and they accept it, it will result in the same to them, for this gospel is the power of God unto salvation unto all who believe it; and those who believe it will obey it. The Lord bless you, my brethren and sisters, and help us all to serve him to the end, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

After the meeting this morning I was informed that hardly any of the audience heard what Brother Widtsoe said. Yesterday we had a very large machine here to emphasize what we were saying, and the one we have today is not so good, so far as the sound is concerned. It was suggested that if I move this machine in front of me you could hear much better. Did my voice sound louder the last minute? (Answer from voices in the audience: Yes, yes.)

We will ask the speakers to face the machine and maybe that will help. Somebody sent word that they were not hearing Brother Clawson. He then raised his voice and we all heard him, so I understand.

The choir and congregation sang, "O say what is truth?"

The closing prayer was offered by Elder George E. Browning, of the Weber stake.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AETERNOON SESSION

President Heber J. Grant presided.

Promptly at 2 o'clock the opening hymn was announced, and the congregation sang, "High on the mountain top."

Prayer was offered by Elder William F. Webster, of the Wayne stake of Zion.

The choir and congregation sang, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation."

ELDER GEORGE ALBERT SMITH

I very much desire that the few moments I occupy may be profitable to you, and to that end I ask an interest in your faith and prayers, that my mind may be touched by the power of the Lord to say those things that he would have you hear.

We have had much in the way of instruction. Many delightful discourses have been delivered here. We have been edified under the influence of the Spirit of the Lord. I feel grateful to be here. I rejoice with you that we are permitted to meet under such favorable conditions and to enjoy those things which our heavenly Father would have us hear.

GREAT PRIVILEGES ENJOYED

Today throughout the world there are millions of our Father's children who would give all they possess if they could be present to hear the instructions that we have received here. There are millions who have no conception of the purposes of our heavenly Father in placing them here upon the earth, yet we have been so favored that we not only have the instructions that were given to ancient Israel, but we have information that was given to us in this latter day in addition. There is no doubt in the mind of a Latter-day Saint who has received a testimony of the divinity of the mission of Christ our Lord. That is fundamental to us in building our hope for eternal life. We believe in God the Eternal Father and we believe that Jesus Christ was the manifestation of God in the flesh, his Only Begotten Son; and we believe in the Holy Ghost and the power that it manifests unto those who seek to do the will of our Father in heaven. This belief is fundamental with us, and it leaves us in the position of children of God. We are the children of our heavenly Father. He is the Father of our spirits.

OUR PRE-EXISTENCE

We lived before we came here and our birth into this world was the reward of having kept our first estate. When we were born we received a physical tabernacle without which we could not be exalted in the presence of our heavenly Father. It was necessary for his Son Jesus Christ to be born into the world in order that he, too, might have a tabernacle like unto the one that his Father has. We dwell here upon this earth realizing that we are indeed the children of God, knowing that he prepared this earth particularly for those who dwell upon it, that he has placed upon it those things that are necessary to sustain life and make all men and women happy, as far as the creature comforts of life are concerned. We should take advantage of the opportunities he has given us so abundantly.

PURPOSE OF OUR EARTH LIFE

We are placed here and instruction has been given us. We are informed that we will not be held responsible for the sin of Adam, but that we will be held responsible for our own sins. The atonement of Jesus Christ removed from us the responsibility of atoning for the sin of father Adam, and he has made it possible for us to live here upon the earth, and in due time, if we take advantage of our opportunities, we will be prepared to be resurrected from the dead when that time shall come. There is no doubt in the mind of a Latter-day Saint as to the purpose of our earth life. We are here to prepare ourselves and develop ourselves and qualify ourselves to be worthy to dwell in the presence of our heavenly Father. We must learn to overcome our passions, our evil tendencies. We must learn to resist temptations. That is why we are here, and in order that we may more perfectly do that the gospel has been restored to the earth, and we have been made partakers of it, and we have the strength that comes to us as a result of the power of the Holy Ghost. We not only have the resistance of an ordinary individual, with the limitations that such an individual has who has not a knowledge of the truth—we have equal resistance with him, and in addition the resistance which comes from knowing the truth and knowing the purpose of our being.

SCRIPTURE STUDY IMPORTANT

Now how important it is, with that understanding, that we should study the scriptures, that we should search the word of the Lord. The Savior said, "Search the scriptures; for in them ye think ye have eternal life: and they are they which testify of me." With that understanding we are not left as the world, but we have been warned by the Redeemer of mankind and we have been told just what we must do. We must have faith in God, we must repent of our sins, because while we are in a sinful condition we are in no way prepared to enter into the celestial kingdom, and we are informed that if we cannot keep the celestial law we cannot abide a celestial glory. The gospel has been restored in these latter days to prepare men for the celestial kingdom. This gospel has not been given to qualify men for any other kingdom, but has been given to us to prepare us that we may dwell upon this earth when it has been celestialized, when our Redeemer will dwell here and he will be our lawgiver and our king.

CARE TO BE EXERCISED IN EVERY-DAY LIVING

Knowing these truths, how careful we as Latter-day Saints ought to be to live every day of our lives that we may be influenced by the power of the Lord, and that we may be able to turn aside from those things that have a tendency to break down our power to earn the celestial kingdom. The fact that we have been baptized into the Church is not sufficient. The fact that our names are on the Church records is not sufficient. The Redeemer himself has said that "not every one that sayeth unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." That is well defined, therefore we cannot drink with the drunken, we cannot debauch our lives, we cannot be dishonorable in our dealings with our fellowmen and gain celestial glory. We must keep the commandments of our heavenly Father. We are told in other scripture that those who do not keep the commandments of God will forfeit their right to the blessings of the celestial kingdom. If we had been left to speculate on these matters, if we had been left without suitable information to prepare us for this life and to make preparations for the life to come, perhaps we might be indifferent and excuse ourselves as the world does. They do not understand, but for those who have been made partakers of the gospel of Jesus Christ in these latter days there is no excuse if we are not living a righteous life. We have been fully taught, we have observed the effects of righteousness upon the lives of others. We have had the assurance that by living the commandments of God happiness will be our portion here, and that this will be the foundation upon which we will build for eternal happiness.

DUTIES OF TEACHERS IN THE CHURCH

Throughout the stakes and wards of this great Church there are men whose duty it is to teach these principles. We send into the world missionaries by thousands to proclaim this gospel. There is no charge made for this service, it is offered to the world, to the whole human family without money and without price. It is so important that people shall understand this gospel that our heavenly Father sent his Only Begotten Son into the world to teach it, and he died that we might live, that we might be resurrected from the dead. And in order that there might be a well defined pathway to the celestial kingdom he organized his Church and set in it the officers that were necessary—apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, evangelists, etc. These were the officers that were to be maintained in the Church. One of his disciples is recorded as having said that these are to remain in the Church until all shall come to a unity of the faith. Why is it necessary that we come to a unity of the faith? It is because there is only one true faith, there is only one true gospel, and if we partake of some other gospel, if we devote our lives to work for some other god, then has the adversary taken advantage of his opportunities and destroyed for us the benefits that our heavenly Father intended that we should have. So the gospel was restored, and we are informed what we are required to do. Not only must we be identified with this Church by faith, repentance, baptism, and the laying on of hands, for the gift of the Holy Ghost, but we must live every day of our lives in such a way that we will be earning the reward of celestial glory. The man who violates the Sabbath day loses the Spirit of the Lord, and forfeits this companionship. The man who violates the rules and regulations that govern the Church forfeits that sweet influence that would lead him eventually into the presence of our heavenly Father. Knowing that, how careful we ought to be to teach our boys and girls, and to teach our neighbors the things that God has intended that they should know. And not only teach by word of mouth but exemplify our teachings in the lives that we lead.

MESSAGE OF THE CHURCH MUST BE PROCLAIMED TO ALL

There is a wonderful group of men and women in this Church, each one of whom has come out of the world, or has been born to those who have come out of the world. It is not a popular thing to be identified with this Church, but in various parts of this earth, in various nations of the earth, where the gospel has been taught, it has been preached by men possessing the same authority as that possessed by the disciples of old, men who had the right to declare in the name of the Lord that this is the latter day, that our heavenly Father is preparing for the second coming of his Son Jesus Christ. That message must be proclaimed in all the world before the end comes, and that duty has been laid upon the membership of this Church, and to that end, in order that men might do it properly and under proper direction, the authority of the Holy priesthood has been conferred. Men have been ordained and set apart to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, and they leave their homes and their loved ones and they travel for years among the children of men and divide with them that glorious truth that leads to eternal life in the celestial kingdom of our heavenly Father.

A GREAT OBLIGATION IS OURS

What manner of men ought we to be in the darkness that surrounds this earth, in the uncertainty that exists everywhere, as to why we live and where we are going? Our heavenly Father has taught this gospel to us in great plainness in this day, and we are told by one who lived centuries ago, and it is recorded in the scriptures, that “a wayfaring man, though a fool, need not err therein.” We have that information that they possessed, and in this latter day there have been added to it the testimony of the Book of Mormon, the testimony of Joseph Smith and the revelations that the Lord gave to him, supplementing the things that we already possessed, adding to the information that God had given to the children of men, to the end that we might be prepared when our Redeemer shall come to dwell here upon this earth.

Therefore, my brethren and sisters, a great obligation rests upon us. We have received this knowledge and we may possess it only on condition that we keep the commandments of God. A man may know as he knows that he lives that Jesus is the Christ. He may know that this is the gospel which is the power of God unto salvation; but if he transgresses the laws of God, if he becomes evil in his life, his mind may become darkened and he may turn away from that faith that points directly to the celestial kingdom, and spend his time along by-ways that will only lead him eventually into sorrow and distress, and that will mean that he has failed of his opportunities.

THE GREAT NEED OF FAITH AND GOOD WORKS

With that obligation resting upon us, what a wonderful thing it is that we are able to declare that we know the truth. It is not that we reason it out by the power of intellect alone. A man of his own thinking cannot find out God. We must keep the commandments of the Lord, we must follow the teachings of our heavenly Father, we must live in such a way that the whispering of that still, small voice will come to us and will indicate to us the truth.

Today as I realize the need of faith, when I think of the multitude of our Father's sons and daughters who are in darkness, I realize that each of us ought to be putting forth every possible effort to carry this message forward if possible here at home and abroad. To that end we have been given divine authority, so that when an elder of this Church goes into the world he does not go to be instructed of those who have been educated in the seminaries of learning necessarily, but he goes with the information he may possess. He may have a trained mind, he may possess the learning that he has obtained in our great universities, but the thing that he possesses that is important to the world when he goes out to teach is a knowledge that God lives, a testimony of the divine mission of Jesus Christ; and to that end we have been called and chosen and set apart. And as a result of that wonderful gift from our Father in heaven, he expects us not only to say to others: Keep the commandments of the Lord, but he expects us to keep all of his commandments and live according to the laws that he has given to govern his Church. For that purpose we are called together upon the Sabbath day, in our quarterly conferences, and our general conferences. All these meetings are intended to keep us in touch with that intelligent Spirit that will interpret for us the things that are necessary for us to know.

OUR DUTY TO RAISE A WARNING VOICE

Now today, assembled as we are, if we were like all other denominations, we might seek the Lord and receive his blessings, because every man that does good in the world receives a blessing; we might have all the cardinal virtues and make them our own, but without the power of God and the authority of the holy Priesthood it is not possible for men to attain to the celestial kingdom. And, knowing that, how gladly we ought to give of our time and our means and of the power that the Lord has bestowed upon us to raise not only a warning voice, but a teaching voice, a voice of love, a voice of kindness, a voice of instruction to the children of men, and deliver our message in such a way that they will be constrained to listen, and that they will be anxious to know whereof we speak. Our heavenly Father has made it possible for all normal people in this world to know the truth if they will. He has made it possible for every man and every woman to receive the gospel if they will. We have our agency. Herein is the condemnation of man, because that which is the truth has been plainly manifested from the beginning. Knowing the truth how anxious we should be to disseminate that truth, how gladly we should give of the powers that we possess to do the good that our heavenly Father would have us do. We strive for the things of this earth that perish and by and by we leave those things behind, but if there has been burned into our souls a desire to serve God and keep his commandments by living our religion and teaching it to his children, then we are laying up for ourselves eternal riches of which no one can rob us.

This testimony has come to me. I know that God lives. I know that Jesus is the Christ, and I know that this is the latter day. He loved the world, he restored the gospel and he sent divine personages here upon this earth to renew the gospel and confer the divine authority that was necessary in order that the mission that we had given to us here in the world might be rounded out and properly fulfilled.

OUR SERVICE SHOULD BE FAITHFUL

Now, brethren and sisters, these are the facts. This is our mission, this is our opportunity, and the Lord has promised us in return for availing ourselves of this opportunity that we shall have eternal life in the celestial kingdom, honor and glory throughout the ages of eternity. When we go to our various homes how anxious we should be that our houses be in order; how pleased we should be to lead our families along the pathway to eternal life; how grateful we should be to the Lord that he has given us this information, and as a result of it we ought surely to be an example to all the world. I pray that that Spirit which will enable us to serve faithfully may be with us, that that desire to do good may overcome the temptations that are placed in our way, and that, wherever we go, others observing our good works may be constrained to glorify our Father who is in heaven. This is our Father's work. It is not a militant work, but it is a work of love, and with the help of our heavenly Father let us make it what he intends it should be—the glory of the earth and the means, for that is what it is, for the salvation of millions of his children who have not yet heard it, by reason of the faithfulness of our lives.

That peace may abide in our hearts, that the testimonies that we have already received may remain with us and be added to by reason of righteous lives, and that in the end, when we have finished our mortal lives, we may be found worthy to receive the reward of a permanent home in the celestial kingdom of our heavenly Father, in company with those we love, is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER HYRUM G. SMITH

I trust, my brethren and sisters, that the Spirit of the Lord may direct what I may say this afternoon. There have been so many good things pass through my mind while the conference has been in progress, that it almost seems, at this present moment, that everything I ever thought of has been in the past.

I am very grateful for the testimony that has come to me through my experience in the work of the Lord, that it really is his work and that it is not a work of man, nor any set of men, but that it is a wonderful work established in the earth for the bringing about of the Lord's purposes concerning his children upon the earth.

REALITY OF THE MISSION OF JOSEPH SMITH

I have met a few people who have not yet a full understanding of the mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith. They declare that it seems to be a myth or something that they cannot comprehend, something that does not seem a reality. But to me, ever since I was a small child and had the privilege of hearing the testimony of my parents and the teachers of the Church, the mission and life's work of the Prophet Joseph Smith have been wonderful realities. I picture certain important instances in the life of the prophet which seem to be more impressive than other instances. For example, the occasion of his annual visits to the Hill Cumorah, and in fact the first vision of the Angel Moroni. Up to that time all of the artists and the scientists and the teachers of the world pictured to us that an angel was either a woman or a child. But here a man appears declaring himself to be an angel of the Lord, and coming directly from the presence of the Lord in answer to this boy's prayer. Joseph said that he was frightened at first. Well, I think most of us would be just a little frightened. I fear that I would be more so than I am now. This angel declared that he was a man who once lived upon this earth, and that he had come with a glorious message to declare to this young man, who had desired to know the truth. In all the anxiety of his heart and the earnestness of it, he had gone to his parents and friends and to the ministers, who were teaching religion so-called, and he had not found satisfaction. He did not find that which satisfied his heart, until finally he went to the Lord and received a satisfaction that was wonderful beyond our power at times to appreciate. For the Lord, our Father, and his Son Jesus Christ descended from heaven to answer the boy's question concerning his desire for the truth, and this was a reality, not a fancy or a dream.

Many people desired and attempted to destroy that testimony and that conviction which came to that boy's heart. But he said that he knew that God knew that he had seen it, therefore, he could not deny it, it was to him a reality. It was a part of his life and he could not change it and be honest with himself nor with the Lord. In the great anxieties that followed the years in his great mission, to fulfill the great destiny of his life, he was visited upon many occasions by other heavenly messengers, and they, too, were a reality and not just myths, or dreams, or fancies.

REALITY OF THE BOOK OF MORMON

After this angel, called Moroni, had explained to the boy during that whole night many important things pertaining to his mission, he showed him the Hill Cumorah, in which were deposited the plates from which was translated the Book of Mormon. This reality was of such a character that the next morning, or perhaps about noon time, this young man went to the place called the Hill Cumorah, because he had seen it in vision the night before and that early morning with such completeness and such plainness that he went directly to the place which was shown him in the vision, and where the plates were deposited. And with some kind of an instrument cleared away the remaining earth that covered the stone which covered the box; and, after he had removed the covering of the stone box which contained the records, like any curious youth or man, he reached forward in an attempt to take from the sacred box its contents, when, to his astonishment, he heard a voice forbidding him, and telling him that the time had not yet arrived for him to take these sacred treasures, and that he must further prepare himself by a course of waiting and preparation until such time as he might prove himself worthy of this great responsibility.

This incident brings to me a feeling of the greatest reality. An angel we sometimes think of as being mystical, visionary and difficult to understand in appearance. But this was a reality, a person who could give instructions and talk as one man talks to another.

And other instances of this character have so impressed me with the reality of the mission and instruction of the Prophet Joseph Smith that it is today a part of my very being. I believe it with all my heart, and the instructions and the great mission that have come through the Prophet Joseph Smith to the children of men in these the latter days are to me one of the greatest realities that come to us, and I believe in them with all my heart.

TESTIMONY OF THE KINDNESS AND REALITY OF GOD.

The principles of the everlasting gospel which have been proclaimed to us during this conference until the Latter-day Saints have been very well instructed pertaining thereto; and the faith and devotion of men and women who are earnestly and sincerely striving to carry out those instructions and so to live that they may enjoy the blessings which the Lord has prepared for them—to me these are a wonderful testimony and reality of the kindness and mercy of the Lord. I am very grateful for the association that I have enjoyed laboring with the servants of the Lord, going about from stake to stake, from ward to ward, and conference to conference, doing what little I have been able to do to keep the work going and to encourage others to go on with it.

THE REALITY OF THE WORK OF THE PATRIARCHS.

I was very much impressed yesterday morning, and in fact during the whole day's services yesterday, when the house was packed to overflowing, men and women standing in the doorways and in the aisles. I do not know just how many were present, but I made this comparison: In just the few brief years that I have been sustained by the people as one of the general authorities, I have been instrumental in the hands of the Lord in administering blessings of the Lord to more people than were in the tabernacle yesterday morning. Of course that was not all at one time because that would be like speaking to them all at once. But during the years that have passed, since the conferences and the Church have sustained me as one of the general officers, 16,006 people have had blessings recorded in my office. That gives you just an idea of the reality of this work. Throughout the stakes of the Church men have been called to assist in this important work, and I desire to bear further testimony relative to the responsibility that has come to these men as well as the responsibility that has come to me, for their commission is of the Lord just the same as mine. Their commission is a reality and it is of the Lord, just the same as the commission that has come to these other brethren. In their calling it is just as important as my calling is to me in my place, because it is the work of God, it is not the work of man. Their commission is through the priesthood of God, and it is just as important in their place as my work is in my place, and I would like to encourage the Latter-day Saints to give greater honor to the men who bear the Priesthood at home. I do not want to discredit anything that I might do, because I have a testimony that my work is important. I did not always have that testimony. There was a time when I doubted it, but the Lord in his kindness has banked up testimony after testimony around me until I believe I can almost sympathize with the great Patriarch Job, because he was banked up all around with blessings and with testimonies. I hope I shall not have to endure what he passed through in order to prove the realities of those testimonies. I am perfectly satisfied with them as they are, and I hope they shall be strengthened through my further devotion to the work.

PRIESTHOOD SHOULD BE HONORED.

I should like to encourage all men who bear the Priesthood to honor it because it is of God; it is a reality and a power that is not given without a purpose to men. I have faith that the Priesthood of God has been given to men for service, to act in the name of the Lord to do his work; and when they fail to serve they fail to get his blessing. So, I desire that the members of the Church will honor those men who are given this important office in the stakes of Zion, as well as honoring all other men who bear the Priesthood, from the president of the Church down to the least and last officer, because I am satisfied, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that this is the work of God, and that these men who sit before me and those who sit upon the stand today, who are called to be officers and leaders in the Church, are men endowed by a power that is not found anywhere else in the world, because it is the power of God that has come to men through the instrumentality of the Prophet Joseph Smith and those who have succeeded him.

A PRAYER TO BLESS THE CHURCH AND ITS MEMBERS

I am very grateful that only in a few short steps I am able to trace back, through the lives of those who have received this Priesthood, that power which has been given to me. I was ordained to the power I hold today by the president of the Church, the prophet Joseph F. Smith. He was ordained by the president of the Church, Brigham Young. President Young was ordained by Oliver Cowdery, who was ordained by the Prophet, who was ordained by Peter, James and John and they were ordained by the Savior himself. And so within a very few, short steps I am satisfied, beyond the shadow of doubt, that the Priesthood of God is given to men to function for the Lord, and that his holy purposes may be accomplished. In humility, with the faith that these realities have developed in me, and with gratitude for the testimonies I enjoy, I pray the Lord to bless the Church, all of its officers, all of its members, and all of those who are taking part in this great work, from the greatest to the least. I pray that peace and the testimony of this truth may burn within your hearts, that the conviction of its worth and honor may help you to live so that you may obtain the glorious blessings that have been predicted and pronounced upon you through your faithfulness. I bless you all, my brethren and sisters, that the enjoyment of the truth may be your portion; and that, through your faithfulness, you may overcome every barrier that may come in your pathway to serve the Lord and to keep his commandments; and that you may triumph in your efforts to bring about the holy purposes of God. I pray that these blessings may be upon all the officers and members of the Church, whether they be gathered or scattered. I pray that the time will soon arrive when the Lord will come and accept the work that is being done by this faithful people, and that they may grow and increase in faith and in principle, until they shall accomplish his work, and we shall enjoy the blessings which the Lord has prepared for us as his faithful children. I pray for these blessings in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A sacred solo, "Come unto me," was sung by Mrs. June Marley.

ELDER DAVID O. MCKAY

"Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and purple robe, and Pilate saith unto them, Behold the man!"

THE WORLD NEEDS MEN

My brethren and sisters, when Pontius Pilate used these words, he directed attention to a perfect man. The world needs men, men of character, God-fearing men. "The world needs men, true men who cannot be bought or sold, men who will scorn to violate truth, genuine gold."

What is the end and purpose of religion, "swaying the lives of men the centuries through?" The Latter-day Saints answer in the words of the Lord revealed through the Prophet Joseph, that the end and purpose of true religion, which is the work of God, is "to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man."

WHAT IS THE CROWNING GLORY OF MAN?

And what is the crowning glory of man in this earth so far as his individual achievement is concerned? It is character—character developed through obedience to the laws of life as revealed through the gospel of Jesus Christ, who came that we might have life and have it more abundantly. Man's chief concern in life should not be the acquiring of gold, or of fame, or of material possessions. It should not be the development of physical prowess, nor of intellectual strength, but his aim, the highest in life, should be the development of a Christ-like character. "In the destiny of every mortal being," says Phelps, "there is an object more worthy of God than happiness. It is character, and the grand aim of man's creation is the development of a grand character. A grand character is by its very nature the product of a probationary discipline."

FOUR PICTURES OF IMPORTANCE AND BEAUTY

There are four pictures upon which I always love to look. Three are imaginary, one is real. The first of these is the picture of Christ before Pilate when that Roman official said to the angry mob, "Behold the man!" As he said it he pointed to Jesus, crowned with thorns, bearing upon his shoulders the purple robe. He pointed to one at whom the angry mob sneered, condemned as a felon and blasphemer, and yet when he said, "Behold the man!" he described one who was perfect in character, who was conqueror over weaknesses and temptations, and who could say, as he did to his fellow workers, "Peace be unto you! I have overcome the world." He is our pattern.

The other picture is Christ in his youth. Have you not admired the paintings of the best artists who have tried to picture purity and strength in that young boy of twelve years? I have, and I never look upon one of the choicest of these without feeling that I am looking upon one who is the embodiment of youthful strength, vigor and purity.

The third is the picture of the boy who, as Hawthorne describes him, looked upon the great stone face, and, while thinking of the ideals and virtues characterized in that great work of nature, developed those same virtues in his own life.

The fourth is a picture in real life, a youth whose clear eyes picture the strength of young manhood and the purity of the life he has led. What more beautiful thing can one see in nature than that? We love beauty in womanhood, we also love beauty and strength in young manhood, and that strength and beauty come as a result of true living.

THE GREATEST ORGANIZATION IN THE WORLD FOR CHARACTER-BUILDING

I am grateful this afternoon to be associated with you in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, the greatest organization in the world for the building of character; an organization which is striving to bring to pass the end and purpose of true religion, which is the immortality and eternal life of man. This earth life is the probationary state through which every soul must pass. By overcoming difficulties and temptation, and by rendering service to others, each may develop toward the Christ character as he revealed it among men. It is a glorious ideal; it is inspiring.

TWO WAYS IN WHICH CHARACTER IS BUILT

There are two ways in which this character is built in our Church. One is positive. In that positive development we ask young men and young women to participate in the various organizations and the quorums of priesthood. Fathers and mothers, do we realize what this means in the development of the character of our boys and girls? I have just time to suggest that we go from this conference this October with a determination to unite with the officers and teachers in these associations in helping them to win the interest of our children who participate in these organizations—the Primary, the Religion Class, the Sunday School, the Mutual Improvement Associations and the Relief Society. I wonder why more of our young girls do not join the last named organization, and not leave it entirely to our mothers. But, it may be, that the younger women's time is occupied with these other associations up to their taking the responsibility of the home. These organizations, however, with the seminaries and the Church schools, are but auxiliaries in this great organization of character-building. They are but helps to the priesthood. No youth in the Church who reaches the age of twelve should be excluded because of unworthiness from membership in the Deacons' quorum, and that membership should signify a clean life, a prayerful life, faith in the gospel of Jesus Christ. Every bishop should ask the boys of his ward what their attitude is in regard to these things before he ordains them to the priesthood. So throughout the Teachers' quorum, and the Priests' quorum. That is but a glimpse of the positive means of character-building, bringing our children to Christ.

Now there is alongside these positive means a negative means. All through life the Latter-day Saint child is asked to refrain from indulgence in things that will tend to weaken character. He is asked to keep the Word of Wisdom, he is asked to keep himself pure and unspotted from the sin of immorality. That is a wonderful thing, and especially when the community sentiment in the Church upholds that teaching.

TOBACCO A GROWING EVIL

There is a growing evil, I fear it is growing in the Church, to which I wish to call attention, and ask all these forces to co-operate in overcoming, in assisting the youth to resist. I refer to the evil of cigarette-smoking. Smoking is an indulgence which tends to weaken manhood and womanhood and to undermine character. I have always felt that, and I have wondered recently if thinking so much about it I have not become extreme in my condemnation of the habit. With the view of checking myself I took occasion recently to read another book setting forth the supposed benefits of cigarette-smoking. It was written expressly to prove that cigarette-smoking is not injurious. I tried to be fair as I read the two hundred and some odd pages, and I stand today more firmly convinced than ever that the cigarette has no defense, particularly among youth. The habit is wasteful, but worse than this, it does undermine the character of youth and leads to greater evils. The very man who writes so carefully and, as he thinks, so logically in the defense of that habit has this to say about its indulgence by youth: "It is agreed that the only possible harm that might result from over-indulgence in tobacco must come from the nicotine that is a natural compound of all tobacco, and man very quickly immunizes himself to the effects of nicotine." This is an acknowledgement that there is something against which the body must become immune. The writer continues: "Yellow fever, as every one knows, is a horrible and deadly disease, and yet a man who has once had it may regard it ever after with the calm indifference which an ordinary man regards nicotine."

I like the comparison. The use of nicotine should be looked upon just as we look upon yellow fever. No one will expose himself to that disease merely for the sake of becoming immune. It is too great a risk, so sane persons prefer to keep from it entirely. That is the proper attitude also toward the use of tobacco; and that is just what the author quoted desires regarding his own boy. Says he:

"I do not believe that growing boys or girls either should use tobacco in any form." Bear in mind, fellow workers, this is written by a man who tries to prove the beneficial effects of the cigarette. "My own boy," he continues, "has now reached the time in life when habits are easily formed. That is the age when there naturally arises in him the desire to imitate his elders by smoking. Realizing this I persistently urge him, as well as all other lads over whom I believe I may have some influence, to refrain from the use of tobacco during their tender years, and quite as persistently do I advise them to refrain for the same period from too much meat and from the use of strong spices, cocoa, tea and coffee. But the best of all arguments against the smoking of cigarettes by minors seems finally to be the fact that such smoking is unlawful in most states of the Union. For my part I wish it were unlawful in every state."

It is unlawful in the State of Utah. And besides these evils mentioned by this advocate of smoking for older ones, there is this moral danger that youths who participate in smoking frequently do it surreptitiously without the knowledge of their parents, thus adding to it an element of dishonesty, and dishonesty is one of the most disintegrating elements in character-building.

WHAT OUR HOMES SHOULD ESTABLISH

Our homes should establish the fact that the boy who indulges in cigarettes is not contributing to his advancement and growth in the Church and Kingdom of God, neither preparing himself for his responsible place in society. Today leading business men and leading firms throughout the country discriminate in their choice between the boy who smokes and the boy who does not smoke, favoring the latter always, and in many cases refusing absolutely to employ the young man who has contracted the habit of the cigarette. That is only from an economic standpoint.

We as Latter-day Saints have a stronger reason and one that points directly to the strength and growth of the character of our boys and girls. We heard the opening address of this conference, from the President of the Church who read the word of God to the Prophet Joseph Smith, that tobacco is not good for man. The statement is not qualified in any way. Scientists have demonstrated it; men who have tried to disprove it have failed, and we as a people stand committed to that command of God. Keep the habit of smoking and the use of tobacco in any form out of the lives of our boys. Resistance of the appetite will react upon the character and strengthen it. Just because a man has developed the habit is no justification for his continuing it. Just because some men may become immune (granting this man's argument), from the ill effects, that is no justification for its use in the priesthood of God.

FATHERS AND ELDERS SHOULD BE WORTHY OF IMITATION

Fathers and elders have the obligation of setting an example worthy of imitation to the youth. Boys want to look upon you as men. Their ideals incorporate in your life all the Christ-like attributes, as near as you can develop them, which Christ had when the Roman governor pointed to him, saying, "Behold the man." Remember, even though you have the habit, overcoming it will make you stronger.

"It is easy enough to be virtuous
When nothing tempts you to stray,
When without or within no voice of sin
Is luring your soul away.
But it is only a negative virtue
Until it is tried by fire,
And the soul that is worth the honor of earth
Is the soul that resists desire."

God bless our boys and our girls! May they stand out in clear, distinct manhood and womanhood to the admiration of all who see them, bearing witness that the power of the gospel, as revealed to the Prophet Joseph Smith in this dispensation and as being preached throughout the world by two thousand of these young men and women, is indeed the power of God unto salvation, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH FIELDING SMITH

My beloved brethren and sisters: I do not expect to present anything that is new, in fact we have not heard anything that is new during this conference, but we have heard the simple truths of the gospel of Jesus Christ, which have been from the beginning and which never grow old. I trust that what I may add may find a response in your hearts, that I may leave some impression that will abide with you when you return to your homes.

GOD'S MARVELOUS WORK

As I have listened to the most excellent testimonies and instructions that we have received during the sessions of this conference, my mind has turned to a prophecy given hundreds of years before the birth of Christ, by one of the prophets of Israel:

"Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honour me, but have removed their heart far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men:

"Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvellous work among this people, even a marvellous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

Thus prophesied Isaiah, speaking of these latter days. The Lord by revelation to the Prophet Joseph Smith, in the year 1829, before the organization of the Church, declared that this time was at hand, and that he was about to commence his great and marvelous work among the children of men. I think it is a great privilege to have the opportunity to live in the world when this work is established—this marvelous work which is recognized not only by those who have come into the Church, but by many who are not in the Church. I look upon the kingdom of God, or the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, as being the corner stone of this great and marvelous work which the Lord was to perform. And as I look over this vast assembly into the faces of men who hold the Priesthood, it is impressed more deeply upon my mind that there is great significance in this organization, and in this Priesthood which has been restored for the salvation of the human family.

WE LIVE IN A MOST WONDERFUL AGE

We are living in a marvelous age, a most wonderful age. The Lord is fulfilling his purposes very rapidly, both among the Latter-day Saints and among the peoples of the earth, everywhere. I am fully convinced that the time is now here that was also spoken of by another of the prophets, who said:

"And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions:

"And also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my spirit."

GREAT MODERN INVENTIONS AND DISCOVERIES

Of course, it was those who held the Priesthood and who were members of the Church, who had made covenant with God, that should prophesy and see visions, but the Lord was also to pour out his Spirit on others beyond the borders of modern Israel.

I remember sitting in a meeting some thirty or more years ago when that meeting was being addressed by one of the members of the Council of Twelve Apostles, who has long since departed this life. In the course of his remarks he made a statement that impressed me and which has stayed with me since that time. It was to the effect that the time would come when men would communicate from city to city, conversing without the aid of the telephone or intervening wires. As I pondered over it I thought: Of course, that time will come, but it cannot come until after Christ comes again, and his truth shall have been acknowledged over the earth during the Millennium. Then such great power will be exercised, but even then it will be granted to those who are in the Church and to no others. I have lived, however, to see the fulfilment of that prediction. I am witnessing it now, as no doubt many are who are listening to these services throughout the land, for the voice of the speaker is carried abroad in each instance, how far I do not know. The voice is heard and recognized, perhaps a thousand miles away, and the words leave their impression on the mind of those who are listening almost the same as if they were sitting in the presence of the speaker, as you are doing. I think this is very wonderful; and yet, this great discovery did not come through revelation to a member of the Church; it was not sent through one who holds the Priesthood, but it came through one not of the Church but who was inspired of the Lord to give this great blessing to the world. So with many other things, the automobile and the airplane as means of transportation; the talking machine and all of these great discoveries that have come through scientific research, they have come, most of them, outside of the Church. Yet I maintain that had there been no restoration of the gospel, and no organization of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, there would have been no radio; there would have been no airplane, and there would not have been the wonderful discoveries in medicine, chemistry, electricity, and the many other things wherein the world has been benefited by such discoveries. Under such conditions these blessings would have been withheld, for they belong to the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times of which the restoration of the gospel and the organization of the Church constitute the central point, from which radiates the Spirit of the Lord throughout the world. The inspiration of the Lord has gone out and takes hold of the minds of men, though they know it not, and they are directed by the Lord. In this manner he brings them into his service that his purposes and his righteousness, in due time, may be supreme on the earth.

INSPIRATION AND THE GREATER ACCUMULATION OF KNOWLEDGE THE CAUSE

Now let me say briefly that I do not believe for one moment that these discoveries have come by chance, or that they have come because of superior intelligence possessed by men today over those who lived in ages that are past. They have come and are coming because the time is ripe, because the Lord has willed it, and because he has poured out his Spirit on all flesh.

I know it is quite generally believed that the people living now are more intelligent than were those who lived in former ages. I cannot accept this view because, with the understanding I have of the restoration of the gospel and of the dealings of our eternal Father with his children from the very beginning, I know that he would not choose and send into this world inferior intelligences to stand at the head of his work. We are informed that in the councils that were held in the heavens, when tests were made, the spirits of the men, then living in the pre-mortal state in the presence of the Father and the Son, were chosen to stand upon the earth in the various ages of the world's history to hold particular positions of responsibility because of superior intelligence manifested in the spirit world. I am satisfied with the thought that among these spirits there was none greater, except the Savior of the world himself, than the one who was called to stand at the head of the human family. So it is not because of greater intelligence, but because, no doubt, of the greater accumulation of knowledge together with the inspiration that comes from the Lord as he grants it unto men, that we receive the benefit of these blessings. The time has come for the Father to gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven, and which are on earth, that the fulness of his work may be consummated. For this reason we are seeing and enjoying the great advantages of our time. The prophets anciently, I am sure, spoke of these marvelous events that should come to pass in the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times.

HAS THE RACE PROGRESSED INTELLECTUALLY?

I have before me an excerpt taken from a lecture delivered on the 9th day of February, 1925, before the Philosophical Society of Great Britain, by Avery H. Forbes, a member of that distinguished body. Discussing the question, "Has the race progressed intellectually?" he makes this comment:

"That information, knowledge, facts, have vastly increased is undisputed, but that the increase is favorable to the moral nature, or even to the worldly wisdom, is yet to be shown."

He then quotes the following from Alfred Russell Wallace, one of the noted scientists of the past century:

"The great majority of educated persons hold the opinion that we are more intellectual and wiser than men of past ages, that our mental faculties have increased in power, but the idea is totally unfounded."

HAS THE RACE MADE MORAL PROGRESS?

Then, discussing another problem, "Has the race progressed morally?" Mr. Forbes concludes that it has not, but on the contrary, with the greater knowledge that has been imparted and the greater power to act, men have used these agencies for the creation of greater crime. However, they have had the means within their hands to benefit mankind and to bring about increased righteousness. I think his conclusion is in perfect harmony with the revelations of the Lord to his people.

WHERE MUCH IS GIVEN MUCH IS REQUIRED

In conclusion, I want to call your attention to this fact, that members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, who have received the greater light and have made greater covenants to serve the Lord, are under the necessity of keeping those covenants and commandments in righteousness and humility. We are living in perilous times, notwithstanding the remarkable wonders and accumulated knowledge of the present age. This is a day of ungodliness and increased iniquity and men everywhere are paying little heed to the commandments of the Lord. These evil conditions which confront us tend to lead us from the path of truth. As members of the Church we have greater opportunity, because of modern revelation and the Priesthood, to serve our fellows and to teach them the ways of eternal life. Let us remember the words of the Lord to the Prophet Joseph Smith:

"For of him unto whom much is given much is required; and he who sins against the greater light shall receive the greater condemnation.

"Ye call upon my name for revelations, and I give them unto you; and inasmuch as ye keep not my sayings, which I give unto you, ye become transgressors; and justice and judgment are the penalty which is affixed unto my law."

I would like to present all of this revelation, but you may read it yourselves. It is found in section eighty-two of the Doctrine and Covenants. I will, however, read one or two more verses:

"And again, I say unto you, I give unto you a new commandment, that you may understand my will concerning you;

"Or, in other words, I give unto you direction how you may act before me, that it may turn to you for your salvation.

"I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."

The man who has received the truth and yet will not walk in it deserves the greater condemnation. A member of this Church who will indulge in the use of tobacco, who will violate the Word of Wisdom, who refuses to pay his tithing, to keep the Sabbath day, or who in any other way will not hearken to the word of the Lord, is not loyal to the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

I was thinking, when Brother Rey L. Pratt was speaking of his labors in South America, how certain Italian brethren came confessing their sins and in humility forsaking them—giving up everything in the world for the gospel's sake because they had found the truth, how characteristic that is of those who receive the gospel out in the world. Yet, here at home in the stakes of Zion, in the shadows of Temples, are to be found those who are numbered with the Church who will not keep the commandments of the Lord. Some of them have made covenant in holy places, and yet they do not value the truth; they do not value the teachings of the servants of the Lord and they will not walk in the knowledge which they possess, much less by every word that proceeds forth from the mouth of God. These shall receive the greater condemnation. Oh how I wish all who live in the stakes of Zion could get the same spirit of humility and faith that is manifested by these humble converts out in the world. What a power we would be for righteousness. May we seek for it, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I made a memorandum to speak of the statue which has been completed and installed in the Bureau of Information, commemorating one of the most remarkable incidents in the history of the Church; namely, the migration to these valleys of men and women in this great cause, pulling handcarts and bringing their blankets with them. Brother Knaphus has done himself proud in producing this small statue, which can be seen in the Bureau of Information building. Some of the most heroic and self-sacrificing pioneer work that was ever done by those coming to the valleys is accredited to the people who came in the handcart companies.

The choir and congregation sang, "Redeemer of Israel."

The benediction was pronounced by Elder C. Alvin Orme, president of the Tooele stake of Zion.

The conference adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m., October 5, 1926.

THIRD DAY

MORNING SESSION

On Tuesday morning, October 5, 1926, the conference re-convened. President Heber J. Grant presided.

The congregation sang the hymn, "O ye mountains high."

Prayer was offered by Elder Lewis R. Anderson, of the South Sanpete stake of Zion.

The congregation sang, "How firm a foundation."

ELDER BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Eastern States Mission

Section 20 of the Doctrine and Covenants is a composite revelation, by which I mean that it is a revelation that was not written at one time on the part of the prophet who received it. It consists of a number of brief revelations, received at sundry times between the publication of the Book of Mormon and the organization of the Church on the 6th day of April, 1830. And these revelations were given, for the most part, in the upper chamber in the home of Father Peter Whitmer, at Fayette, Seneca county, New York state.

In the first part of this section is the following statement:

"After it was truly manifested unto this first elder," [meaning the prophet Joseph Smith] "that he had received a remission of his sins, he was entangled again in the vanities of the world;

"But after repenting, and humbling himself sincerely, through faith, God ministered unto him by an holy angel, whose countenance was as lightning, and whose garments were pure and white over all other whiteness;

"And gave unto him commandments which inspired him;

"And gave him power from on high, by the means which were before prepared, to translate the Book of Mormon."

And, of course, under that inspiration, not only to translate the Book of Mormon, but also to send it forth into the world. By these same commandments, "which inspired him," he also obtained the restoration of the holy Priesthood; and by the same inspiration he organized the Church, and from time to time received communications and the visitation of angels which fed the inspiration that had come upon him through the commandments of God, until at last he achieved that magnificent work which we now know as the restoration of the gospel, and the establishment in the earth of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with its divine mission and commission to proclaim the gospel in all the world, and bring salvation unto the children of men.

What I desire more especially to call your attention to this morning is this statement: "And gave unto him commandments which inspired him"; and under which he achieved all this great work that I have briefly outlined. Latter-day Saints, you have these same commandments. Why may not we obtain, also, if not in the superlative degree, yet in rich degree, the same inspiration that the prophet of the Lord derived from these commandments? I would like to give an illustration of how these commandments and the visitation of heavenly beings—how the events, these fundamental events in which the Church of Christ had its origin—inspired the prophet; and perhaps we may learn from that illustration the lesson of catching the same inspiration. First, let me remark, however, concerning a great principle which statesmen recognize, for the principle is expressed in a number of our state constitutions, and quite prominently in the constitution of our own state, to the effect, that "a frequent recurrence to fundamental principles is essential to the maintenance of liberty"; and so, in like manner, a frequent recurrence to the commandments God has given, and the great events which have produced God's great latter-day work—frequent recurrence to those things cannot do otherwise than to give birth to a beautiful white light of inspiration in the souls of those who indulge in this recurrence to the commandments of God.

While the Prophet Joseph was in seclusion, in 1844, he issued letters of instruction to the Saints who were just beginning to carry on the work of redeeming the dead; and from his place of concealment he threw a flood of light upon the necessary steps to take in perfecting the operation of that great work which had but recently been introduced in practice to the Church. It is in section 128 of the Doctrine and Covenants. I suggest you read all of it, I will only read part of it. In the course of writing that inspired instruction, the prophet gives an ecstatic review of some of the events out of which the Church grew into existence; and see what comes of it, I pray you:

"Now, what do we hear in the gospel which we have received? A voice of gladness! A voice of mercy from heaven; and a voice of truth out of the earth; glad tidings for the dead; a voice of gladness for the living and the dead; glad tidings of great joy. How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of those that bring glad tidings of good things, and that say unto Zion: Behold, thy God reigneth! As the dews of Carmel, so shall the knowledge of God descend upon them!

"And again, what do we hear? Glad tidings from Cumorah! Moroni, an angel from heaven, declaring the fulfilment of the prophets—the book to be revealed. A voice of the Lord in the wilderness of Fayette, Seneca county, declaring the three witnesses to bear record of the book!

"The voice of Michael on the banks of the Susquehanna, detecting the devil when he appeared as an angel of light! The voice of Peter, James, and John in the wilderness between Harmony, Susquehanna county, and Colesville, Broome county, on the Susquehanna river, declaring themselves as possessing the keys of the kingdom and of the dispensation of the fulness of times!

"And again, the voice of God in the chamber of old Father Whitmer, in Fayette, Seneca county, and at sundry times, and in divers places through all the travels and tribulations of this Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints! And the voice of Michael, the archangel; the voice of Gabriel, and of Raphael, and of divers angels, from Michael or Adam down to the present time, all declaring their dispensation, their rights, their keys, their honors, their majesty and glory and the power of their priesthood; giving line upon line, precept upon precept; here a little, and there a little; giving us consolation by holding forth that which is to come, confirming our hope!

"Brethren, shall we not go on in so great a cause? Go forward and not backward. Courage, brethren; and on, on to the victory! Let your hearts rejoice, and be exceedingly glad. Let the earth break forth into singing. Let the dead speak forth anthems of eternal praise to the King Immanuel, who hath ordained, before the world was, that which would enable us to redeem them out of their prison; for the prisoners shall go free.

"Let the mountains shout for joy, and all ye valleys cry aloud; and all ye seas and dry lands tell the wonders of your Eternal King! And ye rivers, and brooks, and rills, flow down with gladness. Let the woods and all the trees of the field praise the Lord; and ye solid rocks weep for joy! And let the sun, moon, and the morning stars sing together, and let all the sons of God shout for joy! And let the eternal creations declare his name forever and ever! And again I say, how glorious is the voice we hear from heaven, proclaiming in our ears, glory, and salvation, and honor, and immortality, and eternal life; kingdoms, principalities, and powers!"

David, in the Psalms, has not equalled that ecstasy. I know of no passage in human literature that rises to the grandeur and sublimity of these thoughts of our Prophet as he reviews the commandments of God and the great events in which the work, of which he was the prophet, seer and revelator, had its birth, and its growth, and its development. It is generally accorded that the imagery of our National Anthem, America, is splendid. A verse or two runs as follows:

"My native country, thee,
Land of the noble, free,
Thy name I love:
I love thy rocks and rills,
Thy woods and templed hills;
My heart with rapture thrills,
Like that above.

Let music swell the breeze,
And ring from all the trees
Sweet freedom's song;
Let mortal tongues awake,
Let all that breathe partake;
Let rocks their silence break,
The sound prolong!"

That is regarded as very splendid imagery, poetry. I wish sometimes our congregations in this house would sing it more frequently, in our conferences. While this is regarded as fine imagery, how tame in comparison with that more splendid imagery that stirred and inspired the soul of our Prophet when he contemplated the commandments of God and the facts in which this work had its origin and which I have just read to you. Well, Joseph Smith drew inspiration from that contemplation and from the commandments of God he received. And it is important that from time to time we gather in these conferences and have our minds refreshed with these things, because in these general conferences we do make frequent references to these things—we have frequent recurrence to fundamental facts in which our Church had its origin. There is something real in this frequent recurrence to fundamental principles, just as real are they as when we partake of the holy Sacrament, the symbols of our salvation; the broken bread and the water representing the broken body and the shed blood of our Lord. By partaking of these symbols in remembrance of him, though they are material things, this bread and this water, although they are but words that make up that most splendid prayer of consecration, yet they evoke in the soul a spiritual power that is as palpably food to the spirit of man as is the material food that he partakes of to strengthen his body from day to day. So it is in contemplating these commandments of God and the great events in which our Church had its origin. They do impart a spiritual uplift; they do give impetus to the spiritual forces, and raise to higher levels the ideals of the Saints. They lift the Saints above the normal, and draw them close into fellowship with God. The volume and quality of faith are renewed, and are made to blaze forth with a clearer light, with greater warmth, that carries the Saints through the trying affairs of life, over all the disappointments of it, and makes faith triumphant in their souls.

I rejoice that we may have access to these sources of inspiration.

By the way, many of you doubtless have read Victor Hugo's account of the street gamin, Gavroche, I think, was the name. He was with a band of insurgents attempting a revolution in Paris, and chancing to overhear that the ammunition of the insurgents was giving out, he took a soldier's haversack, crept over the breastworks of the insurgents, and under the screen of the smoke in the streets, went from corpse to corpse of the soldiery whom the insurgents had shot down, and whom their comrades had left dead in the street, gathering the unfired cartridges from their belts. As he went he sang his defiance to those who were firing at the barricade, and at him. Sometimes a bullet would strike a dead man with a cold thud. "Ah," he would say, "they are killing my dead for me;" Then again a bullet would strike fire from the pavement, but there was nothing that could daunt the young gamin. He went from corpse to corpse, gathering ammunition and singing his defiance. Presently a bullet struck him and he fell to the pavement, but not to remain there. The touch of the pavement seemed to give the gamin life, and he arose to renew his defiance. The touch of the pavement seemed to give the inspiration of life to him, as touch of the earth seemed to give vigor and strength to Antaeus, the wrestler of old mythology, who was invincible so long as he could keep contact with the earth. So with Hugo's gamin and the pavement—touch of it seemed to renew his life. So let it be with us when we touch the commandments of God, may they impart to us light and power and inspiration that shall renew our strength. As the aerie to the eagle; as the bugle to the war horse; as sight of the flag to the patriot, and the drum-beat to the soldier, so let frequent recurrence to the commandments of God, and to the great events in which our Church had its origin give inspiration and spirit life to us.

I rejoice that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is gradually gathering into its control the sacred places where great historical events happened. I am sure that it will tend to intensify our remembrance of those events. I remember the effect the general conference of the Eastern States mission had upon our young missionaries—the conference that was held at the Hill Cumorah in 1923, celebrating the one hundredth anniversary of the revealed existence of the Book of Mormon. I noticed the effect on a group of missionaries only a few days ago of a visit to the Memorial Cottage and the monument that mark the birthplace of our Prophet. It seemed to inspire them with confidence and faith in what they had heard of him. I rejoice that we have these places. I rejoice that we have the Joseph Smith Farm, the farm on which the prophet toiled in his boyhood, and where some of the important revelations of God were given to him. I never visit that place but what I feel that I am living in the atmosphere of the great events that took place there. The most uplifting, sanctifying and glorifying inspiration that I have ever experienced has been in the Sacred Grove where the Lord appeared unto him who was to become the New Witness for God in the dispensation of the fulness of times. I am happy in the opportunity of visiting that place and of receiving the sacrament of the Lord's Supper there, from time to time. I rejoice that recently, acting under instructions from the First Presidency, we were able to secure the place where the Church was born, the house in which, as I now believe, the Church was organized. I know that that is disputed, and that a house is referred to about one hundred feet or more from the house that now stands, that was destroyed, and is said to be the old Whitmer home and occupied by the prosperous Whitmer family during the time that the Prophet Joseph was a guest at their home, and in which he organized the Church. We now have a complete abstract of title with the name of every man and woman through whom the title has passed; and I think we shall be able to patiently investigate the matter until we arrive at the absolute truth as to whether or not the house now standing there is the old Peter Whitmer home. If that is not the house, we don't want to hold forth to the world that it is; but if it is really the home of the Whitmer family, where these revelations in section 20 of the Doctrine and Covenants were given at sundry times, and where the Church was organized—if really we have that house, what a treasure it is! And what an inspiration it will be to the Church to be conscious of the fact that we do possess it. It was to this home that the Prophet Joseph, his wife Emma and Oliver Cowdery were brought by David Whitmer from Harmony, Pennsylvania, and were received as guests; and where the Prophet completed the translation of the Book of Mormon. As soon as it was completed, the prophet, by messenger, sent the glad word to his parents living at their home in Manchester township, and they with Martin Harris immediately repaired to the Whitmer home, where the prophet took the step necessary to obtain the testimony of the Three Witnesses. That testimony was received in a grove that then existed either on or near the Whitmer farm. They had prayer in the morning at the Whitmer home, for the Whitmer family were devout Christian people. Old father Peter Whitmer was a member of that strictest of sects, the Presbyterians. He was a sincere and good Presbyterian and followed the practice of prayer at his family altar. The day after the arrival of the prophet's father and mother and Martin Harris, as they completed prayer that morning, the Prophet Joseph walked across the room, and speaking directly to Martin Harris, he said in effect: Martin Harris, you must repent. You must humble yourself before the Lord this day as you have never done before, and get a forgiveness of your sins; and if you will do this you shall, with Oliver Cowdery and David Whitmer, obtain a view of the plates from which the Book of Mormon is translated.

Shortly after breakfast the four named went out into the woods, as I have said, and there supplicated the Lord with the result that they beheld the plates and the engravings thereon, and they heard the voice of God proclaim that the translation was true and he commanded them to bear witness of it to all the world.

In my interview with David Whitmer, in 1884, as he went over this ground, led by my questions, when we came to this part of it he said to me that in the progress of turning the leaves, or having them turned by Moroni, and looking upon the engravings, Moroni looked directly at him and said: "David, blessed is he that endureth to the end." When David Whitmer made that remark it seemed to me rather a peculiar thing that he should thus be singled out for such a remark, and I remember reporting it as such to President John Morgan, then president of the Southern States mission. I stated to him the peculiar feelings I had when I learned that from the lips of David Whitmer; but the subsequent history of these three witnesses led me to conclude that there was indeed a hidden warning in the words of the angel to David, "Blessed is he that endureth to the end." And it is rather a sad reflection that of these three witnesses he was the only one who died outside of membership in the Church. I wonder if Moroni was not trying to sound a warning to this stubborn man, that perhaps whatever his experiences and trials might be, that at the last he, too, might have been brought into the fold, and might have died within the pale of the Church.

Well, the foregoing mentioned incidents are the sacred associations connected with the Whitmer Farm in addition to the fact that it was the place where the Church of Jesus Christ was organized, and the First President of the Church sustained under the title of the first Elder of the Church, with Oliver Cowdery as the second Elder in the Church. I feel satisfied that we are going to get added inspiration from the fact that we own our birthplace and our cradle. I would like to point out some other things, but time will not permit, except to say this: There are those who undertake to say that Joseph Smith was a fallen prophet, and that in the latter years of his life he marred his mission, and that he was a fallen prophet. A fallen prophet! What? And yet, give a sunburst of inspiration like that which I have read to you here from the Doctrine and Covenants, given in 1842? Out upon it! It could not be true. He who voiced that reverence for God, and had that exalted spirit awakened within him by contemplating the early scenes of his mission—as I have read to you—is no fallen prophet. His life ended en crescendo. It grew richer, it grew greater as it neared its close. His nearness to God was emphasized more in the closing years of his life than ever before. The revelations that he gave increased in power and magnificence. And so, too, in his discourses, they grew in magnificence and power as he proclaimed God's great and mighty truths in the last few months of his life. The Saints of God who witnessed the inspiration of God upon him, come to us with testimonies of his increasing power as a Prophet of God in the latter years of his life. Joseph Smith was no fallen prophet, nor could he be and give such evidence of inspiration both in the revelations he received, and in the great sermons that he delivered near the close of his life, such as the King Follett sermon, and other great discourses. I rejoice in this evidence of the inspiration of our prophet, the grandeur of his work and the evidence that we gather of the truth of it from these things we have considered. Amen.

Of the First Council of Seventy

It has been a number of years since I have followed Elder Roberts in the pulpit. The first time I ever saw President Roberts was in Chattanooga, Tennessee. The first time I ever heard him preach the gospel was in Burk's Garden. I confess, at that time and for a considerable length of time afterwards, I was always awe-struck, and almost beaten into silence when asked to follow him in his public addresses. But I am thankful to the Lord that I have gotten over it, that I no longer feel that way. It has been a fight all my life to follow men who have great ability and who were greatly blessed as public speakers. My lesson came to me in this way, that I discovered that no man was ever created that could reach all the people at one time, and I figured that there must be some poor soul with bowed head who was discouraged and disheartened to whom I might, through the blessings of the Lord, and under the influence of his holy Spirit, give a word of cheer; and it has proved to be true, for I think now of several occasions—three distinct places, I remember at the present moment, at different times when persons met me on the street disheartened.

They had fallen by the way; they saw no way out of their difficulties, and were in a suicidal condition. For the first one who came to me in that condition I had no answer. I did not know what to do. "Why didn't you go to your bishop? Why did you come to me?" "Brother Kimball, I heard you preach, and I thought there might be a chance." In those cases I went to the Presidency of the Church, and that is where I learned the great magnanimity and the charitableness and bigness of the Presidency of the Church. In each of those cases I was used as an instrument. They never asked me the names of the young men, they simply wanted me to take up a labor with them, and if they repented I was authorized, not by the bishop nor the president of the stake, in those particular cases, but by the Presidency of the Church, and the young men were baptized, they were confirmed, and they were started out to serve God and as far as I know, in each and every case, they made good.

I remember one young man, highly cultured and educated in the University of Utah. I will never forget that young man, no matter how long I live. It was at the time of the World War, and he had been unfortunate. I did not know him; I never saw him before. He came to me in great distress. I went to the Presidency and that young man repented, and he was baptized and confirmed. He went into the war, became a lieutenant, and the last I heard of him—he wrote me several times—his letter stated: "I know God forgave me, for I have felt the influence of his holy Spirit in the army, that has brought me joy and peace and happiness."

So that I feel to encourage the priesthood of God. We never know how much good we do when we speak in the name of the Lord. I don't believe, I can't believe, that I ever converted a man in my life, but I have taught the truth, I have preached the gospel, and my voice has been heard from Canada to Mexico, more times than one. I was in the General Board of the Young Men's Association for thirty years, and I have never had greater joy or greater happiness than in lifting up my voice among the rising generation. How much good we do, as I stated before, no man knoweth. I claim that every man fills his niche when he is called of God and set apart and ordained to an office. He may not fill it in the way someone else fills it, but if he is a man of courage he will fill it in his own way, under the influence of the holy Spirit.

I have no apology to make for my origin. I was told once that my trouble was, I was trying to be like my father. Well, thank God I can try to be like him a little, but I was too young, when my father died, to remember his mannerisms and his method of speech.

My brethren and sisters, in conclusion I want to lift up a danger signal to the rising generation. In doing it I want to be very careful the way in which I express it, so I shall attempt to read it, although it is against my grain to do so. In our great city with its wonderful streets, I can't but think of the danger that menaces the people.

We see your red lights, we see your green lights, and the officers of this city are doing everything in their power to protect the people, but the people do not pay any attention to the signals—some of them do not. There is nothing else annoys me so much as for a man to run on to me with one of those great, powerful machines, and just before hitting me, honk his horn. My legs go right from under me. I can't even hit a trot, and the feeling I have is that he is saying: "Get out of the way, we are coming." I got that the other night on First North street here. I can see only one way at a time, and then I am not quite clear, but I had to see four ways that night. Here came two machines around that corner, with these cars all parked right up to the corner, and they tried to beat each other through and caught me in the center. The only thing that saved my life was my being thin. I am not trying to be funny, I am trying to be serious. Now all these danger signals with your yellow marks—I have stood there and watched the lights, listened to the bell, and yet last year, if I remember right, the automobiles killed over twenty thousand people in the United States, one-half, perhaps, as many as were killed in the World War—referring, of course, to the American soldiers. Now I don't want to get killed. What I am worried about is that they might not make a good job of it. I would hate to be maimed and crippled for life through the carelessness of men and women. Now I want to set up signals that are a hundred thousand times more important than dodging autos:

IMPRESSIONS AND REFLECTIONS

Shall we be brave, courageous men, standing upon the secure heights of virtue and righteousness where God's sun shines, and preach the truth and cry repentance unto this people?

This great country, America, the Prophet Joseph Smith declared, is Zion, North and South America, the pure in heart. It would seem to me that this great responsibility rests almost entirely with the young men and women of this generation.

The question naturally arises: What is the trend of the times for the modern sons and daughters of Zion? Riches and culture, ease and luxury. Everything is money and money is everything.

The Golden Key unlocks all doors, that is, it prys them open.

Plenty of money entitles you to anything and everything, honor, society and emoluments. The rising generation, who are poor, look upon this pleasure-loving people with envy and a yearning for worldly things, and as the spirit of the age in which we live takes hold of them, they assert their individual independence and break away from what is called "old foggy ideas, old bigotries, old superstitions," and go recklessly wild, at sixty miles an hour, claiming what is termed the "new Liberty of the twentieth century," and run daringly into forbidden pastures. Today all over America we see everywhere amongst the rich and poor, the cultured, educated and ignorant, the indications of the sensual tendencies of the age, forgetting for the moment the degradation and destruction to which such a life leads.

No single instance can be given as evidence that unlawful sensual pleasure can be indulged in without paying for it a thousand times in pain and remorse.

"The danger signals are set up at the gate of the garden of sensual pleasure, and the angel stands with his sword of flame, and no man, woman, youth or maiden enters unsmitten of him." "In the path of sensuality in all its multiplied forms our heavenly Father has placed barriers mountain high to stop us and frighten us back from ruin, disease and degradation."

As wealth increases in any country and with any people, the tendency to sensuality, through the many temptations of ease, idleness and gratification of ones appetite, the elevation of fashion, style and in living beyond a certain point of safety and security, is the cause of the downfall of hundreds of thousands of God's children.

"That 'money devil', if not used in doing good, is the lion right across the highway of our future, standing, teasing, menacing—just at the forks of the road, to lead us to ruin and unhappiness. If the roofs could be lifted off the palaces of the rich, what sights might not be seen, what skeletons in the closets, what sorrows, what shams, what sights."—Watson.

If we open our eyes to the danger that menaces the rising generation, life would seem to be a very dangerous sea, if we take note of the ruined thousands that strew its shores.

We therefore cannot look upon death as a great sorrow and calamity, when it involves no stain of honor and no loss of character. We wisely conclude the hand of Providence is in it and good must come out of it and we are comforted.

When we contemplate and think of our young men and women with their bright hopes of love, of truth and purity, of honor, of manhood and womanhood, of genius and talent, of all goodly gifts from God, of mind, of all sweet affections, and aspirations, gone down, blotted out and spoiled, we cannot feel otherwise, be as hopeful and cheerful as we may, that life is dangerous unless we are guided and influenced by the holy Spirit and directed by steady hands, by men and women as teachers of virtue, truthfulness and happiness, who are not afraid to speak in the name of the Lord.

The fruit of religion manifests itself in the lives of men. By their fruits ye shall know them. There can be no deception by men who love God and keep his commandments. We are one and all God's children. He created us and he never created a failure, and he created you.

Men are that they might have joy. Happiness is the object and design of our creation and will be to the end of our existence if we pursue the path that leads to it. This path is virtue, uprightness, faithfulness, holiness. To keep God's commandments we must know them. To know them we must read the scriptures and repent and be in tune with the holy Spirit and he will lead us into all truth and show us things to come. I promise you that you shall hear a voice behind you saying, this is the way, walk ye in it.

Remember this always: Temptation somewhere in the life of all finds us, as this life is a testing time. Therefore, watch and pray and ask God to leave us not in temptation but deliver us from evil, as temptation is ever lying in wait and in a thousand forms is temptation repeated.

There is divine wisdom in praying always and avoiding the very appearance of evil.

There is very little use of preaching religion or morals, or honesty, virtue and truthfulness to those whose motives and tendencies all point toward vice and sensuality unless they repent and sin no more. These wild, reckless, dissipated young people will not come to us, we must reach out a helping hand and go to them.

This great change for the uplift and betterment of this great country—Zion, the pure in heart—rests very largely, almost entirely, with the home and the parents.

We must, for the safety of the youth of Zion, come back to Jesus Christ's religion and its spiritual forces. We must teach the gospel of repentance and forgiveness which has made men's and women's lives happier, tasks lighter, judgment steadier, as it truly comforts the disconsolate, forgotten sinner, and makes to them a clear life of virtue, love and happiness.

No child of God can escape Christ's religion. Intelligence and knowledge, of the right kind, walks ever close to religion.

My conclusion is: There is just one great, big, life-and-death duty of the parents of children, the Church and the State, and that is, to keep every boy and girl under proper schooling and give to them "love, pleasure, work and worship."

You good people and parents living in the country, on your farms, I plead with you not to send your children to cities where the beautiful spirit of things God created perish.

Let them live in the open, in the beautiful valleys, on the mountains, in God's sunshine, near streams, rivers, and trees and let his Spirit teach them of the things of God.

My testimony, brethren and sisters, in all confidence, is that I know this work is true. I have tested it out. I have found God. I am a man of weakness; I am a man full of faults; but God knows I have given him the best effort there was in me. I know God lives, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, the Redeemer of the world; and when men have tempted me to deny this—which they have tried to do—I have talked to some of them, learned men, I have talked to doctors, I have talked to young men who have gone out and filled missions, come home and got education, and they have tried to burn all my bridges behind me; but, thank God, I had a testimony, and I knew! I have told them: "In what you offer me there is no happiness." If any man can prove to me that Joseph Smith is not a prophet of God, he has taken everything; he has burned every bridge behind me. I never saw the Prophet, but I have heard my father often talk about him and I have read his revelations and his prophecies, as a witness for God, and I know they are true. He is a prophet of God. I sustain the Church and uphold the hands of the priesthood as best I know how. God bless you. Amen.

ELDER RULON S. WELLS

Of the First Council of Seventy.

I earnestly hope that I may enjoy the spirit of the Lord while I stand before you. It seems to me that anyone who has made himself at all familiar with the history of the world must be deeply impressed with the fact that God has been over all, that he has directed the destinies of his children here upon this planet. Notwithstanding this, however, he has given unto them their free agency, for he has decreed that men shall be free from the very beginning.

The Lord asked his servant Job: "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? * * * when the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy?"

Modern revelation has made it plain what this occasion was. The proclamation of God's plan of salvation, the gospel of Jesus Christ, in which the free agency of man obtains. In order to carry out this plan it was necessary to create this earth where God's children might receive bodies of flesh and bone and, the recollection of their spirit life being withheld from them, and with a knowledge of good and evil, they might be proved whether, in the exercise of their free agency, they would "do all things whatsoever the Lord their God shall command them." The creation of a world and redeeming it from the fall, which was also contemplated, required the service of One endowed with Godlike power and the Lord said: "Whom shall I send? And one answered like unto the Son of man: Here am I, send me." Father thy will be done and the glory be thine forever. But Satan also came, even Lucifer, a son of the morning and said: Behold here am I, send me, I will be thy son and I will redeem all mankind that one soul shall not be lost and surely I will do it; wherefore give me thine honor. "And the Lord said: I will send the first." And Satan rebelled against God and was cast down and many followed after him.

Thus it was that the First Born in the spirit, and the Only Begotten in the flesh, became the great champion of human liberty from the very beginning, and throughout all the history of the world.

Let us for a few moments contemplate some of the things that have transpired in the history of the world, the rise and fall of great empires, the mighty battles for human liberty which have been fought.

Who cannot see the overruling hand of Providence? When Miltiades, the hero of the battle of Marathon, with a small army of 9,000 men defeated and put to rout 100,000 Persians, 6,000 of whom fell upon the battlefield with a loss to the Greek army of only 192, who can doubt that they were aided and upheld by an Almighty power directing the destiny of mankind? The freedom of the world was hanging in the balance. Which shall prevail, Asiatic despotism and superstition, or the new freedom and civilization? And ten years later, Xerxes, with the largest army ever mustered in the history of the world, until the great world war, invaded Greece but was held at Thermopylae for days by Leonidas and his brave 300 Spartans; every one of whom, however, died in defending the country rather than surrender, thus bringing upon themselves a fame and glory that shall endure as long as time shall last.

Then Themistocles, commander of the naval forces, learning of the Persians, final passage through the pass at Thermopylae on their way to Athens, boarded the inhabitants of that city on his ships and conveyed them to Salamis, and then with his 350 war galleys attacked the Persian fleet of 1,200 ships which had already sustained severe losses and had been thrown into confusion by the violent storms which they encountered on the sea. Again the Persians were put to rout and sustained a loss of 200 ships. In the following year the land forces continued to fight until September, when the Athenians and their allies with an army of 70,000 men, under command of Aristides, fought the final battle at Plataea and on the same day the combined naval and military forces of the Spartans, Athenians and their allies under Prince Pausanias defeated the Persians by land and by sea at and off Mt. Mycale, just opposite the Island of Samos. Who can read of these thrilling and soul-stirring events without a sincere feeling of gratitude to the Greeks for the great service they rendered to mankind in the great cause of human liberty, and who can doubt that they were guided and upheld by an overruling Providence, whose cause is our cause, even the cause of Liberty. It does not detract from the honor due to the Greeks to say that God used them as instruments in his hand to further his divine purposes. Surely Providence is over all. History is replete with illustrations: the conquests of Alexander, the great; we heard yesterday how through him the Greek language became the language of his empire and became the medium of publishing to the world the gospel of Jesus Christ which is the truth that shall make men free indeed.

Not always have the victories of great men been based upon the principles of righteousness; nevertheless the purposes of the Almighty cannot be defeated, for he overrules in all, and often "moves in a mysterious way his wonders to perform."

Shall I mention Julius Caesar, Napoleon Bonaparte and Gustavus Adolphus, the "Lion of the North," Luther, Melancthon and Zwingli, and the other great reformers? Time will not permit, but in the achievements and victories of each and all of these great men, one cannot but see and recognize the Divine purpose in breaking the chains of superstition, intolerance and slavery, and leading mankind out of the darkness that covered the earth and the gross darkness in which the people were benighted.

Was not the great Columbus inspired of the Lord to cross the unknown seas and discover the western world? What a wonderful stride in the cause of human liberty! America, a choice land above all other lands, withheld during the many centuries of the past to become a place of refuge for the downtrodden peoples of the old world, to become the habitation of free men where no kings shall oppress or hold the reins of government, as the Nephite prophets have foretold, and how literally have their predictions been fulfilled!

Then came Washington, the father of his country, who fought the revolutionary battles which gave us our national independence; Hamilton, the constructive genius of the constitution of our country, and Jefferson, that great champion of the rights of men, who wrote the Declaration of Independence and inspired his fellow-countrymen with love for the principles of human liberty.

Another mighty champion arose in the coming of Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator, who broke the chains of slavery and fought that these precious principles for which our revolutionary fathers had fought "might not perish from the earth." And later still came Woodrow Wilson, who, when the freedom of the world was in imminent danger, led the forces of America in the greatest conflict that the world had ever known, that it might be made safe for democracy.

Great and mighty are these men of America. How our hearts swell with patriotic pride when we contemplate their achievements. Let us then honor them, and let me here say that we honor them most when we say, as all Latter-day Saints do say, that God raised them up and inspired them with his holy Spirit for the furtherance of his great cause, the cause of human liberty. Let us not think even for a moment that liberty is the gift of any government or any nation. Oh, no! Life and liberty are our inalienable rights and were vouchsafed unto us in that primeval council when our great champion, even Jesus Christ, said: "Here am I, send me" for he came and organized this earth as a dwelling place for the children of God, for you and me:

To live and to be free,
To worship God alone
As conscience guideth me,
As my own heart is prone;
For these are rights God given,
He gave them all to me,
They emanate from heaven,
E'en life and liberty.

This is the thought that comes into my mind when I contemplate the history of the world, that Providence is over all.

This human liberty for which these mighty men, to whom I have alluded, have struggled, great and glorious though it is, is after all only a measure of civil liberty. There is a greater freedom to which we should aspire; for, let it be known that even in this great and glorious republic, the greatest one that ever existed upon the face of the earth, where the greatest measure of human liberty is meted out to our Father's children, in this land of the free and home of the brave, we are not free. "The whole world lieth in sin and groaneth under darkness and under the bondage of sin," but the truth that emanated from God, the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, that was proclaimed in that primeval day shall make us free indeed if we will only receive and obey it. And who have been the champions of this greater freedom? First and foremost of all was the Redeemer of mankind, he that was in the beginning. He came in the meridian of time and ministered the law of liberty and freedom among the children of men. Many others have been sent, other great and noble ones, but I shall not take the time to enumerate them all but there was Abraham, whom God chose among the great ones, for he knew him before he was born and chose him to become the father of the faithful. And there was Moses, to whom the Lord gave the perfect law of liberty, even the gospel of Jesus Christ which is the higher law. But the children of Israel were not prepared for that great law of liberty, that higher law, and the plates upon which it was engraven were broken. Moses went up into the mount again and returned with the law of carnal commandments, that the people might repent of sin. It was the gospel of repentance; "Thou shalt not kill; thou shalt not commit adultery; thou shalt not steal." These great commandments have been thundered down to us through all the ages from Mount Sinai, and are still in force among the children of men. Why? That they might be liberated from the bondage of sin.

At all times these champions of liberty have been opposed by that arch enemy of God, even Satan, that rebelled against God in the beginning, and those who followed after him, and, as always, through human instrumentality, they killed the prophets, they persecuted the saints, they crucified the Savior of the world and put to death his apostles, those mighty men of God who preached his gospel in all the then known world, and transmitted their testimony in holy writ for the generations which were to come. Surely power was given unto Satan to make war with the Saints and overcome them as John the Revelator tells us.

The darkness that followed these tragic events has been rightly called the dark ages, and was only partly dispelled by the great reformers who were, however, not reformers but protestants who made effective protest against the darkness and tyranny that held the world in spiritual bondage and most abominable idolatry.

All these, together with the discovery of America and the founding of our glorious republic under the guiding hand of Providence, were the necessary preliminary preparations for the restoration of his glorious gospel and the setting up of his Church and kingdom upon the earth, never to be thrown down nor given to another people; where the perfect law of liberty shall be supreme and mankind shall be liberated from the bondage of sin, and Satan shall be bound for a thousand years during the great millennial reign of peace when Christ shall be our king and subdue all enemies under his feet.

Therefore God raised up another champion of human liberty even Joseph Smith the great prophet of the latter days, to usher in this glorious dispensation, the climax of which, not yet attained, shall be the second coming of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

But Satan, not yet bound, came again. I presume he will continue to come until the great battle will be fought on the field of Armageddon. So he came in the days of Joseph Smith through whom the gospel had been restored, and the Church of Christ had again been established on the earth. Through the human instrumentality of a cruel mob, he was murdered in cold blood, another prophet of the living God; but not until those principles which have within them the power of God unto salvation, the principles that liberate mankind from the bondage of sin, had been established among the Saints of the latter days. Let us then carry on the work so well begun until its final consummation. Let us rejoice in the assurance which we have of its final triumph. And may our hearts be filled with gratitude to our heavenly Father that he has fought our battles and will lead us on to victory if we will do our part. And let us put our trust in him and have an abiding faith that "Providence is over all." This is my earnest prayer through Jesus Christ. Amen.

The congregation sang, "Come let us anew our journey pursue."

The benediction was pronounced by Elder J. Berkeley Larson, president of the Shelley stake of Zion.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

CONCLUDING SESSION

On Tuesday afternoon, October 5, 1926, the concluding session of the ninety-seventh Semi-Annual Conference was held in the Tabernacle. All the seats in the main hall and galleries were comfortably filled.

President Heber J. Grant presided, and at 2 o'clock announced that the congregation would sing, "Earth with her ten thousand flowers."

After singing, prayer was offered by Elder Wallace Calder, president of the Uintah stake of Zion.

The Congregation sang, "Do what is right, the day-dawn is breaking."

ELDER JOSEPH W. McMURRIN

President of the California Mission

I trust, my brethren and sisters, that during the short time I occupy this position I may be sustained by your faith and sympathy and by the blessing and inspiration of the holy Spirit. I feel that it is a very important thing to stand in this pulpit, and claim the attention of so large a number of people. I am very thankful for the opportunity and feel it is a very great honor.

I am glad to be able to say to this congregation that in the California mission we are still endeavoring, to the best of our ability, to bring to the attention of the people of that mission the wonderful work of the Lord. We continue to bear testimony concerning its restoration and the manner in which it was brought from heaven to earth, and to testify concerning the divine authority which has always been essential for man whenever the Lord has had a message to deliver to the inhabitants of the earth.

We number in missionaries in California about 140, a little more than 40 of this number being lady missionaries, and the remainder being as a rule young men, most of whom were ordained elders in the Church as they received their call to go abroad as representatives of the work of the Lord.

I have been thinking, during this conference, particularly when Elder Orson F. Whitney was talking to the people, of the long ago in my own missionary experience. I went out forty-five years ago in company with Brother Orson F. Whitney and a few other brethren who were called at the general conference to go to Great Britain and to other sections of the European mission. I have a most distinct recollection of reading, in a little journal that I kept while on that mission, words that had been written during the first few days of my missionary labors. I was sent into the county of Ayre in Scotland and my lot was cast with a coal mining community. Of course, the experience that I had at the beginning of my ministry was something altogether strange and new to me. When I was released to return home, as I was packing up, that little journal that I kept accidentally opened before my eyes, and I read a statement to this effect: "Here I am, far from my home and people. God help me." Those words told the story. I certainly felt that I was a stranger in a strange land. I wondered whether it would be possible for me to continue in that community as a representative of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints for the period of time that usually falls to the lot of a missionary. In those first few days I did not feel that it would be possible, and yet, thanks be to God and to his marvelous providences, and I trust and believe to the help and light and companionship of the holy Spirit, I was not only enabled to remain in the mission field during the allotted time, but I found during that period that wonderful joy which is spoken of by missionaries who have endeavored in their weak and humble manner to expound the doctrines of the gospel, inviting men and women to an investigation of the message revealed by the Lord our God. I have thought of that period during these conference proceedings. I have had the pleasure of meeting with many missionaries who have labored in California during the past few days; and I am happy to say that these missionaries with whom I have met have expressed the feeling unanimously, I think, that they would be very happy indeed if opportunity could be given them, and financial conditions were favorable, to return again and take up their missionary work.

It gives me pleasure to report to the fathers and mothers who may be in this congregation that so far as the California mission is concerned, we feel that we have been abundantly blessed of our Father in heaven during the past six months. The missionaries of the mission have had better health during that period than during any similar period of my ministry as president. We have had but very little sickness. We have not had any serious illness among the missionaries, and we feel to praise the name of the Lord our God for his blessings unto us.

It is a satisfaction to be able to report that we are a little stronger in numbers, a little more firmly rooted, throughout the California mission at the present time, than we were six months ago. There are a few more branches in the mission; there are a few more Mutual Improvement organizations; there are a few more Sunday schools; there are a few more Relief Societies; and there are a few more Primary associations in the mission than were there at our last general conference. We feel encouraged in the work that has been entrusted into our hands. I am glad to say that we are a united band of men and women. There is no ill feeling in the ranks of the missionaries; they are all earnest and active and willing to play their part, ready to respond to any demand that is made upon them to go and come as they may be directed by proper authority, and they are giving the very best that is in them to establish the work of God and to spread the message of truth among the people with whom they are brought in contact. They are not mighty men. They are not wonderful or strong men, but they are just the kind of men and women spoken of in the holy scriptures, when the inspired apostle made the declaration: "For ye see your calling, brethren, how that not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty, not many noble, are called: But God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise." We feel that we are thus called.

The missionaries feel that they need the help of Almighty God, and I think it is a good thing to have that feeling, to realize that they have been called to a labor that requires greater qualifications, greater power than men and women are possessed of naturally. The missionaries have that feeling, and yet it is wonderful the labor they perform, the zeal they manifest, the faith they develop as they labor in striving to preach the gospel of the Redeemer of the world. For they do make the discovery that they are in very deed the servants of God, and we try to impress that upon their minds. I believe devoutly in the doctrine that has been advocated during this conference, that is, that the Lord God of heaven has promised that there will be great things follow the testimony of his servants; that after they have delivered their testimony to the inhabitants of the earth that testimony shall be backed up by the Lord God of heaven, with the vivid lightnings, with the thunders of heaven, with the sea heaving itself beyond its bounds, until all things shall be in commotion, and men's hearts shall fail them with fear because of the things that will come upon the inhabitants of the earth. I believe it, my brethren and sisters, and I try according to my power and ability to impress upon the missionaries that they are in very truth the servants of the Lord our God, and that they have been clothed with authority from on high, that whether men recognize and respect that authority or not, the Lord God is conscious that he has called them to his ministry, and I believe with all my soul that he will magnify them, maintain them in their service, and that he will finally bring to pass all that he has spoken by the mouths of holy prophets in relation to the latter times.

I hope the men of Israel who are before me feel the responsibility that rests upon them in connection with the delivering of the gospel message to the inhabitants of the earth. For if God has spoken the truth, and we know he speaks only the truth, the world is famishing for the truth and power which brings salvation to the inhabitants of the earth. Men who have received this divine authority by the coming of holy angels, who brought back to mortal men the power and authority that had been lost from the inhabitants of the earth, owe something to the children of men. I hope that this call, which has been made again during this conference for men of experience to go abroad in the preaching of the gospel, will meet with a hearty response, that each man will feel that it means me, and not think it is my neighbor, and that all who hold the Priesthood will be anxious to play their part.

I feel that I am under obligation to lift up my voice in proclamation of these principles that have been revealed, for in the mercy and providences of God some man found my own parents, and other members of the McMurrin family, in far-off Scotland, and through their teachings and testimonies and the help of God they were brought to believe the truth and came to this land; and in this land, the land of Zion, I was given birth. I praise God for that. I want to render to my fellowmen in some degree some such service as has been rendered to my own people. I am under obligation to make proclamation of the gospel, and every one of you is under obligation to play your part. He that is warned shall warn his neighbor, is the commandment of God in the revelations that have been given in our own time. Let us believe the scriptures. "Be not deceived; God is not mocked: for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap. For he that soweth to his flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption; but he that soweth to the Spirit shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting. And let us not be weary in well doing: for in due season we shall reap, if we faint not."

When I look into the faces of my companion mission presidents, I feel that it would be presumptuous on my part to take more of this precious time. I glory in my membership in the Church of Christ. I have proved to my own full satisfaction that it is the Church of Christ. "My doctrine," said the Redeemer, and that was all the Sons of God could say—"my doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."

I have tested that promise and doctrine, and I have had made manifest to me that this man who has been spoken of, Joseph Smith, was raised up by the Lord our God to reintroduce among men the doctrines of the everlasting gospel. It has brought joy unspeakable to my soul. In like manner, in fulfilment of the promise made in the closing declaration of the Book of Mormon, I have had made manifest to me, not through my father, not through any president or bishop, or apostle, but by the power of the Holy Ghost, that the Book of Mormon is the word of God, and I hope every man and woman in this congregation has that same knowledge, that same understanding, that it is a true, wonderful, glorious record of the ancient inhabitants of the land.

God help us to stand for the truth, and not to be led away by the whims and doctrines of men that would blind us and rob us of our salvation, I humbly pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

We would like to hear from many of our brethren. We will ask Brother Richard C. May to be our first speaker, and Brother Elmer F. Taylor to follow him. These are the only brethren presiding over stakes who have not either prayed or spoken in conference since 1919, except those who have been appointed during this year. Following these brethren we would like to hear from Brother J. Wyley Sessions, who has returned from South Africa. Brother O. B. Peterson, who has returned from Tahiti; Brother Mark V. Coombs, from Tonga; Eugene J. Neff, from the Hawaiian Islands, and Russell H. Blood from the French mission.

ELDER RICHARD C. MAY

President of the Minidoka Stake

Brethren and sisters: I wish to extend the love and sympathy and good fellowship of the people of the Minidoka stake to the presidency and all the general authorities and all the people of this Church. This is an experience that I have never before had. I remember many years ago, when just a mere boy, of sitting in a little country meeting house and school house combined on a Sunday when the home missionaries came to the ward. And as those brethren sat up on the stand and in their turn talked to us, I thought to myself, what wonderful looking men. I wonder if that opportunity will ever come to me. And from that time to this present moment I have tried to do my duty in the Church, have tried to help to build up the kingdom of the Lord to the best of my ability, and I thank him from the depths of my heart for the opportunities that have come to me in helping to carry on this work. I thank him that I was born of goodly parents, and I thank him that in the home of my parents I have the first time to hear either of them speak disparagingly of any of the authorities of this Church, and that teaching has been inculcated into my system until I would be afraid to raise my voice in criticism of any of these, the Lord's anointed. I hope and trust that while I sojourn in the earth I shall be privileged to do the best I can in bringing souls unto Christ and helping to build up his kingdom here in this earth, and I will give to him the praise and the honor and glory, forever and ever. Amen.

ELDER ELMER F. TAYLOR

President of the Young Stake, in Colorado and New Mexico

My brethren and sisters: I have enjoyed this conference, all but one thing, and that is I have had a dread and fear that I might be called to this stand, and up to the present time I have managed to avoid meeting the President of the Church. I wanted to take a back seat, so to speak. But I am not ashamed, my brethren and sisters, to stand up and bear my testimony. I am glad to be here. I have never enjoyed myself before in my life like I have done during the sessions of this great conference. This is my first experience in this pulpit and I have only been in this building about six times in my life. My father drove the second wagon that came into this valley and told me the story of the pioneers, and I have a love for this country, for this state, and when I crossed the line into Utah, I said in my heart, "God bless Utah." That is the way I feel in regard to this part of the country, this part of the Lord's vineyard. But I have been down on the San Juan river almost forty years of my life. We are having a struggle down there, but there is no better land in the United States than we have in that part of the country. We do not need any money, but we need about a thousand more good, faithful Latter-day Saints who are not afraid of work to build up that country.

I want to say a word or two in regard to the picture that I now see before me, that I have been viewing this afternoon. Not having had a chance before to go before the general authorities of the Church and speak to the twenty-six men who stand at the head of this great organization, I say to all who are here today, and all who are listening in, that in my judgment, and it is my faith, they are the best men upon the face of the earth. As I said to a friend of mine some time ago, we are not naturally better than the people of the world, but the Church that we are members of, and the kind of work that we are engaged in, are the making of us, and will make of us the best people upon the earth. I thank the Lord for having the opportunity of having had as guests in my home the men who represent the presidency of the Church, who come down from time to time to visit with us in our conferences. We welcome them there, and all the members of the General Boards.

I do not desire to take any more of this precious time, but I thank the Lord for the privilege of speaking to you today, and do so in the worthy name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

President Sessions presided in South Africa for six years, and labored about a year trying to get there.

ELDER J. WYLEY SESSIONS

Former President of the South African Mission

Trembling though I am, laboring with only half a voice, feeling as humble as I ever have felt in my life, yet my heart is filled with gratitude for the privilege of bringing to you, my brethren and sisters, the greeting of your brethren and sisters from the most distant branch of the Church on this great globe. As I bear my testimony to you, I desire to bear the testimony and represent the saints of that goodly land of South Africa. They have never seen a member of the general authorities of the Church. In our mission we have never been blessed with the presence of one of these men, but time after time I have heard those people in that land arise to their feet and bear witness that they know Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, and that they know that President Grant is a prophet of God, and I am authorized by them to bring that message to you.

Brethren and sisters, how we have longed to see you here and to meet with the Saints in these general conferences, but we were too far removed. I want to say to you that fourteen to fifteen thousand miles separated from you was not a great enough distance to separate us from the same good spirit that has prevailed during this conference, and as the general conferences have been held every year about this time, we arranged so that some of the conferences in the mission would be held at the same time as you are holding the general conferences here. I have felt time and time again that the Lord was blessing us with the same spirit that you have here.

I would like to say one thing to the fathers and mothers who have sent sons to Africa, and those who have them there now, and those perhaps who will have sons go there. South Africa is not the country that was described by Theodore Roosevelt on his hunting expeditions. We saw no jungles; we saw no wild animals; we were not eaten up by cannibals, nor injured by them. The Union of South Africa is a modern, thoroughly up-to-date government. We do not move quite so fast there, and we do not live at quite the same tension you do here, but it is a fine, up-to-date country, and there we have a host of friends. Oh, brethren and sisters, if you could only realize and understand how those people really appreciate your humble boys. If you knew how their hearts swell with gratitude to you, and their prayers go up in your behalf for the sacrifice that you are making to send your sons there, and that it may not be too great a sacrifice for you—if you knew all those things I am sure you would respond more readily than you do. How we need help down there! There are thousands and thousands of good people in that land who need the gospel. There are lots of hardships. We often hear of the terrible financial condition of the European countries, and of those in other parts of the world, but it seems to me as I have traveled about in Africa and in Europe that the greatest starvation is for these precious truths that we have right here, which, as President McMurrin said, we are enjoying because somebody's son or somebody's daughter went into the mission field and somebody supported them.

My brethren and sisters, let us respond to these things, and when your sons are called to South Africa—I know full well the expense is great—let us send them there, let us go without some motor car, or the last model at least, for I have seen so many motor cars that I do not think any of us need to go without them here. But let us go without the last model in order that we may send our sons to South Africa and to the other missions. The Lord has sent a very choice man down to that country to preside now. I know your boys will be protected and cared for, and they will return a blessing to you, and be a blessing to that land. I have heard you pray that the Lord might hasten the day when his purposes shall be consummated, yet here we sit sometimes and we are not helping the Lord in consummating his purposes.

As I have looked into the faces of the people in the congregations of the Saints in Africa and Europe where I have been, I have almost felt to pray, Lord, stay the time until we shall have called to us these people who are here standing in darkness, not realizing how completely they need the gospel, not knowing its value and its blessings. And yet there are just as good hearts burning in their bosoms, longing for and needing the gospel, and we stand charged by the Lord God of heaven to deliver that message, and I hope and pray that as long as I live I shall not get away from the choice spirit that attends the missionaries. I want the missionary spirit disseminated through the wards and stakes of Zion, and my humble prayer is that the Lord will fill us all with a desire to deliver this great message to the people who need it so much, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Brother O. B. Peterson spent three and a half years in the Tahitian Mission upon his first mission and presided there for three years on his second mission.

ELDER O. B. PETERSON

Former President of the Tahitian Mission

We have heard the scripture quoted to us this afternoon, my brethren and sisters, to the effect that it is the weak things of the earth that are called. I feel that is particularly applicable to me at this time. To say the least, however, it proves to me that the oft-heard statement, that opportunity comes but once to every man, is not correct. I remember that my name was called out at our last general conference, but, owing to the fact that I was not properly informed as to my privileges in connection with my work, I stayed on the job and consequently was not present. I felt, however, that I would have another chance; not that I have anything special to say, but I deem it an honor to stand in so renowned a place, for here have stood the prophets and apostles and servants of God in the dispensation of the fulness of times; and to me at least, if there is any difference among them, they are just a little more than any of the prophets and apostles of the Lord in any previous dispensation. It is my testimony that they have the same authority, the same priesthood and the same office and calling; that they are inspired by the same spirit; and, in addition to that, they are the ones who are called to lead, counsel and instruct us. The others are just a matter of history.

My lot as a missionary was cast among the more humble people of our Father's children; but a more loving people, a more lovable people and a more hospitable people you could not find in any other place throughout the world. We often wonder how it is that our young people can leave their homes and loved ones here in the valleys of the mountains and go out into the various parts of the world, to people with habits and customs so absolutely different to those to which they have been accustomed, and to an environment altogether at variance with anything they had known before; compelled to learn languages that seem at first to have no meaning whatsoever; yet, in a remarkably short time, they are able to apply themselves in work; they are able to adapt themselves to the peculiarities of the people; they soon learn the languages, and are able to be really instrumental in the hands of the Lord in spreading the gospel among his children. It is my testimony that the reason for this is the spirit of service that dwells within their hearts—it is the missionary spirit.

The Tahitian Mission, wherein I had the pleasure of laboring, as has been said, for six and a half years, is somewhat different, I think, from most any other mission of the Church; but I can say it is just as good as any other mission in the world. Our missionary work there, to a very large extent, demands that we travel upon the sea in small ships—twenty-five, thirty and forty-ton sailing vessels and gasoline schooners. Our mission covers a radius of more than a thousand miles, reaching from the island of Tubuai, which was the first island in the Pacific ocean to receive the gospel in this dispensation, to the Tuamotu archipelago in the north. Our branches are scattered over this thousand miles with a separation of from fifty or sixty miles to four hundred miles, and we are compelled to travel from one island to another in order to meet with our Saints. Owing to the few missionaries we have and to the absolutely undependable means of travel, we are unable to maintain constant contact with them; and, naturally, they retrograde a little. But they respond readily to the work of the missionaries.

One of our young men, who just recently returned from there, was laboring on the island of Tubuai. He had been for ten months without any word from home. It had been six months since his folks had heard from him. Upon the arrival of President Alma G. Burton, he was called to headquarters with his companion; but it so happened that the ship on which they were to sail was condemned by the government officials, precluding the taking of any passengers aboard. In order to get away, however, in response to the call of the mission president, they were compelled to resort to strategy; and after the vessel had left the island and gotten about five miles at sea, these two young men got into a native canoe and were paddled five miles through the open sea in order to catch the boat and go to headquarters. That is just an example of some of the things we do in the Tahitian mission in the course of our gospel labors there. But I want to testify, my brethren and sisters, that the words of Nephi, wherein he said that the Lord does not require us to do anything except he provides a way, is manifested repeatedly there, and the protecting hand of the Lord has been over us; and, in spite of the little dangers at times to which we are exposed, we never fear; and, in spite of the fact that the Tahitian mission was the first island mission opened in this dispensation, we have never had a missionary die in the service either from sickness or accident.

I should just like to relate a little incident to show the extent to which the missionary spirit plays its part in our work. We had a young man who was of a rather backward disposition and it was very difficult for him to learn the language. For his good, we gave him a transfer to the California mission. He finished his mission there and received an honorable release a year ago this Fall. He paid us a visit on his way home, and last April during our general conference he called on us again. He said to me: "You know I have been back to California since my return home. Upon my arrival home last Fall," he continued, "I was discontented and dissatisfied. It seemed that I had lost something valuable in my life. It seemed that the people at home were different, the work was different and I could not content myself. Consequently I determined to go back to California, where I had enjoyed myself so much."

So, he went back to his mission field; he traveled over the same ground which he was wont to travel as a missionary; he met the same people, but he confessed, "I was disappointed, I did not seem to find the same feeling and conditions that I experienced while laboring there as a missionary; and I decided that the reason for it was, that the purpose for which I had gone the first time was for the sake of serving others in behalf of the gospel, and the second trip was for my own pleasure; and I found that it makes a difference." He said, "I determined to go home and apply the same spirit of service, the same missionary spirit, at home that I had applied in the mission field, and I am now contented. I find that the people at home are just as congenial, and friendly, and the work is just as interesting. The trouble was I had not applied myself in the spirit of service at home, as I had done in the mission field, and this, I learned, had been the cause of my supreme joy and happiness there."

I think I have taken my share of the time, my brethren and sisters. I appreciate the privilege of standing here and bearing my testimony, and expressing these few thoughts. I have been buoyed up in my faith during the sessions of this conference; and I pray that the Lord will bless all of us, that we might ever be firm and steadfast, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Brother Mark V. Coombs spent three and a half years in Samoa and six years in Tonga.

ELDER MARK V. COOMBS

Former President of the Tongan Mission

I feel very timid, my brethren and sisters, in mingling my humble testimony with the wonderful testimonies that have been borne before me. For the few moments that I occupy this position, I do ask that my testimony might be prompted by the Spirit of the Lord, that I might be able to say something to you and put before you some of the problems with which we have been confronted in Tonga.

While Brother Sessions says that South Africa is the most distant of the missions, I believe that Tonga is the most isolated. We think we are mighty lucky if we can get a letter home and a reply to that letter inside of five months, and we never get a letter any more than once a month. When our newspapers reach us they are so stale that the only items we read are the sermons that have been spoken from this stand, or other instructions by the presiding brethren.

Now Tonga is only a small place. It is a tiny mission, possibly one of the smallest, and you have not heard much of Tonga. But there are some mighty good people there, people whom I have learned to love. The Tongan mission is situated about seven hundred miles eastward of Fiji; that is, about seven thousand miles from here, not "out where the West begins," but where the West ends. The sun rises first in Tonga. In 1922-23 we performed the first baptisms that were performed throughout the world in those years in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. We got up in the morning and performed these baptisms in the east, for the sun rises first there. We are seventeen hours ahead of the time in Salt Lake City.

We have about fourteen inhabited islands with a population of about 25,000 people. If missionaries were sent according to our population we would have but few, but due to the scattered condition of the islands we feel that we ought to have between twelve and fourteen missionaries constantly in the field, but we do not get them, and we do not get them because it seems to me there is a certain feeling among the parents in Zion which causes them to discriminate against our island missions, particularly Tahiti, Samoa, and Tonga. They figure that those island missions are so far isolated and that there is no medical attention; sanitary conditions are supposed to be poor, and these dear sons have to make so many sacrifices that they do not want them to go there. They would prefer possibly that they go to Great Britain, to some of our American missions, or to Australia, and possibly, while they are doing missionary work, hunt up a little genealogy. That is all well and good, but it appears to me to be just a little bit selfish. It appears to me that it should not make much difference where you give your service. The thing is, are you giving the service? The souls of those Tongan people are just as valuable as the souls of our ancestors who have gone before us, just as precious in the eyes of the Lord as the souls of people who are of a different complexion. I learned to love those people. I made a few sacrifices, which I do not count as sacrifices, but I count them privileges, and the people made many sacrifices for me. They went without food that I might eat; they took clothes from their own backs and gave them to me. They have given me their last horse. They have given me the last vegetables from their garden; when they had practically nothing, they saw to it that I and mine had plenty. So because of these close associations I have learned to love those people. And they did not only make those sacrifices for me, but they have made them for every elder who has been in the Tongan mission.

It was my privilege to be in Tonga when Brother McKay visited us in 1921. At that time there were quarantine regulations existing and it did not appear that he could visit us, but the Saints were back of us, and we exercised our faith and prayers, and with a lot of coaxing on my part, we finally prevailed upon Brother McKay to stop over in Tonga. I went with him as far as Samoa and thoroughly enjoyed my visit there. While Brother McKay was there, mingling with those people, a beautiful spirit prevailed. And then it appeared that the Spirit was bound to call him from there and that he was not going to Tahiti or Tonga, neither he nor Brother Cannon. Finally, in one way or another, he sent Brother Cannon on to New Zealand and he remained with us in Tonga. I believe those few days that Brother McKay was in Tonga were the happiest days of my life. The Saints congregated there, not being able to understand one word he said, but understanding through the Spirit, and I want to assure you that many of our most stalwart converts were made after his visit in Tonga. The influence that sprang up in Tonga after Brother McKay was there is something that I cannot describe. It seemed that after his visit some of our problems began to melt away and we began to find a way to solve them and to deliver our message better to that people.

I had been there but ten months at that time. One of Brother McKay's first remarks to me was, as we walked down the street one day, "Well, Brother Coombs, I see you have not very many friends here," by which I understood he referred to the Europeans. So I set myself to the task right there of making more friends and winning my way into the hearts of the Europeans in that nation, in order that we might present the gospel to them. We were blessed with some splendid elders. I have often said that had President Grant given me the choice of all of the elders in Zion, I think I could not have chosen better men than we had at that time, when we had to fight popular opinion in order to be able to prolong the life of the Tongan mission. In 1922, conditions got so warm and persecution so hot there that the government enacted a measure which prohibited the entrance of any more "Mormon" missionaries into Tonga, at least the law read that no more "Mormons" could enter under a penalty of a five hundred dollar fine and possibly imprisonment and deportation at the end of the term of imprisonment. I went to the Chief Justice and told him that it was not fair, and that it did not agree with their own constitution. He said, "Mr. Coombs, I happen not only to be the Chief Justice, but I am also the attorney. We do not want you 'Mormons' here." I said, "Why don't you want us here?" "Well," he said, "that is not your business. We don't want you, that is all. You are undesirable citizens." After a little diplomacy and talk, I found out why they did not want us. The one cry at Tonga at the present time is, one church. Tonga, you know, is the smallest government in the world that is not supporting a foreign parliament. They are not interfered with even by England. They were afraid that "Mormon" elders might stir up a spirit of disunion. They wanted every native there to belong to the Free Church or to the Wesleyan Church, and they were going to try to do away with all other religions, and their first gun was aimed at the "Mormons." We worked untiringly for two years, and at the end of that time I had the satisfaction of convincing those people that their viewpoint was wrong. We made numerous calls upon the Chief Justice and also upon the ministers and convinced them that their viewpoint was wrong, and by means of faith and prayer and our works we got them to repeal those measures in 1924. Now we can have all the elders that we can prevail upon the First Presidency and parents to send us in Tonga. And we need them. We need them badly, in fact. The people there need the gospel of Jesus Christ. They have been imposed upon, they have been exploited, and it seems to me the time has come that they should get the gospel in its simplicity and purity, and I count it a privilege to have labored among those people. I love them, and I am proud that I have associated with them.

Not long ago I had a little experience something like the one related by President Peterson, where we had to travel in our little sail boat of only nine tons, and I weathered a three days' hurricane to go to Vavau to conference with Brother Cahoon and his wife. Brother Cahoon is now the mission president down there. We were in sight of land with our sails ripped to pieces, and were buffeted by waves which were twenty or thirty feet high, and we could not make the harbor. The captain of that boat was one of our priesthood, a priest, and a splendid fellow, by the name of Jone Kogaika. I had told him that I had an appointment in Vavau for conference, and I was invited to go in his boat free of charge, and there were many others aboard the boat. During the time that we were buffeted about we were all sick. Our food was exhausted, our water was gone, and we had no means of getting into the harbor because our sails were ripped. I said to the captain, "Jone, let us turn around and go back to Haapai." I said, "Simply turn around and the wind will drive us back to Haapai, and we will get there in five or six hours and there we will be in perfect safety among those protecting reefs." He looked me square in the eye and said: "Didn't you tell me you had an appointment for conference next Sunday at Vavau." "That is what I told you, Jone." He shook his fist and said: "Well, the Lord being my helper, I will get you through." He got us through. We thought we were going down, and we didn't care if we did go down, we were so sick. I had had a wonderful blessing before going out there by President Penrose, and he promised me that I would go in safety on land and on sea. When things got so furious I forgot the blessing for the time being, and said to Jone that we should turn around and go back. But he had the faith I should have shown, and he got us through.

Now that is only one instance. Another man, Pita Afu, while I was visiting Tonga in 1914, a high chief, or one who should have been a high chief, (he had not yet been appointed a high chief) accepted the gospel, and invited the elders to establish the work in his village. The king of Tonga, hearing about it, became quite incensed, and made a special trip up to Vavau to interview Pita, and said to him, "What is this I hear about you? Why are you associated with those 'Mormons,' such an unpopular sect? I wish you would leave them alone." He took Pita upon a high eminence where he could overlook the beautiful harbor of Vavau and all the lower islands, and pointed to them and said: "Pita, if you will renounce 'Mormonism,' I will make you a present of all of these islands down here for your inheritance, for your sons who follow after you." Pita looked him square in the eye and said: "With all due respect to your majesty, you have not enough land in all Tonga to induce me to leave the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints."

Now these are only a few testimonies, only two instances showing the kind of people among whom your sons are laboring. They are blessed and favored when they receive a call to go to that land.

Tonga is not the best mission of the Church, but there is none better. Every elder who returns home contends that his mission is the best, and so it is. If it were not, then that elder was not doing his duty. It was a pleasure to me to get a letter not so long ago from Brother Widtsoe, who had heard one of our missionaries make his report, and he said something like this in referring to this young elder's testimony: "His testimony rang as true and clear as the tone of a silver bell, Brother Coombs. I am sure that the Tongan mission is not only doing its full duty to the Saints there, but it is developing to a full degree the elders who are laboring there." And the same holds true of those other islands which are discriminated against by the mothers and fathers. They develop to a full extent the elders who are laboring there.

Now, brethren and sisters, I know that God lives. I support these brethren whom we have lifted our hands to support, our presiding brethren, in the offices they hold. The gospel is dear to me, and I am looking forward to the time when I might be favored with another call to go down among the people of those south seas, for I am still quite young—whether, to Tonga, or to Samoa, or anywhere, it matters not, for I love those Lamanitish people.

Just one more word about our Tongan mission. Possibly our brethren from New Zealand think the New Zealand school, the Maori Agricultural College is not supported by the other missions. But Tonga is supporting the Maori Agricultural College at Hastings, New Zealand. At the present time I think we have about fourteen or fifteen of our young men down there in New Zealand attending that college. Another thing, the captain of the classes and the class leaders are Tongan boys, and since our Tongan boys have gone there the leaders of that college and the graduates who have graduated with honors have been Tongans every time. So you see the Tongans are a bright people and they have good souls worth saving.

May God bless you, I pray in Jesus' name. Amen.

Brother McKay suggested that I tell you how far those boys travel to get to that school. Tonga is only 1800 miles from New Zealand. These boys go down to school at their own expense and earn their own way while they are there and pay their own expenses back. Two of them have recently graduated with honors and they are teaching in our schools in Tonga.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Brother Eugene Neff spent several years in the Hawaiian Islands on his first mission, and presided, as I remember it, for somewhat over three years on his second mission. He doesn't appear to be present. Brother Blood, I believe, is at the University of Utah.

ELDER SYLVESTER Q. CANNON*Presiding Bishop of the Church*

I realize, my brethren and sisters, that the time is short and very precious this afternoon. I rejoice with you in the testimonies and instructions that we have received in this conference, because they are true and are for the welfare of all the people of the Church, and for all mankind. I rejoice in the fact that we are living in the dispensation which has been spoken about frequently in the sessions of this conference—the dispensation of the fulness of times, the last great dispensation of the gospel which the Lord has to give. This dispensation has been looked forward to in the past. The Apostle Paul foretold this time when the Lord should gather together in Christ all things that are in heaven and in the earth. It is the time preparatory to the coming again of the Savior—the Lord Jesus Christ—to reign this time upon the earth in peace and in glory. He came nineteen hundred years ago in humility and sorrow to accomplish the atoning work that was before him to do.

History repeats itself, we are told. It appears to me that there is a comparison between the dispensation of the meridian of time and this dispensation, in the sense that as the Savior had to have a forerunner at that time in the person of John the Baptist to prepare the way for his coming, in this dispensation there has come a forerunner; not one who should be able to prepare the way directly for the Savior and to see him upon the earth, but one who should prepare the way in the establishment of this dispensation, that the work might grow and the purposes of the Lord be accomplished in preparation for his great coming, when he shall come to reign during a thousand years. I rejoice that there has been restored in this dispensation that divine authority which the Prophet Joseph Smith received—that authority which had been lost from the earth for many hundred years. After the dispensation of the meridian of time, with the work which the apostles had carried on, the men and women who had accepted the gospel gradually apostatized from the truth, and the authority was lost. As the Prophet Isaiah declared, “The earth also is defiled under the inhabitants thereof; because they have transgressed the laws, changed the ordinance, broken the everlasting covenant.”

That was the condition which prevailed for centuries during the dark ages; and then came the beginning of the dawn during the renaissance and the reformation. Men began to look forward to a greater time when truth and the fulness of the gospel should come to the earth. I am reminded of a statement made about the year 1600 by a man who was the leader among the Puritans who came to America. It is said that John Robinson, the pastor of the pilgrims, an old man of great vision and piety, who was left behind when the pilgrims sailed for America, charged them when they left Holland, “If God reveal anything to us by any other instrument of his, be as ready to receive it as ever we were to receive any truth by his ministry," for he was very confident that the Lord had more truth and light yet to bring forth out of his holy word.

There were many such people who were looking forward to the time when the fulness of truth should be restored. And so when the gospel came and missionaries were sent out to various parts of the world, there were, such as in England, communities or congregations of people who were prepared to receive the truth in its fulness. I rejoice in the fact that this divine authority, the Priesthood of the Son of God, has been restored; whereby every man who is prepared and is worthy, who seeks to live in accordance with the principles of the gospel, may have the privilege of receiving this power and of laboring for the welfare of the Church, for the spread of the gospel, for the bringing together of all things in Christ, and for the accomplishment of his purposes.

I rejoice that we are possessed of this truth with regard to divine authority—which is very different from that which is called priesthood or ministry in the world—that the Lord has given to us opportunity whereby all men, as was the case in the previous dispensation, might be commissioned to labor for the welfare of others. I rejoice in the fact that from the time of the organization of this Church the leaders who have had the responsibility as watchmen upon the towers have declared the words and the will of the Lord and have warned the people, and that warning has been carried from them to others who bear the Priesthood, and through them to others, who have direct watchcare in the wards and branches; and thereby the people have been built up and strengthened and enabled to resist evil and temptation. If all the world would accept these truths, if all the world would accept the warnings with regard to the evils which do and which shall exist, and would accept wisdom and be willing to receive and to follow these instructions through the light that comes to them or that can come to them, the world would be very much better for it, and the time would be ripe much sooner for the coming of the Son of man.

The Lord can give unto us light only as we will receive it. Only as we open the windows and doors of our houses can the sunlight enter in and cleanse and strengthen and bring life and light to that house and overcome unhealthfulness. And so only as we open the windows and doors of our souls to the holy Spirit can truth enter in and strengthen and develop us and make us more healthy spiritually. This is the message which the authorities of this Church have had and have today to bring to the people everywhere, not only to the Latter-day Saints; primarily, of course, to them, but to all mankind: That if they will resist and overcome evil and temptation, if they will accept and obey this gospel, they shall grow in the knowledge of the truth, they shall develop those qualities that will make them better men and women, they shall increase in the spirit of love for their fellowmen, they shall enjoy true happiness, and be prepared to meet the Lord.

I pray that the Lord will help every one of us to sense our opportunities and to listen and render obedience to the instructions that come to us. They are for our welfare, not for the welfare of any other human being, but for us individually. Every commandment of the Lord is for our development and progress and growth. The Lord will hasten the time when we shall promote and develop the spirit whereby we shall be able to live as of one heart and of one mind. May that time soon come and may we cultivate unity and love and peace and joy, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

A solo, "My Redeemer and my Lord," was sung by Mrs. Joseph Haycock.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

THE LABORS OF PRESIDENT JAMES E. TALMAGE

I wish to say that we hear from time to time very favorable reports regarding the work being accomplished by Brother James E. Talmage as president of the European mission, and also as president of the British mission. He has succeeded in getting many communications into the papers in Great Britain, setting forth the faith of the Latter-day Saints, and he is accomplishing a very remarkable and splendid work while presiding in that far-off land. He has the constant faith and prayers of the Presidency, Apostles and Presiding Patriarch in their weekly meetings in the temple.

THE SAINTS REQUESTED TO APPLY SCRIPTURE

I desire to read the words of the Savior, which I would like the Latter-day Saints to apply to the teachings of the servants of the Lord who constitute the authorities of the Church of Jesus Christ, and who are promulgating his teachings and his sayings and calling people to repentance. I feel that these words should find lodgment in the hearts of those who have listened to the wonderful testimonies that have been borne:

"Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock:

"And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock.

"And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand:

"And the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon the house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it."

A BLESSING FOR PRIESTHOOD AND AUXILIARY WORKERS AND THE SAINTS

I desire to extend my blessing to all the men and the women who preside in all the stakes of Zion throughout the Church, in all the missions, in all the wards, in all the quorums of the priesthood and in all the auxiliary organizations. I am convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that there cannot be found in any part of the world men and women giving so unselfishly of their time, of their talents, and of the best that is in them, for the salvation of the souls of men. I am satisfied that there are no other people who are devoting so much of their time, of their money, of their thoughts, and of their very being for the advancement of God's work at home and abroad, as are the Latter-day Saints. And with all the power that God has given me, I desire to bless the men and the women who are thus giving their time and thought and are setting examples that are worthy of the imitation, not only of those over whom they preside, but of all men. Every man and woman who is laboring for the salvation of the souls of men and keeping the commandments of God is entitled to be blessed, and I pray God that his blessings may come to them.

I rejoice in the remarkable and splendid testimonies that have been borne, during our conference, under the inspiration and by the light and power of God, and I pray that these testimonies may find lodgment in the hearts of the people, and that they will remember that those who obey the Lord and keep his commandments are building their house upon a rock, and those who fail to do this are building their house upon the sand.

May the God of heaven bless us and be and abide with us until we meet again in six months from now in general conference, is my prayer, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Savior. Amen.

The congregation sang, "The time is far spent," and the benediction was pronounced by Elder E. Frank Birch, president of the Tintic stake of Zion.

The conference adjourned for six months.

Professor Anthony C. Lund conducted the singing, assisted by B. Cecil Gates; accompaniments and interludes on the great organ were played by Edward P. Kimball, Tracy Y. Cannon, Alexander Schreiner and Frank W. Asper. Stenographic reports were made in the Tabernacle by Frank W. Otterstrom, assisted by Joseph Anderson, and in the Assembly Hall by Frederick G. Barker.

WHENCE THIS GOSPEL WE TEACH?

Read:

“Restoration of the Gospel”

By OSBORNE J. P. WIDTSOE

“This book prepared by Elder Osborne J. P. Widtsoe, dealing with the important subject of the Restoration of the everlasting Gospel, should be read and its contents carefully considered by those who are seeking after truth. It treats the Restoration clearly, and places before the people many things that have not been generally considered heretofore. It will be a means of strengthening the faith of the youth of Israel and will impart information that is invaluable. May the spirit of truth accompany the work and rest upon all those who diligently read it with a desire to learn of and profit by the Restoration of the Gospel!”

Discourses of Brigham Young

This Great Book Should be in Every Home Library

No Latter-day Saint home library is complete without the unique volume, "Discourses of Brigham Young." Thousands still living were thrilled with the inspired wisdom of the great colonizer. They heard the words fall from his lips that were a comfort and a guide to them in their daily living.

Those same words, now in print, can help and inspire the new generations. The youth should be encouraged to read this great book. It will help them to know Brigham Young as they have never known him before. They can appraise his doctrine, not by tradition or garbled account, but by the perusal of sermons accurately transcribed.

"Discourses of Brigham Young" will be sent to any address for $2.50 postpaid. Special price to members of Priesthood Quorums—$2.00 postpaid. Orders will be filled mail C. O. D. at $2.00 each, if desired.

WHAT DID JOSEPH SMITH KNOW ABOUT SCIENCE?

Read:

Joseph Smith as Scientist

By JOHN A. WIDTSOE

"In the life of every person, who receives a higher education, in or out of schools, there is a time when there seems to be opposition between science and religion; between man-made and God-made knowledge. The struggle for reconciliation between the contending forces is not an easy one. It cuts deep into the soul and usually leaves scars that ache while life endures. There are thousands of young people in the Church today, and hundreds of thousands throughout the world, who are struggling to set themselves right with the God above and the world about them. It is for these young people, primarily, that this book has been written."

Ninety-Seventh Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

FIRST DAY

MORNING MEETING

The Ninety-seventh Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints opened in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah, on Sunday morning at 10 o'clock, April 3, 1927.

President Heber J. Grant presided.

Every seat in the main hall, galleries and choir stand about the great organ was occupied, and many hundreds were standing in the aisles. There was also a crowded house in the Assembly Hall, where an overflow meeting was conducted by Elder J. Golden Kimball, of the First Council of Seventy. Many were unable to gain entrance into either building, but assembled at the Bureau of Information building and listened to the Tabernacle services as they came over the radio.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES OF THE CHURCH PRESENT

Of the First Presidency: Heber J. Grant, Anthony W. Ivins and Charles W. Nibley.

Of the Council of the Twelve: Rudger Clawson,* George Albert Smith, George F. Richards, Orson F. Whitney, David O. McKay, Joseph Fielding Smith,† Stephen L. Richards, Richard R. Lyman, Melvin J. Ballard, John A. Widtsoe.

Presiding Patriarch.‡

Of the First Council of Seventy: B. H. Roberts, J. Golden Kimball, Rulon S. Wells,§ Charles H. Hart, Levi Edgar Young, Rey L. Pratt.

Of the Presiding Bishopric: Sylvester Q. Cannon, David A. Smith, John Wells.

OFFICERS AND OTHER AUTHORITIES PRESENT

Church Historian and Recorder: Joseph Fielding Smith and the following assistants: Andrew Jenson, Brigham H. Roberts, A. William Lund, Junius F. Wells.

*Reed Smoot absent, owing to serious illness of his wife.

†James E. Talmage absent, presiding over the European mission.

‡Hyrum G. Smith absent, on account of illness.

§Joseph W. McMurrin absent, owing to serious illness of his daughter.

Presidents of stakes with their counselors were well represented from the ninety-six stakes of Zion.

The Priesthood Quorums, including the high priests, seventies and elders, and bishops and their counselors, from all parts of the Church, were in attendance; officers of the auxiliary organizations both of men and of women were present, and also members of the Board of Education.

Mission Presidents were in attendance, as follow: Henry H. Rolapp, Eastern States; John H. Taylor, Northern States; Samuel O. Bennion, Central States; John M. Knight, Western States; Wm. R. Sloan, Northwestern States; Chas. H. Hart, Canada; John G. Allred, Northcentral States; Charles A. Callis, Southern States; Rey L. Pratt, Mexico; Benjamin Goddard, Bureau of Information, Temple Block, Salt Lake City, Utah.

The choir sang, "Praise to the man who communed with Jehovah."

Elder Peter G. Johnston, of the Church Auditing Committee, offered the opening prayer.

The choir sang the anthem, "They that sow in tears."

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

It has been customary at the April Conferences to make announcements and to read some statistics. We regret the absence of Elder Reed Smoot, of the Council of the Twelve. I have a telegram from him reading as follows:

TELEGRAM FROM ELDER REED SMOOT

"I send greetings to the Saints assembled at the General Conference. Alie's serious sickness, only thing that prevents my presence. Blessings of God is the only power that can save her. I would appreciate the faith and prayers of the people assembled, asking our heavenly Father to grant, if it is his will, that she be given further life, with renewed health and strength."

REED SMOOT.

OTHER AUTHORITIES ABSENT

The Presiding Patriarch is absent on account of ill health.

As you all know, Elder James E. Talmage, of the Council of the Twelve, is presiding over the European mission, and cannot, therefore, be with us. I regret, on account of the serious illness of a daughter of Brother Joseph W. McMurrin, of the First Council of Seventy, that he also is absent. All the others of the General Authorities of the Church are in attendance today.

CHANGES AND RELEASES

There has been a change in the presidency of the Lethbridge stake, President Hugh B. Brown being honorably released, and Asael E. Palmer appointed president; a change also in the Maricopa stake, J. W.

Lesueur being honorably released and James Robert Price being sustained as president.

Changes and releases in the mission field: John H. Anderson has been released as president of the Swedish mission, and Andrew Johnson appointed to succeed him.

Ernest LeRoy Butler has been released as president of the Samoan mission, and Willard L. Smith appointed as president.

Brigham S. Young has been released as president of the Northwestern States mission and William R. Sloan appointed as his successor.

Joseph Quinney, Jr., has been released as president of the Canadian mission, and Charles H. Hart appointed as his successor.

Brigham H. Roberts has been released as president of the Eastern States mission, and Henry H. Rolapp appointed as his successor.

New wards have been organized: Kimball ward, St. Joseph stake; Cedar Third ward, Parowan stake; Manila ward, Lyman stake; Lankershim ward, Los Angeles stake; Littlefield ward, Moapa stake; Ogden Twentieth ward, Ogden stake; and the Graham and Hibbard wards in the St. Joseph stake have been combined.

We mourn the loss of the following bishops since our last meeting: John A. Hunt of St. Charles ward, Bear Lake stake; Edgar O. Nielson of Cleveland ward, Bannock stake; Edwin Olpin of Pleasant Grove First ward, Alpine stake, and John J. Burgner of Darby ward, Teton stake.

FINANCIAL STATEMENT

Following is a list of expenditures from the tithes of the Church for the year 1926:

Charities—For the care of the worthy poor and other charitable purposes, including hospital treatment, $187,570.43.

Missions—For the maintenance and operation of all the missions, and for the erection of places of worship and other buildings in the missions, $738,737.75. Total $3,616,862.65.

Other Charities—In addition to charities paid from the tithes, as before named, there have also been disbursed the Fast Offerings, other charities and assistance rendered by the Relief Society, in the sum of $436,055.44, which amount, added to the $187,570.43 paid from the tithes, makes the total charity assistance rendered by the Church, $623,625.87.

There were transferred from the California mission, at the time of the organization of the Los Angeles stake of Zion, the Adams ward chapel and other chapels to the value of $200,000. The California mission at the present time owns chapels of a value of over $400,000. The chapel at Oakland is as fine a chapel, and holds about as many people, as any of our ward chapels in the stakes of Zion. It has been decided to organize another stake of Zion in Northern California, with San Francisco, Oakland and surrounding country to compose that stake.

There have been collected by the various wards of the Church and paid to missionaries, to assist in their maintenance, $128,299.65.

REPORT OF THE AUDITING COMMITTEE

"President Heber J. Grant and Counselors, Building.

"Dear Brethren: As the Church Auditing Committee, we have to report that the accounting of the Church, as shown by the records in the First Presidency's office and in the office of the Presiding Bishopric, is all that could be desired. The receipts and disbursements, the revenues and expenses of the Church are so carefully and accurately kept that the present worth or financial status of the Church is clearly shown. The affairs of the Church are wisely administered, and the present showing is excellent. It is gratifying to know that the credit of the Church comes under the very highest rating, but it is still more gratifying to know that the Church is under no necessity at present to use its credit in the commercial world by borrowing money.

The Assistant Historian of the Church, Elder Andrew Jensen, has handed me a compilation of the missionaries that have been in the field from the year 1830 until 1926. The lowest number is 16 missionaries, the first year of the Church. The highest number sent out in any year is 1,313, in 1925; 1,235 in 1926, and 1,211 in 1919. The total is between 35,000 and 40,000 missionaries that have been sent into the field.

REPORTS FROM THE MISSIONS

Speaking of the missions, I will read some few requests from a number of mission presidents:

The Northcentral States: "We shall be losing about twenty missionaries in the next twenty days, which will bring us down to about fifty-seven. Our greatest need, therefore, is more missionaries."

Central States: "We need long-term missionaries more than anything else right at the present time."

California mission: "We are parting with short-term missionaries almost daily, and need fifty elders and twenty-five lady missionaries to care properly for the districts that are open. More missionaries will be released during the next three months than the foregoing number."

Australian mission: "In this report we have four fewer missionaries than a year ago, and in February we have nine who will leave this mission, and unless we receive recruits very fast we will be very short-handed by the first of March."

German-Austrian mission: "Our work is going forward by leaps and bounds. We are needing four or five elders each month in order to hold our present field. We should be opening new fields."

Danish mission: "Elders are needed as we will soon be seriously handicapped on account of so many who will receive releases to return home."

Swedish mission: "During the coming month there will be about five other elders released. We would appreciate receiving more brethren, especially those who understand Swedish; or better still if they can speak it."

The French and Swiss-German missions also make the same appeal.

(At this point President B. H. Roberts remarked: "I wish to join the chorus in behalf of the Eastern States mission.")

I might say that the chorus will be unanimous, for I do not believe there is a single mission that has not made appeals, but I have just put down a few to read here this afternoon.

(President B. H. Roberts: "President Grant, remember our great population in proportion to our number.")

I find that each and every mission president is thoroughly converted that he needs more missionaries than the others.

There is another thing that I rejoice in, above everything else in our missionary work, and that is, all the missionaries are thoroughly convinced that their mission president is the finest of all the mission presidents, and that their mission is the best, although it may be in far-off Australia, or any other place. The outpouring of the Spirit of the Lord upon our missionaries is such that they rejoice and are happy in their labors.

VISITS SINCE LAST CONFERENCE

Since our last conference it has fallen to my lot to be actively engaged in visiting some of the stakes of Zion. I have visited the Big Horn section of the country and other sections of Wyoming and Montana. I also visited some of the wards in the San Luis valley, dedicating a small chapel in Wyoming and one in Denver, Colorado. I visited the St. Joseph, Maricopa and Los Angeles stakes, and some of the stakes in Utah, holding meetings with the Saints in Arizona and dedicating two chapels there and four in the Los Angeles stake. I have had the pleasure of holding meetings with the Saints and missionaries in Omaha and Lincoln, Nebraska; Rock Springs and Green River, Wyoming. This was the first time that I have had the pleasure of being at Lincoln, the capital of Nebraska, or at Green River and Rock Springs. In addition I have visited a number of the wards in the different stakes here in Utah, dedicating chapels, during the last six months.

FAVORABLE ATTITUDE TOWARDS THE CHURCH

There is a most wonderful change in the attitude of the people of the world towards the Latter-day Saints. I find no difficulty whatever in getting publicity in the various papers; and when I travel, in different cities in the east and west, the north or the south, those who have interviewed me have given correct reports of the interviews. Brother James E. Talmage is also getting splendid publicity in the European papers. He has extensive notices and there seems to be no prejudice in the press of Great Britain at the present time.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE FORMER ATTITUDE IN ENGLAND

When I was in Europe, as the president of the European mission, during the entire three years that I was there, they published no article that we presented, and no report of a favorable nature was ever published in any of the papers. I call to mind visiting one of the great London papers that had published from seven to ten columns of the vilest statements regarding the Latter-day Saints. I took with me a letter of introduction from the manager of the shipping house in Liverpool with which we had done business for over 60 years, vouching for the integrity, not only of myself but of all my predecessors as the presidents of the European mission of the Church. The editors of this paper positively refused to make any refutation of the slanderous articles they had published, or to publish a single thing that I wrote, announcing that they thought they had published exactly what they ought about the "Mormon" people. I told them that I defied them to find a man that had written any of those articles who could furnish them with a certificate of character, but that I carried with me a certificate of my integrity and honesty, signed by all the non-"Mormon" bankers in Salt Lake City at that time; that I also had letters from bankers and in-fluent business men from New York to San Francisco; that I did not carry with me any recommendation from "Mormon" institutions or from "Mormons." Had I done so, I told the editor, it would be like writing a letter myself: "To Whom It May Concern: The bearer, Heber J. Grant, is honorable. Respectfully, Heber J. Grant." He said, "Never mind your opinion, Mr. Grant, we will not publish anything regarding your people." I happened to remember that the gentleman's name was Robinson. As I reached the door and put on my two-story hat—which it is necessary to wear in Europe, if you are considered anybody—I turned around, took it off and said:

"I understand that your name is Robinson, that the editor-in-chief, to whom my letter is written, is out of the city." He said: "Yes, that is right." "Are you acquainted with Phil Robinson?" "Yes." "Would you believe anything and everything that Phil Robinson says about the 'Mormons?'" He said: "I certainly would." I said: "Was he the correspondent of the London Daily Telegraph, one of the two greatest—and I emphasized 'greatest' because his paper was not one of the two—in London?" He said: "He was." "And you would believe everything he wrote?" "I would." "Buy his book entitled Sinners and Saints and you will find that everything you have published about the 'Mormons' is a lie, pure and simple. If you can't afford two shillings, I will buy the book and present it to you with my compliments." He said: "You astonish me." I said: "You are not the first man who has been astonished when confronted with the truth regarding the 'Mormon' people. I have met your kind from Tokyo, Japan, to London, who have refused to publish the truth about the 'Mormons.'" He said, "Write a half column." I said, "Thanks for small favors, large ones received with greater thanks. Seven to ten columns of falsehoods written against our people, and a half column allowed for refutation!" Within a couple of hours he had the half column. He kept it the usual 30 or 60 days and returned it with the usual printed slip that I have seen many times: "The Editor regrets that he cannot find space for the enclosed manuscript, and it is returned." When I see those "regrets" I cannot but think of the saying: "Polite lying is an accomplishment. It lubricates business, varnishes unpleasant facts, and promotes friendships."

TRIBUTES PAID TO THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS

Since that time there have been thousands of splendid tributes paid to the Latter-day Saints. I have before me one which was written. I think, seven years ago this coming June. I have never heard it quoted in this Tabernacle, so I am going to read it. It is from Franklin K. Lane, secretary of the interior, as I remember, under President Wilson:

"Cross the border you come down into Utah.

"Never speak disrespectfully of the 'Mormon' Church. It has as law-abiding, steady, hard-working, kindly a group of people in Utah as will be found anywhere this round globe over. Brigham Young may not have been a prophet of Almighty God, but he worked a miracle when he crossed from the Missouri river over that desert, leading his band of a few hundred followers with their pushcarts, going out into that unknown waste, and turned the land that lies around Salt Lake City into a garden.

"I brought from Egypt, several years ago, the greatest irrigation expert in the world, perhaps, the man who built the Assuan Dam upon the Nile—Sir William Willcocks, the man who claims to have discovered where the Garden of Eden was located, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates rivers—and I sent him to look over the irrigation enterprises of the United States, and he said: 'Nowhere else have I seen people who understand so wisely how to apply water to land as around Salt Lake City.'

"Utah has wonderful beauty in it as well as great stretches of desert that are to be reclaimed. We have just discovered a new beauty spot there, Bryce canyon."

And many of them are just discovering Cedar Breaks, Zion canyon and the north rim of the Grand canyon, also.

As I stated before, I say again, I rejoice in the change of sentiment of the press of Great Britain, the splendid fruits that are attending President James E. Talmage in getting publicity in the newspapers.

MONUMENT TO THE THREE WITNESSES DEDICATED

I had the pleasure here, yesterday, of dedicating a little monument to the memory of the Three Witnesses of the Book of Mormon.

THOUSANDS IN ALL PARTS HAVE A TESTIMONY

I rejoice that there are thousands and tens of thousands of people from the country of the midnight sun, Scandinavia, to South Africa, from Canada to South America, and upon the islands of the sea, reaching clear out to New Zealand and Australia, who can testify that God has seen fit to answer their earnest prayers and has given to them, as is promised here in the Book of Mormon, a testimony regarding this remarkable and wonderful record. I read the words of Moroni:

"Now I, Moroni, write somewhat as seemeth me good; and I write unto my brethren, the Lamanites; and I would that they should know that more than four hundred and twenty years have passed away since the sign was given of the coming of Christ.

"And I seal up these records, after I have spoken a few words by way of exhortation unto you.

"Behold, I would exhort you that when ye shall read these things, if it be wisdom in God that ye should read them, that ye would remember how merciful the Lord hath been unto the children of men, from the creation of Adam even down until the time that ye shall receive these things, and ponder it in your hearts.

"And when ye shall receive these things, I would exhort you that ye would ask God, the Eternal Father, in the name of Christ, if these things are not true; and if ye shall ask with a sincere heart, with real intent, having faith in Christ, he will manifest the truth of it unto you, by the power of the Holy Ghost.

"And by the power of the Holy Ghost ye may know the truth of all things.

"And whatsoever thing is good is just and true; wherefore, nothing that is good denieth the Christ, but acknowledgeth that he is."

CHRIST IS DENIED BY MANY

The Christ is denied today by hundreds of thousands of people. Many of the men who are teaching in our great universities are denying that Christ was the son of God. Many men who are teaching from the pulpit do not acknowledge that Jesus Christ was in very deed the Son of the Living God, the Redeemer of the World, coming to the earth with a definite mission.

While in Europe I purchased a book by Senator Albert J. Beveridge entitled The Young Man and the World. One of his chapters was devoted to the young man preparing for the ministry. He said:

"Any man who assumes to teach the Christian faith, who, in his own secret heart questions that faith, commits a sacrilege every time he enters the pulpit.

"He is like the chemist's grain of wheat, perfect in all its constituent elements except the mysterious spark of life, without which the wheat grain will not grow.

"If, then, you do not believe what you say, and believe it with all your soul, believe it in your heart of hearts, do not try to get other men to believe it. You will not be honest if you do. The world expects you to be sure of yourself. How do you expect to make other people sure of themselves if you are not sure of yourself?

"I would rather be sure that when a man dies he will live again with his conscious identity, than to have all the wealth of the United States, or to occupy any position of honor or power the world could possibly give," said a man whose name is known to the railroad world as one of the ablest transportation men in the United States. * * *

"A few years ago a certain man with good opportunities for the investigation and a probability of sincere answers, asked every young preacher whom he met during a summer vacation these questions:

"First: Yes or no; do you believe in God, the Father; God a person, God a definite and tangible intelligence—not a congeries of laws floating like a fog through the universe; but God, a person in whose image you were made? Don't argue; don't explain; but is your mind in a condition where you can answer yes or no?"

"Not a man answered 'Yes.' Each man wanted to explain that the Deity might be a definite intelligence or might not; that the 'latest thought' was much confused upon the matter, and so forth and so on.

"Second: Yes or no; do you believe that Christ was the Son of the living God, sent by him to save the world? I am not asking whether you believe that he was inspired in the sense that the great moral teachers are inspired—nobody has any difficulty about that. But do you believe that Christ was God's very Son, with a divinely appointed and definite mission, dying on the cross and raised from the dead—yes or no?"

"Again not a single answer with an unequivocal, earnest 'Yes.' But again explanations were offered and in at least half the instances the sum of most of the answers was that Christ was the most perfect man that the world had seen and humanity's greatest moral teacher."

I maintain that Christ could not have been humanity's greatest moral teacher unless he was in very deed the Son of God, because he announced that he was the Son of God, that he was the express image of his Father, and that those who had seen him had in very deed seen the Father; therefore if the foundation of his structure were false, he could not be a great moral teacher.

"Third. Do you believe that when you die you will live again as a conscious intelligence, knowing who you are and who other people are?"

"Again not one answer was unconditionally affirmative. 'Of course, they were not sure as a matter of knowledge.' 'Of course, that could not be known definitely.' 'On the whole, they were inclined to think so, but there were very stubborn objections,' and so forth and so on.

"The men to whom these questions were put were particularly high-grade ministers. One of them had already won a distinguished reputation in New York and the New England states for his eloquence and piety. Every one of them had had unusual success with fashionable congregations.

"But every one of them had noted an absence of real influence upon the hearts of their hearers, and all thought that this same condition is spreading throughout the modern pulpit.

"Yet not one of them suspected that the profound cause of what they called 'the decay of faith,' was not in the world of men and women, but in themselves. How could such priests of ice warm the souls of men? How could such apostles of interrogation convert a world?"

THE TESTIMONY OF THE SAINTS

I rejoice that every Latter-day Saint living can answer without a moment's hesitation all three of those questions, "Yes, yes, yes." The very foundation of the Church rests upon the fact that a boy not yet 15 years of age saw God himself, a glorified man, beyond the power of any individual to describe, and that God introduced Jesus Christ to this boy. The very foundation of the Church rests upon the further fact that the man who baptized the Savior of the world, John the Baptist, laid his hands upon the heads of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery and ordained them to the Aaronic Priesthood, with the authority to baptize each other and commanding them to do so; that Peter, James and John, the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ, laid their hands upon the heads of these men and ordained them to the apostleship, giving to them the power to proclaim the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ and build up his Church in the world.

There is no Latter-day Saint that would deny the vision in the Doctrine and Covenants which I have quoted time and time again, and perhaps did so at our last conference, stating:

"And now, after the many testimonies which have been given of him, this is the testimony, last of all, which we give of him: That he lives!

"For we saw him, even on the right hand of God; and we heard the voice bearing record that he is the Only Begotten of the Father—

"That by him, and through him, and of him, the worlds are and were created, and the inhabitants thereof are begotten sons and daughters unto God."

MARRIAGE FOR TIME AND ETERNITY

I rejoice in the fact that every man and every woman married in the temples of the Lord are married for time and for all eternity. What an absurdity for us to believe in a ceremony uniting our wives to us for eternity if there were no existence beyond the grave.

The Church is also founded upon the fact that Moroni came and delivered the plates to Joseph Smith. We have no doubt as to the individuality of Moroni who delivered these plates.

AN ILLUSTRATION, WITH TESTIMONY AND COMMENTS THEREON

It seems that there are others who lack faith in addition to those that I have referred to in my quotation from Senator Beveridge's book.

Away back in 1910, January 31, Reverend T. H. Martin made some very remarkable confessions that were published in the Anaconda Standard. A man challenged me, after I had read these statements and commented upon them, and said I would get myself into trouble because it was only a lot of "Mormon" lies; that no minister ever delivered such a sermon, and he warned me to stop or I would get into trouble. The warning, however, did not take root nor yield any fruit. The next time that I spoke he asked me if I had seen the Anaconda Standard. I told him no, but inasmuch as I gave the exact date that it appeared, it was up to him to bring an Anaconda Standard and to come and show me that it was not in it. The very next time that I saw fit to preach upon this subject was in the North Sanpete stake of Zion. After my sermon Elder Barrus Cox came to me, and said:

"Brother Grant, I am the identical elder who sent that Anaconda Standard to the Liahona, from which they published extracts. I have an extra copy. Would you like it?"

I told him I needed it in my business, and he gave it to me; so I have read this sermon with my own eyes in the Anaconda Standard. Reverend Martin said:

"For a long time the following questions have been uppermost in my mind: "Is the church anything but a mere social organization? Is the Christianity of today the true doctrine of the Christ of the Bible? Has the so-called Christianity of today anything in it that ought to attract more than any other creed that is supposed to help humanity? Is not the church of today being boycotted and that justly?"

"I know that such interrogations will not be very savory to many people, but knowing something concerning the church from top to bottom, and as I fear God, and would rather be true than be esteemed, I fearlessly propound them. * * * But with all of this I maintain that the Christianity of the present is face to face with a lamentable loss. The Christianity of today has acquired much, but in its getting it has lost its own soul, it has lost the Holy Ghost."

I declare in all soberness that all over the wide world wherever the gospel of Jesus Christ has gone, (the gospel revealed to us through the Prophet of the living God, Joseph Smith), the Holy Ghost has been bestowed upon men and women by the hundreds and thousands, if not tens of thousands, and they are willing to testify to their knowledge regarding the divinity of this work and to bear witness that God has, by the revelations of the Holy Ghost to them, given them a testimony of the divinity of this work, also a testimony of the divine mission of Joseph Smith and the divinity of the Book of Mormon.

"No true man will dare to refute this argument, for go where you may in Christendom today you will find that our religion is void of the supernatural element which the Bible claims it must have in order to exist."

Go all over the wide world, wherever you will today, and you will find that the supernatural element does exist in the Church of Christ.

"The commission to the early Christian teachers was that they must be imbued with power from on high and then go and baptize all nations in the name of the Holy Ghost, and that power was always manifested when they performed the deed."

And that power has been manifested among the Latter-day Saints all over the world.

"The Christian religion of the present is merely a social code and has nothing in it whereby it could claim a divine origin. It is truly pitiable to behold the church religion of today trying to save this sinful world.

"We have lost our magnet. The Christ who said he would draw all men to him if he is lifted up is disobeyed and ignored in the multiplicity of our present church life. Since we have presented many substitutes to the world for genuine spiritual power, but they are of no more value in the saving of the sinner than an artificial heart would be in pumping blood through the arteries. We are like men trying to run an engine without steam.

"The church of today is the church of man, not the church of God. I predict its crashing to pieces like a ship on the rocks before a heavy sea, in the near-by years, unless there is a mighty turning to God in our ranks."

I announce to all the world that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is in very deed the Church of God, and that there are thousands and tens of thousands who have been given this knowledge just as absolutely and as perfectly as I have it.

"We have a great, educated, school-made ministry, but an unconverted ministry."

We have a great converted ministry. I remember on one occasion preaching in Phoenix, with the late President John Henry Smith. The legislature was in session at the time. They called upon us at the hotel and asked if we would condescend to preach, stating that they had rented the opera house and would crowd it to overflowing. As we were in the habit of renting our own houses and generally failing to get an audience we very kindly condescended. They fulfilled their pledge. The house was crowded to overflowing. Some of the good people came from Mesa, about twenty miles away. After the meeting one of the Saints told me that a man in front of her, turned to his friend, and, with the word "damn," that some people claim is only emphasis and not swearing, said with emphasis, "That man is an earnest talker." Pretty soon he said, with emphasis, again: "That man is a good talker." Pretty soon he said, with double emphasis: "That man believes every word he is saying."

TESTIMONY OF A MINER

On another occasion I remember being with Elder John Henry Smith and Charles W. Penrose in Park City. The opera house was filled to overflowing, and men were standing up. Someone afterwards told one of our brethren that he heard a man sixteen hundred feet under the earth, one of the miners, turn to his friend and say: "Did you hear those three 'Mormons' preach?" "Yes." "What did you think of it?" "Oh, I did not pay much attention." "Well, I want to say to you, away down here sixteen hundred feet in the earth, that what those men said rings in my ears. They said, each one of them, they knew that God lives, they knew that Jesus is the Christ, the Redeemer of the world, the Son of God. They said they knew that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. I have been dropping into their meetings occasionally since then. They have a little bit of a rented hall but they have decided to organize a ward here instead of a branch and to build a meeting house, and I have sent ten dollars in an envelope 'from an unknown friend.' There were no if's, no and's, no but's, about what those men said. It was an absolute, direct declaration of their faith."

KNOWLEDGE COUNTS IN TESTIMONY

I remember one occasion when a professor, who was studying in Berlin in preparation for his doctor's degree, said to my daughter, who was there studying the German language, that it was a shame the way the three young elders murdered the German language, and how poorly they had explained our faith. He said that he had read a hundred tracts about our faith and all our Church books, and he would be very glad to stand up and deliver a lecture of an hour on the faith of the Latter-day Saints and make a fair explanation of it. I was very glad that my young daughter gave him to understand that he did not know that God lives, that Jesus is the Christ, or that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God, and she would prefer to have those young boys who murdered the German language declare those three things, than to have somebody explain that which he thought was the faith of somebody else.

It is knowledge that counts. I have had as high as twenty missionaries arrive at once in the Liverpool office, scarcely one of whom had ever stood upon his feet to say a word about the gospel, and I have known the entire lot of them to run out of ideas in less than two hours, after I had told them that we sometimes held meetings for five hours, and that they would be permitted to speak as long as they desired. Those same elders, who did not deliver more than a half dozen sentences, have returned to the Liverpool office at the end of two years, and they have delivered clear-cut sermons, bearing testimony of the absolute knowledge that God had given them of the divinity of the work in which we as Latter-day Saints are engaged.

"We have a great host on our Church rolls, but they are, with but few exceptions, an unconverted host."

We have a converted host. It is very seldom indeed that any individual out in the world receives "Mormonism," the gospel of Jesus Christ, except with the opposition of family and friends and relatives. Very many young men have been turned out of their homes by their parents for embracing the gospel. I could give you incident after incident where young men and young women have been cast out as a thing of evil, by their own parents, for embracing "Mormonism." It is not popular. It has never been popular, and nothing short of an absolute conversion in the hearts of men and women would lead them to embrace the gospel of Jesus Christ.

"There are periods in the Christian era we look back upon with wonder and admiration. In those days men were convicted of sin and a judgment to come."

In our day men are convicted of sin and a judgment to come, and all over the world where that conviction comes into their minds they go down into the waters of baptism for the remission of their sins and they do receive the Holy Ghost.

"Then the more than human element was visible in our creeds."

The more than human element is visible today in the Church of Christ all over the world.

"Holy men had heavenly visions."

Holy men and holy women have had heavenly visions by the hundreds and the thousands in our Church.

TESTIMONY OF HEALING

"Sickness was cured by spiritual power."

I could stand here and relate to you by the hour instances where sickness has been cured by spiritual power in this Church of Christ, where men and women and children who have been given up to die have been healed by the power of Almighty God. I spoke here of Brother Joseph W. McMurrin being among those who are absent. Brother McMurrin was shot clear through his vitals, and the bullets lodged right under the skin on his back. I heard John Henry Smith promise that man, when blessing him, by the authority of the apostleship of the living God, that he should live and not die, as he had received these wounds while guarding the servants of the living God, and that there should be left upon his body no physical weakness because of these terrible wounds that he had received. I have it from the lips of Brother McMurrin himself that he has never felt any physical weakness because of these wounds.

While relating this incident in the Farmers' ward, upon one occasion, Stanley Taylor, the one-armed hackman, arose and said: "Brother Grant, it was in my hack that Brother McMurrin was picked up and carried to his home. I heard the doctors say: 'Take his dying statement, because no man ever lived who was in such a condition.' But he did live. Right at that identical time a man was shot in this city, with one bullet through him, exactly where the two went through Brother McMurrin, and he died on time.

The very last time that I had the pleasure of conversing with President Joseph F. Smith, except the night before he died, he said:

"Heber, I never saw you looking better. I recall that as I was in the hospital when you were operated upon, the chief surgeon, Dr. Allen Fowler, turned to me and said: 'Mr. Smith you don't need to discuss the possibility or the probability of this man living. He has to die. It would be a miracle if he were restored to health, and this is not the day of miracles.'"

I give to the Lord Almighty the credit and the glory, for it is by his power that I am here today. There were nine doctors present when I was operated upon, and eight of them said I had to die. The nurse told me this the day I was leaving the hospital. I said: "I have no desire to meet the eight, but I would like to meet the ninth, the one who said I would live." I asked him why he disagreed with all the other doctors. He was a southerner and he said: "Mr. Grant, I just took a chance, sir. I have felt the pulse of thousands of gentlemen in my life, but I never felt a pulse just like yours, sir. That heart of yours never missed one, single, solitary beat during the one hour and three-quarters, sir, that you were under the knife, and I said to myself: 'that heart will pull him through'; so I just took a chance."

ON OBSERVING THE WORD OF WISDOM—ANOTHER TESTIMONY

We have in our Doctrine and Covenants a revelation which says:

"There is a law, irrevocably decreed in heaven before the foundations of this world, upon which all blessings are predicated—

One of the laws of the Gospel of Jesus Christ is that each and every Latter-day Saint shall keep what is known as the Word of Wisdom; that we shall abstain from tea, coffee, tobacco and liquor. Had I not lived the Word of Wisdom, had my blood not been pure. I am convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt that I would not have been entitled to that wonderful promise contained in the Word of Wisdom, that those who obey this Word of Wisdom shall be blessed, and that the destroying angel shall pass them by as he did the children of Israel and not slay them. I am convinced that my heart would not have had pure blood, had I not fulfilled the law, and I would not be standing here before you today.

Upon one occasion when my brother, Joseph Hyrum Grant, (who in later years, presided over the Davis stake of Zion) was in charge of a livery stable in this city, a number of employes of the Z. C. M. I. shoe factory were enjoying an outing at Calder's Park, now known as Nibley Park. My brother who had charge of the transportation, called their attention to the fact that a storm was threatening, and he urged them to return home, stating that a part of the road between the park and Salt Lake City was a turnpike and there was danger of this long drag being overturned in a storm and in the darkness. But they passed a resolution that they would hold the firm blameless if any accident occurred.

Going home in the darkness the vehicle was overturned and several people were quite seriously injured. One of the girls had a number of bones broken and as a result of her injuries and exposure in the storm, pneumonia set in. The doctor in attendance declared that she could not live, and would probably die before morning. My brother felt very much distressed about the matter, having been the driver of the vehicle. He asked me to go with him to administer to that girl, stating that he had received the witness of the spirit that she should live.

When we stepped up to the bed, I told him that she was dying and would be dead before we could get our hands off her head. He turned deathly pale and declared that he had received a manifestation of the Lord, and that he knew, as he knew that the gospel is true, that if we would bless her she would live. We did bless her, and in confirming the anointing I was impressed to promise her that the bones should knit, that she should be made well and go back and run her machine in the Z. C. M. I. shoe factory. I did not know that she had been running a machine or what was her work. That evening I met the superintendent of that factory and he said: "I have just returned from the home of Marie DeGray, and she was dying. I am convinced she is dead by now." I said: "Brother Rowe, you go up into your office and sit down and write: 'Marie DeGray is not dead. Marie DeGray will not die, but she will get well and come back and run her machine in your factory.' It has been manifested to me by the spirit of the living God." He said: "I don't need to write it, because from what you say, I know that she will live."

STILL ANOTHER TESTIMONY OF THE HEALING POWER

He then related to me an incident which had occurred in his own family. Said he: "In London, before I came to this country, one of my daughters was very sick, and the attending physician said she could not live till morning." He sent, as I remember, three miles across the great city of London, for Junius F. Wells and his companion to come and administer to his daughter, and she was restored to health. "The next day," said Brother Rowe, "the doctor came to my home and handed me a written certificate, duly signed, stating that my daughter was dead. I invited him into the parlor and introduced him to the 'corpse.' So when you tell me that this girl will recover, I accept your statement, for I know that the healing power of God is in this Church, as well as I know that I live."

TESTIMONY OF THE GIFT OF TONGUES

"Holy men spoke with other tongues as the spirit gave them utterance."

Holy men and holy women have spoken with other tongues, as the spirit has given them utterance. One of our Articles of Faith reads:

"We believe in the gift of tongues," and in the interpretation thereof. Karl G. Maeser—than whom no more devoted Latter-day Saint ever lived—told me with his own lips of such an incident as I took a trip with him to Baker City. He said: "Brother Grant, the night that I was baptized I looked up into heaven and said: 'Oh, God, I have found, as I believe, the gospel of thy Son Jesus Christ. I have rendered obedience to it by going down into the waters of baptism. Give to me a manifestation, give to me an absolute witness of the spirit that I have found the truth, and I pledge to you if necessary my life for the advancement of this cause.'"

At that time Brother Franklin D. Richards was president of the European mission, with headquarters at Liverpool. He went over to Germany to be present at the baptism of the first converts to the gospel in that great empire. Walking from the place where he was baptized to his home, a distance of several miles, Brother Maeser expressed a desire to converse upon different principles of the gospel, through an interpreter. That interpreter was Brother William Budge, afterwards president of Bear Lake stake, and finally president of the Logan temple. Brother Maeser, who understood no English, asked questions in German, and Brother Richards, who understood no German, answered them in English; Brother Budge interpreting the questions and answers. After a few questions had been asked and answered through the interpreter, Brother Richards said: "Do not interpret those questions, I understand them;" then Brother Maeser said: "Do not interpret those answers, I understand them." They conversed for miles, the questions in German, the answers in English; neither man understanding the language of the other. They arrived at the River Elbe and while crossing the bridge they were separated; when they reached the other side Brother Maeser asked another question, and Brother Richards said: "Interpret it, Brother Budge." When the answer came, Brother Maeser said: "Interpret it." His next question was: "How was it, Apostle Richards, that we understood each other, and now we cannot understand?" Brother Richards told him that one of the fruits of the gospel of Jesus Christ was the gift of tongues and the interpretation. Then he said: "God has given to you and to me this night the privilege of partaking of one of the fruits of the gospel by having the interpretation of tongues. Brother Maeser, you have received a witness from God that you have found the truth."

Brother Maeser told me: "I trembled like a leaf, and I again raised my eyes to heaven and said: 'Oh, God, I have received the witness that I asked for, and I pledge to you my life, if need be, for this cause.'"

Every Latter-day Saint knows that Karl G. Maeser did give his life; that he labored without ceasing, without any thought of personal advancement, personal honor or credit, but he labored untiringly for the advancement of God's kingdom at home and abroad, as a missionary in his native land, and at the head of our great educational system.

TESTIMONY OF PROPHECY THROUGH THE GIFT OF TONGUES

When I was a child, in a Relief Society meeting, Eliza R. Snow, by the gift of tongues, and Zina D. Young, by the interpretation thereof, promised that child playing on the floor—in the home where Grandma Whitney, my mother, Eliza R. Snow, Zina D. Young, Clara Kimball and other leading Relief Society sisters in early days were meeting—that that child should grow to manhood and become an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ. My mother often said to me: "Heber, behave yourself, and you will some day be one of the apostles in the Church." I always laughed at her and said: "Get it out of your head. Every mother thinks her son will be the president of the United States or something wonderful. I have no ambitions in that regard."

When I was called to be one of the apostles she asked me if I remembered that meeting in the home of the late William C. Staines on the corner of South Temple and Fifth East. I told her I did. "Do you remember anything that was said?" I replied: "No." "Well," she said, "do you remember Aunt Eliza talking to you on the floor?" I said. "Yes, but I did not understand it."

"Of course, you did not, because she spoke by the gift of tongues." Then she said: "Do you remember anything that Aunt Zina said?" "Yes, I do, mother. I remember that she lifted her hand and said that I would become a great big man."

So when I became tall I used to think of it occasionally, that Aunt Zina said I would be a big man. My mother responded: "She said nothing of the kind; she said you would be a great big man in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, that you would be an apostle." That is why I have told you, knowing that the gift of tongues was in the Church.

I wish to say to you that my wife, who is dead, promised me, by the gift of tongues, that I should live to proclaim this gospel in many lands and in many climes, and after she passed away, and at a time when eight doctors out of nine said I had to die, I had not then proclaimed this gospel "in many lands and in many climes," but I recovered, and since then I have lifted up my voice in the far-off land of Japan, in the Hawaiian Islands, in England, Ireland, Scotland, Wales, Germany, France, Belgium, Holland, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Canada and Mexico, bearing witness that I know that God lives, that I know that Jesus is the Christ, that I know that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the true and the living God, and that every gift, every grace, every power that this man says should be in the true Church of Christ, is in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. We have the Pearl of Great Price, the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

That God may help me and you and every soul within the sound of my voice who has a testimony of the divinity of this Gospel of Christ so to live it that other men, seeing our devotion and seeing our integrity and our determination to live the lives of saints may be inspired to investigate the message that we have to bear to them, is my prayer, and I ask it in all humility, and in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Savior. Amen.

Solo, "Come ye blessed," was sung by Jessie Evans.

PRESIDENT ANTHONY W. IVINS

My heart is full of gratitude and praise to the Lord, my brethren and sisters, as I stand before this vast congregation and observe what President Nibley just called my attention to, that it is made up largely of men. As I think of it, it would appear almost unnecessary that I express the thoughts which I desired to present to you. I shall read first from the words of the Prophet Zechariah, as I wish to make his words the basis of the brief remarks that I expect to make.

SPEAK THE TRUTH

"These are the things that ye shall do; Speak ye every man the truth to his neighbor; execute the judgment of truth and peace in your gates:

"And let none of you imagine evil in your hearts against his neighbor; and love no false oath: for all these are things that I hate, saith the Lord." (Zechariah 8:16-17.)

THE CHURCH CRITICISED

It is now nearly one hundred years since the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ was effected. Three years hence and a century will have elapsed since that event occurred. From the time of its organization the Church, and those who make up its membership, have been misunderstood and misrepresented.

The Church has been referred to as an organization founded upon a pernicious superstition and delusion, and the man who was chosen to be the instrument in the hands of the Lord in the opening of the present gospel dispensation and organization of the Church, as either a wilful imposter or a deluded incompetent.

Those who have identified themselves with the Church, and make up its membership, have been accused of establishing a new form of religion, a religion founded upon Mosaic law, following the creed of Islam, rather than the gospel plan as it was taught by the Redeemer of the world. They have been ridiculed, abused and persecuted, in some instances unto death.

At this period in the history of the Church, after its doctrines have been before the world for a century, and its history and accomplishments are, or should be, well understood, it would be supposed that these criticisms and misrepresentations would have ceased, and it is obvious that where they are resorted to, it is the result either of inexcusable ignorance, or wilful desire to deceive those who are not well informed as to the truth, which in either case would be wrong, because no one is justified in sitting in judgment upon another where the merits of the case are not understood, and wilfully to misrepresent the truth is a very grave offense.

That the campaign of misrepresentation, ridicule and abuse, the methods to which people always resort, when reason and argument fail, is still being vigorously prosecuted is evidenced by the following to which I desire to call your attention. These clippings from which I am about to read are only a few from the many which I have collected during the past year.

AN EXAMPLE

"There are many signs," this speaker says, "having the appearance of being hopeful that the old 'Mormondom' known in the days of Brigham Young is crumbling and that a new system slightly nearer the Christian ideal is being built up. Many 'Mormons,' not of the old school, no longer regard Joseph Smith as a prophet with a mission from God, which Joseph Smith claimed, and many do not accept the present heads of the Church as called of God. The present leaders of the Church would not dare to represent themselves as the mouthpiece of God to the membership. Apostasy among the male portion of the membership is growing fast, and the Church would have been bankrupt seven years ago if it were not for the women and children who alone pay tithes."

The speaker held up to ridicule certain of the "Mormon" pioneers and made fun of what he deemed as the superstition of the "Mormon" doctrines. The alleged betrayal of women by "Mormons" was depicted as were methods which he declared existed early in Southern Utah history where the "Mormons" hurled Gentiles from the cliffs. The audience which listened to these remarks loudly applauded them.

A REPLY TO THE ACCUSATIONS

If these statements were true, my brethren and sisters, there might be some justification for the hope expressed by the minister who uttered them that the bulwarks of the Church are crumbling, that the time is coming, and is not far distant, when it will collapse, and the fond hopes of those who have opposed it from the beginning will be realized. But fortunately for the Church, and unfortunately for those who oppose it, this is not the case.

THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS A CHRISTIAN COMMUNITY

The inference that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is not a Christian organization is too absurd to require any extended comment. The foundation upon which the Church rests is faith in God the eternal Father, his Son Jesus Christ, and the Holy Ghost, which constitute the God-head. The Church teaches and its members testify that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, that by him the worlds were created, and that through the redemption wrought out, because of the atonement which he made, all mankind are redeemed from death, the penalty which was pronounced upon our father Adam because of transgression, and that through obedience to the doctrines which he taught we may be redeemed from personal sin. We bear witness to the world that there is no other name under heaven, nor is there any other means by which man can attain to glory, exaltation and eternal life except through the medium of Christ our Lord.

APOSTASY NOT GROWING

If apostasy is growing fast we are not aware of it, and the careful record which is kept of those who become members of the Church, and those who withdraw from it, would certainly provide this information were it true. It is true that not all who obey the gospel and identify themselves with the Church remain steadfast in the faith, and it has always been so, but there are fewer in number who go back to the world and its devious paths than in the early history of the Church. A net cast into the sea, the Savior says, gathers fish of all kinds, and the Church in this dispensation does not differ from the Primitive Church in that respect.

TITHES ARE PAID BY MEN AND WOMEN

If the statement that only women and children pay tithes, and but for them the Church would have been bankrupt seven years ago is true, the women and children are entitled to great credit, for it chanced just at the time that this statement was made that the tithes paid showed greater returns for the year than ever before in the history of the Church.

STRONG BELIEF IN THE DIVINE MISSION OF JOSEPH SMITH

If it is true, as stated, that the members of the Church no longer regard Joseph Smith as a prophet, with a message from God to the people of the world, and that the men who preside over the Church are no longer recognized as the mouthpiece of the Lord to the membership, then indeed are we without hope, for we are immediately reduced to the condition of these critics. The Lord has declared that where there is no revelation and prophecy the people perish.

Never before since the organization of the Church has there been such overwhelming proof of the divine calling of the prophet Joseph Smith, and the inspiration of his successors in office as at the present time, for the past century has not proved him, or them, to have been wrong, while it has added greatly to the evidence which existed at the time the Church was founded, both from a scriptural and historical point of view to prove that he was divinely called to do the work which he accomplished.

PROPHECIES ON THE LATTER-DAY DISPENSATION

During his personal ministry but few people accepted Jesus Christ as the Son of God and Redeemer of the world. Notwithstanding the fact that the Jewish people were looking forward to the coming of their Messiah, they rejected Christ, and have vainly looked forward for the coming of another since the time of his appearing. Another has not come, and will not come until he shall return to reign in power, majesty and dominion upon the earth. Then, and not until then, will Judah fully appreciate the error of his rejection.

Just as definitely as the prophets had foretold the coming of the Christ, and the work which he was to accomplish, the greatest accomplishment since the creation of man, for it involved the redemption of mankind from the fallen condition into which transgression had plunged them, so definitely did they foretell the coming of another epochal event, second only to the appearance of the Messiah himself.

The time of its accomplishment was at a period referred to as the latter days, a time when spiritual darkness would cover the earth, and gross darkness the minds of the people. A time when the laws of the gospel of Christ would be transgressed, the ordinances of his Church changed, and the everlasting covenant broken.

At this time, when these conditions prevailed, the Lord, just prior to his crucifixion, declared to his disciples that a light would break forth among those who sit in darkness, which light would be the fulness of his everlasting gospel, a light which the people of the world at large would not perceive, and from which they would turn because of the precepts of men.

John, the beloved disciple of our Lord, looking forward to that time, tells us that the opening of this greatest of all gospel dispensations, greatest because the Lord has said that in it he will gather all things together in one, and consummate his work, would be ushered in by an angel whom he saw flying through the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, to every nation, kindred, tongue and people.

While the primary purpose of this restoration was to prepare the world for the second coming of the Redeemer, and bring all people, Jew and Gentile, atheist, infidel and professed Christian, to recognition of Christ as the Redeemer of the world, and submission to his will, there were certain well defined purposes to be accomplished before this is to be consummated.

Scattered Israel is to be gathered and established in the land given to them to be an everlasting inheritance, in accordance with the promise made by the Lord to Abraham, and repeated to his sons Isaac and Jacob. The promise sealed upon the head of Joseph, the son of Jacob, when the latter sealed the heirship of that branch upon the head of Ephraim, and extended the promise which had already been made to the utmost bounds of the everlasting hills, a promise which is being fulfilled, as witnessed in the coming together of this great congregation, whose genealogy traces direct to Ephraim. Judah is to re-possess Palestine, the Promised Land of his fathers. The mountain of the Lord's house is to be established in the top of the mountains, and be exalted above the hills, and many people are to be gathered to it in order that they may be taught the way of the Lord, and learn to walk in his paths.

The prophet Isaiah, speaking of the House of Israel, says:

"Thou shalt be brought down, and shalt speak out of the ground, and thy speech shall be low out of the dust, and thy voice shall be, as of one that hath a familiar spirit, out of the ground, and thy speech shall whisper out of the dust.
* * * And the vision of all is become unto you as the words of a book that is sealed, which men deliver to one that is learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I cannot; for it is sealed:

"And the book is delivered to him that is not learned, saying, Read this, I pray thee: and he saith, I am not learned. Wherefore the Lord said, Forasmuch as this people draw near me with their mouth, and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their hearts far from me, and their fear toward me is taught by the precept of men:

"Therefore, behold, I will proceed to do a marvelous work among this people, even a marvelous work and a wonder: for the wisdom of their wise men shall perish, and the understanding of their prudent men shall be hid."

Referring to the same period the prophet Ezekiel says:

"Moreover, thou son of man, take thee one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: And join them one to another into one stick; and they shall become one in thine hand."

THE PROPHECIES FULFILLED

If the events, to which the scripture, to which I have referred, have not occurred, if Ephraim is not being gathered to the tops of the mountains, where they are being taught the way of the Lord that they may walk in his paths, if the Jews are not beginning to re-possess Palestine, the Promised land, if the house of Israel has not been brought down, and has spoken low out of the dust, with the voice of a familiar spirit, if an angel has not restored the everlasting gospel to be preached to all nations, if the record of Judah and of Ephraim have not come together for the purpose of uniting the entire Israelitish family, if these things have not occurred I say, then we must look to the future for their accomplishment, for they are the unchangeable decrees of the Lord, and his word never fails.

The Lord has said that the record which was delivered to Joseph Smith, and which was translated by him, and published to the world as the Book of Mormon, was the record of the stick of Ephraim. The Bible is the record of the hand-dealing of the Lord with the House of Judah. The two have been brought together to the confounding of false doctrine, both bearing witness, as they do, to the divine mission of Christ our Lord.

When the keys of the Lesser Priesthood were conferred upon Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, and later the Melchizedek Priesthood under the hands of Peter, James and John, the words of John the divine were fulfilled, for authority was restored to earth to preach the gospel in its fulness, and administer all of the ordinances of the Church.

OUR CLAIM, TESTIMONY AND APPEAL

The restored Church has never resorted to ridicule, abuse or misrepresentation. It has never persecuted any person because of his or her religious belief, nor any person because he had no religious convictions. It is true that its members have been drawn from other denominations, and from among people who were not professors of religion at all. We pray for all men who seek to do good, for it is a part of our creed that everything which is good, or induces men to do good cometh of God.

We do, however, claim the right to carry the message of the restored gospel to all men; it is our mission, as it was the mission of the disciples of Christ. Go ye into all the world, he said to his disciples, and preach the gospel to every creature, he that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned.

We bear testimony to all people that Joseph Smith was divinely called to the work which he accomplished. That he was not an imposter, but a chosen vessel of the Lord. That he did receive the plates which contained the record of the Book of Mormon, and translated them by the gift and power of God. We do not expect all people to accept the message which we bear, it would be contrary to prophecy if they did.

We do, however, appeal to those who differ from us to speak the truth, that honest men and women be not led astray by their sophistry and misrepresentations. Time will determine who is right, and we abide the verdict of the future for our vindication.

May the Lord our God keep us all in the path of truth, righteousness, and virtue, I humbly pray, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Telephone calls from various parts of the state report exceptionally fine radio reception this morning. Reports from Provo are to the effect that the lower floor of the Provo tabernacle is crowded and the people are hearing every word.

The Tabernacle choir sang, "The Inflammatus," Laurinda Brewerton, soloist.

The closing prayer was offered by Elder H. Melvin Rollins, president of the Lyman stake.

The conference adjourned until 2 p. m.

AFTERNOON MEETING

President Heber J. Grant, promptly at 2 o'clock p. m., announced that the choir and congregation would sing the hymn, "The Spirit of God like a fire is burning."

After the singing the invocation was offered by Elder James Robert Price, president of the Maricopa stake of Zion.

The choir sang the anthem, "Grant us peace."

PRESIDENT CHARLES W. NIBLEY

Here is a printed card of radio instructions which reads, The speaker is to speak in a conversational tone. He must not shout, he must not get too far away from this little microphone—"Little Mike," as they call it—and he must not strike the pulpit because this fellow objects to being jarred.

The thought occurred to me that probably in a short time instructions will be given advising the speaker not to speak too loud because the natives of Australia or the natives of Africa, listening in, haven't the same kind of ear-drums as ours, and you may hurt them.

Such may be the developments of science.

THE SAINTS BETTER UNDERSTOOD

I have been interested in the proceedings of this conference. I am delighted to see this magnificent audience, notwithstanding the rain storm. It takes more than rain to keep the Latter-day Saints from a conference. We have heard of those who criticize this work, and we have seen all through our lives the opposition that has been manifested to it. This opposition, however, is being overcome by the gradual growth and spread of intelligence and knowledge regarding us, so that we are becoming better understood and appreciated.

PERSISTENCE OF THE CHURCH

From the very beginning the world has been at a loss to account for "Mormonism." Only the other day we had in the President's office a distinguished visitor. He said he had been at our tabernacle, enjoyed our services, noted the class of people; and what he had heard and seen, including his observation of the developments that were being made here by the Church, and the people of the Church, had impressed upon his mind the thought that there was something more to this than he had ever imagined.

In the days of the prophet, when he was laying the foundations of this great work, he had few friends indeed. On every hand he met ridicule, contumely, hatred, persecution, mobbing, tar and feathers. All through his life such was his portion and you can easily understand how painful it was to endure it. Surely he did not get much out of it in a worldly way, and yet he stood firm, and accomplished the work which the Lord gave him to do. It was said in his day: "This man Joseph Smith is something of a marvel. He is a leader. He carries people with him, but when he dies, that will be the end of 'Mormonism.'" Well, he was martyred with his brother; the Saints were driven, and a new leader—Brigham Young—took hold of the reins.

I recall very well, as a boy in Brigham City, working in the hotel, when, noted travelers stayed there—railroad builders—such men as Stanford, Huntington and others of that class. I heard them discussing this very point. I was only 19 years of age, but I kept my ears open.

They marveled at the wonderful capacity of Brigham Young as a leader, but they concluded—and that rather surprised me—they concluded that when Brigham Young should die, that would be the end of the whole thing; it would all go to pieces.

Well, it will be 50 years this very year since Brigham Young died. We have had five presidents since that time, President Grant being the fifth, and still this thing called “Mormonism” persists. Not only so, but it is greater today than it ever was. It is more powerful, has more influence. It is richer, it is stronger in faith, and more potent in every way for good, for righteousness, than ever before since the day that the prophet had the first great manifestation from heaven.

THE POWER THAT LEADS AND GUIDES

What power is it that brings you here? I never saw a congregation like this anywhere else in the world. Religious congregations which I have attended elsewhere are very largely composed of ladies, not men. Our good sisters more naturally take to spiritual longings and spiritual life than men do. In religious circles everywhere else the ladies predominate. But look at this congregation. Here you see strong, virile, hard-headed, forward-looking, determined men. They know what they are about. They are cultured, they are well read. They have traveled as missionaries more than any other people have traveled. So that I say they are better informed, more cultured, and have had more advantages of education which comes from travel than any body of men that can be picked in any state or territory of all the United States. Hence they are not the kind of people who can be misled. They are not misinformed. On the contrary, they know what they are about.

What power, then, what mysterious power is it that has led and guided them and that still leads and guides them and holds them together as they are held? Let me tell you what it is. I will read from the book of Doctrine and Covenants, Section 84:

“And this greater priesthood administereth the gospel and holdeth the key of the mysteries of the kingdom, even the key of the knowledge of God.

“Therefore, in the ordinances thereof, the power of godliness is manifest.

“And without the ordinances thereof, and the authority of the priesthood, the power of godliness is not manifest unto man in the flesh.”

That is what holds these people together—the power of the priesthood. And in the administration of it we have seen and do see the power of godliness; not a form of godliness, mind you, but the power of godliness. Paul said that in the latter days men would be “having a form of godliness but denying the power thereof;” but what I refer to is the power of godliness. Have you ever seen it manifested in your lives? We heard of it this morning from the leader of the Church as manifested in the healing of the sick. We see it in the temples of the Lord; we see it in the sick rooms; we see it manifested in presidencies of stakes, bishoprics of wards.

In all the leadership of the priesthood you see that same power of godliness. This is a little different from the overruling and general power of God that is over all nations and peoples. "He hath made of one blood all nations for to dwell on the face of the earth and fixed the bounds of their habitations." That is the overruling power of God in all nations. We can trace it readily in this nation from the days of Washington, and even before, down to the present day. The power of God is with this nation. But this power of the Priesthood, that the Lord defines in this scripture that I have read, is just a little different. It is the power of godliness, of godly lives. It is the power of godly men and godly women, through the ordinances of the Priesthood made manifest; and everyone shares in it.

WE HAVE THE WORDS OF ETERNAL LIFE

If I should ask you high priests, seventies, elders, priests, teachers and deacons, who hold the priesthood, to arise, it would be seen that practically every one here holds the Priesthood, which, as I have read to you, contains and holds and reveals the key of the knowledge of God. That is what the world lacks, that is what they haven't got.

President Ivins told us this morning about those people who have passed resolutions against us, and who say there is going to be a great apostasy, there is little or no tithing paid, and all that. Why, I have heard that sort of stuff all my life. It is not worth listening to. They say "These 'Mormon' people will get rid of all that foolishness, and those visions and the Book of Mormon, and prophets, and they will come over to us." Come over to you! What in the name of common sense have you to offer? Husks—merely a form of godliness—no power in it; never was, never will be. It isn't there. We are sorry for you, brothers. We would be glad to help you. We have no ill will, no ill feelings; but when you talk of our leaving what we know we have, and going over to you—oh, please don't mention it. We can say as Peter said to the Savior, when many could not stand the strong doctrine that the Savior laid down. I will quote:

"From that time many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him.

"Then said Jesus unto the Twelve, Will ye also go away?

"Then Simon Peter answered him, Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life.

"And we believe and are sure that thou art that Christ, the Son of the living God."

That is what we have here—"the words of eternal life," the power of godliness made manifest to men in the flesh. Do you see that power of godliness made manifest anywhere else in the world? Look around you and see if you can find it. I haven't seen it elsewhere, but I do know it is here. I see it here every day of my life. I have seen this power made manifest in the mission field very often.

THE MISSIONARY AND HIS FLOCK

Only the other day I received a letter from a young missionary in a foreign country, and he told me he had often heard the elders who returned from missions say that about the hardest part of their mission was to leave their field of labor. He said: "I never believed them, but last night we held a meeting at which Elder So and So was presiding, and now I know it is true."

This elder had been released to return home. He had built up a little branch of some twenty members in the two or three years that he had been there. They were his flock. They had partaken of his spirit. He had brought them from darkness into light. For, let me tell you, darkness covers the earth today, spiritual darkness, in the absence of the knowledge of God. People do not know it, but darkness covers the earth and gross darkness the minds of the people. This is a light shining in darkness, and the darkness comprehendeth it not. They do not know it, but it is here just as truly as the Savior said it would be. And so this young man, when bidding adieu to his little flock, told them how he had been called on that mission; how keenly his parents had felt to see him leave home, because of the tenderness and love in their hearts for him: how it had taken of his means very considerably to go there and stay two years and more; and what joy he had had, notwithstanding all the sacrifices, in bringing that little flock into the fold.

They had partaken of the Priesthood and the key of the knowledge of God, and now he was to leave them. They had in their hearts boundless gratitude towards him. They were in tears; he was in tears with them. That was the spirit of sacrifice and the spirit of godliness, the power of godliness, made manifest before that people. I mention this to show that it exists in the mission field and here at home, where we work for it, just as strongly as it ever did in the history of the Church.

THE PRIESTHOOD THE POWER THAT LEADS

Let me read just another portion of this same revelation. By the way, this revelation was given in 1832, when some of the first elders had returned from short missions and were telling of this very kind of experience to the prophet, and he inquired of the Lord and received this revelation:

"For whoso is faithful unto the obtaining these two priesthoods of which I have spoken, and the magnifying their calling (don't forget that, brethren), are sanctified by the spirit unto the renewing of their bodies.

"They become the sons of Moses and of Aaron and the seed of Abraham and the church and kingdom, and the elect of God.

"And also all they who receive this priesthood receive me, saith the Lord;

"For he that receiveth my servants receiveth me;

"And he that receiveth me receiveth my father;

"And he that receiveth my Father receiveth my Father's kingdom; therefore all that my Father hath shall be given unto him.

"And this according to the oath and covenant which belongeth to the priesthood.

"Therefore, all those who receive the priesthood, receive this oath and covenant of my Father, which he cannot break, neither can it be moved."

That is the power that leads and governs this Church, if the people want to know it. That is what brings you here; that is what holds you together. That is what impels us to go on missions and give of our lives to the work. These people say, "We will call these 'Mormons' over and they will come to us." I think of the words of Hamlet in the play: "Could you this fair mountain leave to feed and batten on this moor?" I don't think so. They won't get many.

THE POWER OF THE PRIESTHOOD PARAMOUNT

Now, my friends, just one word and I close. I am glad to know of the great work that is done by the Boy Scouts. Splendid! I hope it will be kept up. But I would like to say to you presidents of stakes and bishops—bishops especially, for they preside over the lesser priesthood: In all the fine work of the Boy Scouts, don't forget the deacons' quorums, nor the teachers, nor the priests. We approve of the good work that is done in other directions. "If there is anything lovely, of good report or praiseworthy, we seek after these things." They are a part of our religion. But let it be understood now and forever in our hearts that the paramount thing is the power of the priesthood of the Son of God, the knowledge of God; for the Savior himself said: "And this is life eternal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

A man is spiritually alive who has that knowledge. We have it and we can keep it if we will magnify our callings. Therefore, magnify the Priesthood, glorify the priesthood from the president of the Church down to the last deacon. Amen.

ELDER JOHN A. WIDTSOE

My brethren and sisters, I have enjoyed greatly the proceedings of this conference; the valiant testimony of our President, and the splendid analysis of present-day conditions by President Ivins this morning, and the declaration of unshakable faith by President Nibley, this afternoon. I bear testimony to the truth of that which has been spoken.

AN EVIDENCE OF THE GENUINENESS OF THE WORK

It is an evidence of the genuineness of this work, that we can gather here in large numbers, from conference to conference, to hear taught the same, simple principles. They must be true, otherwise we would not be satisfied to come here, time and time again, to hear expounded the few, easily understood truths of the gospel. If a man eat good wholesome food regularly, his body is kept in good condition and he feels well; physical happiness is his. If he has access to truth, accepts it and practices it regularly, he becomes spiritually contented. So I feel that these great gatherings, continually growing in numbers and importance, form a mighty evidence of the correctness of the latter-day work, established through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith the Prophet.

I am glad to know that obedience to the principles of the gospel is not beyond my reach. A few principles, relatively, constitute the gospel of Jesus Christ; they are given for the definite purpose of bringing happiness and joy to man in this life and in the life hereafter. It is possible for a man to obey all of them. The Lord has so ordained it that, in giving his spiritual laws, they are within the easy comprehension and full power of all honest men and women.

WE SHOULD PRACTICE ALL THE PRINCIPLES OF THE GOSPEL

I should like to impress upon the Latter-day Saints that we must, as a body of worshipers, receivers of the Latter-day truth, accept and practice as best we can all the principles of the gospel. I observe a tendency to make a selection of the principles of the gospel, and to say: "This one I like and shall practice; that one I am not so thoroughly converted to, and I shall not practice it." The object of the gospel, human happiness, may be won only if one practices completely the set of laws and principles which we call the gospel of Jesus Christ.

Let me draw a comparison from the physical world. The white light that comes from the sun is made up of many colors, varying from violet, through all the colors, to deep red. If we take all these colors and mix them carefully, pure white light appears, but if one color is missing, the resulting light is impure. Even so with the great spiritual spectrum; only when all the principles of the gospel are practiced with all our might, are we able to win for ourselves the spiritual contentment and happiness which should characterize the private and public lives of Latter-day Saints.

OUR DUTY IN SERVING THE DEAD

As I have said, the Lord has not given us more laws than we can understand and obey. We are told to care for ourselves, that we may increase in righteous stature; we are to render service to our fellow-men; and we are instructed to help open the gospel door for those who have passed into the other life without having accepted the gospel. I desire to say something about the commandment to devote a part of our strength and means to serving the dead who have not heard or accepted the gospel. The principle of salvation for the dead is one of the most effective in tempering human character, in making men unselfish, and in enabling them to walk in the paths laid out for mankind by the Savior. Moreover, the doctrine of salvation for the dead unifies all the other principles of the gospel. When we consider that this gospel principle implies that the Lord, in his mercy and love for his children, has made it possible for every soul who loves and will obey truth to receive salvation, we begin to glimpse the unspeakable love, and the fulness of the blessings that the Lord has for his children. All that we do within the Church, whether for ourselves or in preaching the gospel to the living, can be interpreted in terms of this great fundamental principle which holds together all the other principles of the gospel. "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man." We have been told by the Prophet Joseph Smith that without our dead we cannot be saved; or, as he stated it, "the salvation of our dead is essential to our salvation." We have believed this doctrine, we believe it today, and as a result we have become a mighty temple-building people, the only temple-building people in all the world, today. There are thoughtful men who declare that the great blessings that await this people may be, after all, an effect of our possession and use of sacred houses dedicated to the Lord in which holy ordinances for the living and the dead are consummated.

OUR NEARNESS TO THE SPIRIT WORLD

Ninety-one years ago today the ancient Prophet Elijah stood before Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery in the Kirtland temple and delivered to this generation the keys of salvation for the dead. Since that event the spirit of that work has been poured out upon all nations and there has been developed a new feeling with respect to our ancestors. Men are beginning to look into the other world; and never before has the spirit world seemed so near to us as at the present time. It seems as if President Nibley's suggestion may be carried even further than perhaps he intended—that we shall soon be able, even by mechanical means, to come so near to the veil that separates the living and the dead as to be absolutely certain, through the use of every human sense, that the vast spirit world lies about us. I speak into this microphone and by some mysterious process my words are spread throughout space, through an unknown world, which yet is known—a world that I cannot touch, and yet just as real as the world I know by touch and by every other sense. Two months ago, I picked up the newspaper of that day, and read on the front page that that forenoon a person in New York had called up London, and another in London had answered his New York friend over the radiophone and that others had conversed over the instrument, through space, during the whole of that day—perhaps the most eventful day of the period since our last conference. Such developments, discoveries and new powers won by man, bring us nearer to the unseen world in which I have no doubt the dead live, among other beings of whom we have only slight knowledge. The world no longer argues, as in the past, against life hereafter, because fact crowds upon fact, and the logic of men is convincing, that there must be life after this, and that that life is not greatly different from the life we have lived on this side, so far as the utilization of the laws of righteousness is concerned.

THE SPIRIT OF THE AGE DRAWN TOWARD THE DEAD

In yet another way has the spirit of the age been drawn toward the dead, for, since the memorable visit of the Prophet Elijah, men and women by the thousands have given themselves to the discovery of the genealogies of the world. Thousands of volumes have been published, dealing entirely with the records, names and salient, vital data pertaining to those who have lived upon the earth, giving us exactly the identification needed for our work in the temples. I look upon this as one of the great gifts to our people, for, though we are one of a city and two of a family, we are nevertheless so many that we touch, practically, every family within the civilized parts of the world from which we have come. The necessary work in genealogy has been done for us, to a great extent.

Brethren and sisters, assembled in this great conference, I believe the Lord requires of us that we all set our houses in order in this respect, that each man and woman, every family, set about to secure, just as completely as may be possible, a record of their dead, so that thereby the genealogies of the human family may be gathered and increased in number, and we may have ample material with which to labor in the temples of the Lord. Such work is not difficult to do. It may be done by any man or woman. The intricacies of arranging names in systematic genealogies may be done by those who are experts in such work, but every man and every woman in Zion may gather names, later to be fully arranged, and should give some little time to such work. With respect to gospel principles, perhaps none is more important in developing spiritual power and strength than that which pertains to the salvation for the dead. Whether we are near a temple or far away from it, we may be able to give some little time to the important work of gathering the names of our dead and arranging them for use in the temples. The Church maintains the Utah Genealogical Society, which upon request will give ample help in such genealogical endeavors. Likewise, to prevent duplication of temple work, even if we increase in numbers, the Church has provided and completed, since our last conference, a Temple Index, which permits every person who goes into a temple to assure himself that the person for whom he is working has not been served before.

THE SPIRIT OF ELIJAH RESTING UPON THE PEOPLE

Thus, within and beyond the Church, the spirit of Elijah is operating and is resting upon the people. I trust that this spirit may enter even more completely into the hearts of the Latter-day Saints, that they may continue to be a temple-building people, that we may use our temples more abundantly, that we may provide ways and means, by earnest effort, through which such work may be done. I feel assured in my own heart, from my own experience and the experience of my friends, that those who give themselves in wisdom and with propriety to this work will round out their spiritual experiences, enrich their lives, and find a new and abiding joy in all duties pertaining to life under the gospel of Jesus Christ.

TESTIMONY

I know that this afternoon is a precious one. Many should be heard here today, before this great congregation. I am happy to have had this privilege of bearing my testimony to you, and of speaking briefly upon an important gospel principle. I bear witness to the existence of God, the Father of our spirits; to the divinity of Jesus Christ, his Son; to the divine mission of Joseph Smith, and to the truth of the faith that brings joy and happiness to faithful members of the Church. I know this work is true. God bless us and establish us in the testimony of the truth, I pray, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER BRIGHAM H. ROBERTS

Of the First Council of Seventy, and Former President of the Eastern States Mission .

My brethren and sisters, in view of the announcement made by President Heber J. Grant this morning, in regard to my being released from the Presidency of the Eastern States mission, I think it is quite likely that the parents, the brothers and sisters and friends of those who are now in the Eastern States on missions, would be glad to receive word from that mission as to the general welfare of their sons and daughters. I am happy to report to you that it is a general time of health with us, that all is well with your kindred and that the Spirit of the Lord is a common heritage, it seems to me, to all those who are now engaged in the work of the Lord in the Eastern States.

I wish to express my gratitude unto the Lord and to the authorities of the Church that I have had the opportunity of laboring during the past five years in that mission. It has been a time of great joy and satisfaction to me to be conscious of the esteem and friendship of the five hundred young people with whom I have come in contact since I began my labors in the Eastern States. To receive the friendship and feel the supporting influence of their confidence has produced in me a joy unspeakable. While I acquiesce fully in the release that has come to me, and recognize the wisdom of it, you will have to forgive me if I confess also that I received the word with some degree of personal sadness. I feel honored in the selection of my successor, and I wired that word to the secretary of the mission last night, and congratulated the mission upon the appointment of Elder Henry H. Rolapp, and I pray for a continuation of the esprit de corps, may I call it, of the mission. I am very sure that the mission force will give to him all the loyalty and the support they have given to me, and that the work of the Lord without let or hindrance will continue to expand even as it has in the past.

The Eastern States, in my judgment, is one of the noblest missions in the world. Within its boundaries are thirty-three millions of people; and of the cities in the United States that have a population of four hundred thousand and over, of the fifteen such cities, eight are within the boundaries of the Eastern States! I am happy in the reflection that there has been continued growth in the work, that each successive year in the five of my administration has been greater in its success than in the one that preceded it. During the time of my labors there has been an increase of four chapel buildings in the mission; that is, it will be four when the one under construction at the present time is completed. I was very happy before leaving New York to secure for the Manhattan or New York branch of our mission more adequate quarters, and more worthy of the chief branch of our mission. We secured quarters in the Carnegie building. We have now a beautiful hall with suitable classrooms in it to assemble the classes of our Sabbath school, and also obtained one of the smaller halls for mid-week services for the Young Men's Mutual Improvement Association and the Relief Society, so that we will be more suitably located hereafter than in the immediate past, at least, in that important branch.

We are expending in the mission about eight thousand dollars yearly in rental for halls. This has been an increase in this item from three thousand dollars yearly to eight thousand. We have been successful in obtaining better halls and more of them, but of course at considerable increase of expense.

Among the outstanding features of our work in the Eastern States during my administration has been the holding of five mission schools. These schools have brought in about one-third of the whole mission force at a time to each school for intensified training during four solid weeks, and if I could take time to recite the curriculum of these schools you would agree with me that the training is both intensive and comprehensive.

It has been my pleasure to write thirteen new tracts for the mission since the opening of my administration; and these have not only been used in the Eastern States mission, but other missions also have taken up some of them in their work, and altogether, year after year, the work has grown. I am extremely happy to be conscious of the fact that we quit service on a "rising market."

There is one circumstance that I shall take the liberty of referring to a little in more detail. In New York City alone, that is, in greater New York, there are two millions of the House of Judah, and for the last several years I have been wondering how we could make an approach to those people, attract their attention, and have the material to present to them that would place in their hands the great message that God has for that branch of the House of Israel. In very many of the revelations to the Church, where the Lord sets forth this latter-day work, you will find this phraseology often employed when referring to the preaching of the gospel—"first unto the Gentiles, and then unto the Jews." That occurs quite a number of times in the revelations contained in the Doctrine and Covenants; and, of course, being in the midst of so large a population of the Jews, one's thought would naturally go out to them with a desire to get some word of our message over to them. Well, during the past six months, it seems to me that the way has wonderfully opened up in that direction, in the city of Birmingham, Broome county, New York, a name that will be familiar to many of you who are acquainted with the history of the Church, for it is territory in which the Prophet Joseph Smith operated during the translation of the Book of Mormon, and also in the early movements of the Church. It is only about twenty-three miles from this city that the Colesville branch was organized, which was the first community unit to begin the great work of the gathering together of our people to the west. It was the Colesville branch that as a body, and by cooperative methods of mutual assistance, moved through the states of New York and Ohio, halting for a while in Kirtland, and then continuing their journey through Indiana and Illinois, and so on into Missouri, and to the western borders of that state, and made the first settlements in Jackson county, Missouri. Well, in Binghampton, near where this stream of western migration started, came our opening for an approach to the House of Judah. There is in that place a converted Jew, who is converted to Christianity, but not to our gospel, the true Christianity. He accepts Christ as the Messiah of the Jews, and he publishes a magazine entitled The Redeemed Hebrew. He received a paper from a Jewish Rabbi, in Canada, in which the Rabbi set forth his reasons for rejecting Jesus Christ as the Messiah, and concluded that it would be sin for him, and disloyalty to Jehovah for him to accept Jesus of Nazareth as the Messiah. The article was published and an invitation extended to Christian ministers to answer the Rabbi, an editorial note stating that the paper which should most completely answer the Rabbi would be published in the magazine. It may be a bit out of good taste for me to say it, perhaps, but the paper which I submitted to the magazine was accepted and published as a reply to the Rabbi. After the first article was published, I thought it needed a little amplification, and so I sent in a second article, and that, too, was published. Then it seemed to me that we had just reached the threshold of the subject, and there was just a fine opening made for proclaiming our message, God's message to the Jews, as we may gather it from the Book of Mormon; for, as pointed out by President Anthony W. Ivins this morning, the outstanding feature of our Book of Mormon scriptures is, that the book shall be a witness to the Gentiles and especially to Jews, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, and the very Eternal God, manifesting himself to all nations. That is found, as you all know, on the title page of the Book of Mormon, which the Prophet Joseph Smith declared was not his composition. He found it engraven on the title page of the gold plates.

When I sent this third article to the editor of The Redeemed Hebrew he informed me that it made thirteen pages of his magazine; and as he expected to devote the whole magazine to that paper, he said he could publish sixteen pages nearly at the same cost as thirteen, and would I supplement what I had written with something further. I did so. When that was published it made eighteen pages instead of sixteen; but he refused to select the part to be cut down, and I did not have the heart to sacrifice any part of it, so the eighteen pages were published.

In the supplemental matter I sent to him, I used what I have before used as a theme, I think in this tabernacle; namely, "A Prophetic Page of the Book of Mormon." I am sorry that we do not have here one of the older editions of the Book of Mormon, because then I could conscientiously tell you that all the prophecies that I referred to were upon one page of the Book of Mormon, but in our more recent editions, in dividing the pages into two columns for each page, that particular group of prophecies are distributed over two pages. But it only makes sufficient matter for one page, and I think I may still say that it is a "prophetic page of the Book of Mormon." You will find it now in your current editions on page 101 and page 102; in the older editions it occupied page 122. Of course, I shall not have time to enter into a discussion of all these prophecies of this page—there are five of them; but suffice it to say that the first prophecy predicts, that many shall believe in the Book of Mormon; and, second, that they shall carry the words of that book unto the remnants of the land, meaning of course, the American Indians, descendants of the Nephites and the Lamanites of ancient times; and third, that the remnants of those ancient people shall know their origin, that they are descendants of Israel; the gospel shall be declared among them, that they shall believe it, the scales of darkness shall fall from their eyes, and before many generations pass away, they shall become a white and delightful people. Then we come to the prophecies that are germane to what I want to tell you. It is declared on this prophetic page:

“And it shall come to pass that the Jews which are scattered also shall begin to believe in Christ.”

That is a subject that I have had under consideration during many years, and I have made a considerable collection of utterances from prominent Jewish Rabbis that indicate a marked change of mental attitude on the part of leading Jews towards Jesus of Nazareth. I think perhaps one of the most striking of these utterances, and one that indicates the whole shifting of thought on the part of Jews toward the Christ, was uttered March 25, 1901, by Rabbi Isador Singer, Doctor of Philosophy, in New York City. He said:

“I regard Jesus of Nazareth as a Jew of the Jews, one whom all Jewish people are beginning to love. His teaching has been an immense service to all the world in bringing Israel's God to the knowledge of hundreds of millions of mankind. The great change in the Jewish thought concerning Jesus of Nazareth I cannot better illustrate than by this fact. When I was a boy had my father, who was a very pious man, heard the name of Jesus uttered from the pulpit of our synagogue, he and every other man in the congregation would have left the building, and the rabbi would have been dismissed at once. Now it is not a strange thing in many synagogues to hear sermons preached eulogistic of this Jesus, and nobody thinks of protesting. In fact, we are all glad to claim Jesus as one of our people.”

About a year ago Rabbi Wise of New York, in Carnegie Hall, the hall that is near to ours now in the Carnegie Building, before a record crowd in his lecture room declared that:

“Jesus of Nazareth was a man, not a myth, as I had been taught in my earlier manhood Jesus was; that is, he existed,” said the Rabbi. “I accept this despite the information I had been led to believe earlier in my life, a notion that Jesus was a myth, and never existed. I tell you, and I will repeat these words to every Jew in the world if need be: Jesus was, and we must accept this fact at once. Shall we not say that this Jew [Jesus] is soul of our soul, and that the soul of his teaching is Jewish, and nothing but Jewish? The teaching of Jesus, the Jew, is a phase of the spirit which has led the Jew Godward.”

I could continue to read to you many excerpts of this kind, more than twenty such excerpts are written in the third article of The Redeemed Hebrew, that I told you about. It merely tends to show that the Jew is “beginning to believe in Christ.” He has not yet accepted him as the Son of God, as God manifested in the flesh, the Redeemer of the world, and the one who fulfills the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament. There is nothing in this movement that indicates belief of Jesus in that way; but there is much that proclaims the fact that the Jews are "beginning" to admire, they are beginning to accept as a great religious teacher this Jesus of Nazareth; to respect him. Ultimately that respect will turn to love, and love will turn to acceptance of him as the Son of God. There will be some, at least, of the House of Judah who will begin to react toward this message, this proclamation, that our Book of Mormon makes as to the Deity of the Christ, "the Eternal God" manifested in the flesh.

The second part of this prophecy is that not only shall "the Jews which are scattered begin to believe in Christ," but "they shall begin to gather in upon the face of the land;" that is, begin to gather to their promised land, to Palestine.

I remember that the British Consular reports of 1856, said that less than fifteen thousand Jews were in all Palestine. Twenty years later this number had increased to sixty-five thousand. Then came the Zionite movement, under the leadership of Dr. Herzal, supplemented later by the influence of Israel Zangwell, a Jewish writer of some note, and what is known as the "Zionite movement" received an impetus, and began to grow in the minds of the Jews until there began what we may now call the modern gathering together of the Jews in Palestine. The gathering is continuing. Millions of dollars have been subscribed by that people to establish their exiled brethren in the land of their fathers, and the ambition is to resume the national history of the Jewish people. That movement has grown until it has attained large proportions, and very wide interest in the world. This prophecy, then, is in course of fulfilment—"The Jews that are scattered are beginning to gather in upon the land of their forefathers, to the land of Palestine and to Jerusalem!"

We may pause here to ask what is the motive power, what is behind all this movement—this change in the mental attitude of that people towards Christ;—this gathering together of the Jews in Palestine? This is the explanation of it: In the Kirtland Temple, in 1835, Israel's great prophet, Moses, appeared to Joseph and Oliver Cowdery and delivered to them the keys of the gathering of Israel and the restoration of the Ten Tribes from the land of the North. In 1840, in pursuance of this work, an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ, an apostle of this new dispensation, a Jew, by the way, was appointed by the Prophet Joseph to a special mission to the Holy Land, to Palestine, to dedicate that land for the gathering of the Jews to Jerusalem, and to bless the Jews with a disposition to return to their land and to their city. The mission of Orson Hyde is well known to the Latter-day Saints; how, under very great difficulties, trials and hardships, he made his way to Jerusalem, went to the summit of the Mount of Olives, and there wrote out a prayer that God put into his heart, dedicating the land of Palestine for the return of the Jews, and for the renewal of their national existence. That prayer—and it is a most wonderful prayer—has been published many times in our periodicals. It is published also in the History of the Church, which is derived chiefly from the office journal of the Prophet Joseph. Orson Hyde, returning from his mission when in Alexandria, also wrote to the Millennial Star of the then current date and there made a rather wonderful prediction. He said in substance that it was by political power that Judah had been broken and scattered abroad, and that it would be by the exercise of political power that Judah would be restored; and furthermore he declared that England would be the leading national power that would befriend Judah, and aid him in the re-establishment of his people in the land of Palestine. This was published in the Millennial Star of 1842, and may be found by those curious enough to seek for the source of this information.

That is the source of the power underlying the development of this great work. God is moving underneath all these facts—this changing of the mental attitude of Jews towards Jesus—this latter-day gathering of the Jews to the land and this city of their fathers.

It is interesting to note that the predictions of Orson Hyde, the man set apart to perform this special mission, in behalf of Judah, are being wonderfully fulfilled. The defeat of the Turks in the World War was by British forces under the English General Sir Edmund Allenby. The official entrance of General Allenby into Jerusalem on the 11th of December, 1917, and the subsequent course of England in respect of Palestine; the fact that Great Britain now holds the administration of the affairs of that land under the appointment of the League of Nations,—this fills out the story of Elder Orson Hyde's mission, and prophecy. The policy of England in respect to its administration of the affairs of Palestine as foreshadowed in the declaration by Lord Balfour when, on the 2nd of November, 1919, he said officially, and with the approval of France, Italy and President Wilson of the United States:

"His Majesty's Government view with favor the establishment in Palestine of a National home for the Jewish people, and will use their best endeavors to facilitate the achievement of this object."

England has ever since consistently pursued that policy; and is now pursuing it.

I regret that I have taken more time than I should have done, but I think these matters of sufficient importance to have entered upon the record of this conference, and I wish to say, my brethren and sisters, that I cannot but regard the opening that has come to us in the Eastern States to furnish material by which we may approach our cousin Judah with the message of the Book of Mormon, as an opening of the way by the inspiration and power of the Spirit of the Lord. I may not have made that very clear to you, but I feel it in my own heart, and I pray that God will bless this branch of his people, the Jews, and that the time will come when we shall have larger access to these people in the proclamation of God's message to them. I hope so, and pray for it, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER CHARLES A. CALLIS

President Southern States Mission

My brethren and sisters, as the President of the Church was delivering his sermon this morning, I thought, What a great spiritual comfort and sustaining power it is to the Latter-day Saints to hear him speak in the spirit of testimony, and truly his testimony is invaluable to the Church. In Atlanta a few years ago we accepted an invitation for President Grant to speak in a Unitarian Church. At the close of his sermon the minister said: "Mr. Grant, I wish I had your earnestness, your testimony, and your faith." I felt that that minister voiced the feeling of millions of people in the earth whose religious beliefs are vague and therefore not very comforting.

In the 133rd section of the Doctrine and Covenants the Lord sets forth the mission of the Church. He says:

"And for this cause, that men might be made partakers of the glories which were to be revealed, the Lord sent forth the fulness of his gospel, his everlasting covenant, reasoning in plainness and simplicity—

"To prepare the weak for those things which are coming on the earth, and for the Lord's errand in the day when the weak shall confound the wise, and the little one become a strong nation, and two shall put their tens of thousands to flight.

"And by the weak things of the earth the Lord shall thrash the nations by the power of his Spirit."

And are not the elders preaching in plainness and in simplicity? They are preaching in the power of the spirit of testimony.

"And after your testimony cometh wrath and indignation upon the people. For after your testimony cometh the testimony of earthquakes, that shall cause groanings in the midst of her, and men shall fall upon the ground and shall not be able to stand. And also cometh the testimony of the voice of thunders, and the voice of lightnings, and the voice of tempests, and the voice of the waves of the sea, heaving themselves beyond their bounds."

When your sons come into the mission field, I meet them in a spirit of love and sympathy, for I feel that these young men need sympathy and love. I believe that the Lord prefers mercy, prefers executing mercy rather than judgment. As I stand before these splendid young men, I have no doubt of their ability to preach the gospel. I believe in them, for in my heart are the words of the Lord, which are as follows: "For the power is in them wherein they are agents unto themselves. And inasmuch as men do good they shall in nowise lose their reward." And when the Lord says the power is in them, who shall doubt the ability of these young men of Israel to preach the gospel, if they magnify their calling?

Recently I honorably released a young man, and he told me some of his history. He said: "I am the fifth son of a family to have filled a mission, and it has cost my father, who is a poor farmer, over eight thousand dollars to keep me and my brothers in the mission field." This case is by no means uncommon, but it shows the background of this missionary work: a background of sacrifice and sacred devotion to the work of the Lord. And shall we forget this sacrifice? Who would not be willing to help these fine young men, brethren and sisters? When they come into the mission field, I look at them and try to think of their fathers and their mothers who have reared them, and I say to myself: "With the help of God, it is my duty to continue this noble work and to help the parents develop the power that God has given their sons, as ministers of his word, to preach the everlasting gospel."

To the testimony of my brethren I add my testimony: I know, by the power of the Holy Ghost, that Jesus is the Christ, our Redeemer and our Savior, the Son of the living God, the resurrection and the life. By the same power I have been favored with a testimony that Joseph Smith was a man sent from God, a messenger of the Almighty, a choice being raised up by the Lord to complete the glorious work of having all dispensations merge into this, the dispensation of the fulness of times, that God "might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth;" and prepare the world for the second coming of the Son of God: and this testimony I humbly bear, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER WM. J. HENDERSON

President of the Panguitch Stake and Recently Returned from a Short-term Mission in the Southern States

My brethren and sisters: I feel thankful to our heavenly Father, and to the brethren who preside over the Church, that I have had the wonderful opportunity and experience of a short-term mission in the Southern states. I am on my way home from that mission, where I have been laboring as a missionary since last October. That mission is a wonderful field of labor. The leading thought in my mind, almost continuously, in laboring with the young men sent out to preach and teach the gospel in that land, was, What a blessing it would be to the elders and to the people of that mission and other missions, if men of experience could be constantly associated with them. I am thoroughly convinced that it was through the inspiration of our heavenly Father that short-term missionaries were called into the field. The men needed to carry forward short-term missions, especially in the Southern states where I have labored, would be the busy, the active men, men who are doing things, who have their fingers on the financial pulse of the country, as well as affairs spiritual. The mission needs the professional men—the doctors, the lawyers, the educators, the financiers, men who measure up with the general practical conditions as we find them.

There are some wonderful cities in the South, which have been making rapid progress during the last few years. There are men in the South with keen minds, up-to-date, who are doing things, men of intelligence, approachable, willing to listen. If we send missionaries who are qualified to take up the principles of life and salvation with this class of men, it would be a great strength to that mission. It would also be a source of great strength to the young elders. They need encouragement, sympathy, someone to help them to get started in this great work in which we are engaged.

I have in mind one small city of 42,000 people. I was told, by a member of the Chamber of Commerce, that the payroll of that city was three hundred thousand dollars a day. I was also in Birmingham, Alabama, where a member of the Chamber of Commerce said that the payroll of that wonderful city was four million two hundred thousand dollars a week. The south is filling up with wonderful industries from the north. They have all of the latest modern improvements in these great cities. They have spent millions of dollars for water systems, and for other improvements. Many of those wonderful cities are modern, up-to-date in every respect, and forging ahead with marvelous rapidity.

We have an excellent membership in the South. Many choice men and women who have received the testimony of the elders. They have a testimony of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith. They are devoted to the work, are giving their time and their talents to the cause, willing to serve, and assume responsibility. It is a great work. The training that our boys and girls are getting in the mission field is admirable. We can scarcely conceive of the worthy training they are receiving, but they need the help of more of our men of ability, who have had greater experiences in the gospel. I am hoping and praying continuously that men of this class may be separated for a short time from their business cares, and see their way to give a few months of their time to assist these young men in carrying forward the testimony that we have received of this wondrous latter-day work. I am sure that it will profit them, their families, and their associates. They will get more out of it themselves than they will be able to give to others. That has been the experience of our missionaries; and we feel indebted to our heavenly Father for the blessings that have come to us.

I have often heard people say: "We have made a sacrifice to go on a mission. I have made a sacrifice to send my son, or my daughter on a mission." It never appealed to me as a sacrifice at all. It has always appealed to me as a glorious privilege and opportunity to be called by the servants of the Lord to preach and teach the gospel, and to administer in its ordinances. I have proved it a great privilege and a blessing. I have received more personal joy in preaching and teaching the gospel and mingling and associating with our young men in the mission field, than I have ever received in any other way.

I pray that the Lord will move upon the hearts of our busy men throughout the Church, to be anxious to fill a short-term mission, and assist in carrying on this work and labor. You have no idea of the wonderful good that you can accomplish, and the encouragement that you will be able to give the younger missionaries. And they need encouragement. When our boys and girls are started out properly and rightly in the mission field, they become strong men and women, and are able to accomplish a great amount of good. They develop, grow, and increase in power and ability to a remarkable extent. That is my testimony of the wonderful improvement and advancement that our sons and daughters have made in the mission field. For this reason and others, I do pray that the mission presidents throughout the United States will be blessed in the future more than in the past with the presence of men of ability, and experience, who can do greater service in carrying forward this latter-day work.

I have received many testimonies in regard to the truth of this latter-day work. I know that it is true. I know that the testimony which the young men and women who are called into the mission field have received through their parents is supplemented and developed as soon as the responsibility comes to them. It will grow, and they will make good, if they have the proper care and training, in starting out in the mission field. I pray God to bless us all, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The choir sang the anthem, "The Lord now victorious."

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

Can you beat that in any land or any clime? [Referring to the wonderful rendition of the anthem, just sing.] There will be a concert given here Tuesday evening by the choir. The admission price is twenty-five and fifty cents, and we owe it to the choir to give them a rousing reception. I think our music today very superior indeed. I rejoice exceedingly in it.

Brother David K. Udall will come to the stand on Monday morning to offer the opening prayer. Brother Udall has been appointed president of the Arizona Temple. The Temple will be completed within a few weeks, but will not be dedicated until after the October conference. It will cost us about three quarters of a million dollars.

Prayer was offered by Elder Carl K. Conrad, president of the Nevada stake.

The conference adjourned until Monday, 10 o'clock a. m., April 4, 1927.

FIRST OVERFLOW MEETING

An overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 10 o'clock, Sunday morning, April 3, 1927.

Elder J. Golden Kimball, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

The music was furnished by the Dutch choir, of Salt Lake City, Elder A. Van Rosendaal, conductor; Elder Tracy Y. Cannon at the organ.

The choir and congregation sang, "Come, let us anew our journey pursue."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder John Q. Cannon.

The choir sang, "All hail the risen Redeemer." The solo parts were sung by Jane Van Roosendaal and Mrs. Vant Hof.

ELDER RUSSELL H. BLOOD

Former President of the French Mission

I feel it a great privilege, my brethren and sisters, to stand before a general conference of the Church. This is the first opportunity that I have had since October, 1921, to attend a general conference of the Church and during the larger part of the intervening time I have been in Europe.

It was my privilege to labor during the latter part of the time among the French-speaking people, and I can assure you that I bring back from those countries some of the fondest memories of my life. The French mission was reorganized at the commencement of 1924, at which time the French-speaking people of Belgium, and those of the French cantons in Switzerland, and the people of France, were united under one head. Up to that time there had been missionaries laboring in Belgium and Switzerland, and years ago missionaries had done work in France, but these countries had not been grouped together as a French mission, until 1924.

I am sure that the movement that was taken by the authorities was the proper one. While our labors will perhaps be slow among the French people, for some time, because of the fact that they have not heard of the teachings of our Church and because missionaries have not been among them, yet I am confident that we have a great work to perform among those who speak the French language.

I can say truthfully that there are no finer people to associate with than those in Belgium, in France, and in Switzerland. Some misunderstanding has arisen here in our country with respect to the French people, and some of us have been prone to criticize them for conditions that have been forced upon them; and, perhaps, also, for their attitude toward the people of the United States; but could you go, as I have gone, and as many others have, through the war-torn countries of France and Belgium, I am sure that you would then appreciate more fully the conditions under which they have been laboring in the past few years. There are four or five divisions of France which were completely devastated during the war, and these, by the way, were the agricultural districts. Not only were homes destroyed, but much of the land was damaged to such an extent that, perhaps, it can never be reclaimed. However, the French government is spending large sums of money in an effort to clear the shell-strewn land, and to remove the effects of war throughout this territory. Their homes, their means of livelihood, were taken from them, and then we, who have not been touched to such an extent, criticize them because of the fact that they feel they are overburdened and because they have expressed their feelings.

I like the French people. I like the way they extend their hospitality to all those who go among them, and especially to our missionaries. When missionaries go into their homes they are received, and the people listen to their message. True, it is entirely new to them and they cannot understand, as we do, some of the principles of the gospel, but we are making an effort to teach them, and they are earnestly investigating our teachings.

There are no people more energetic than the Belgians, and while their country is small, they, too, have suffered under similar conditions to those that exist in France. Their country, also, was destroyed; their homes were taken from them; they had no place to go. Fathers and sons were taken out of the homes and the wives and daughters were left to "carry on." It is a pitiful sight, in passing through Belgium at the present time, to see the women working—working too hard—in the fields, working in the shops and factories, working along the canals and rivers pulling the boats laden with products and sharing their part of the labor in loading and unloading the boats at their destinations. These sights are very common. The women are working just as hard as the men to rebuild their beautiful and beloved little country, and we who have known their sacrifices, and witnessed their sturdy determination to rehabilitate their lands sympathize also with the Belgians for what they have passed through, and admire them for what they are doing.

Switzerland was not touched as these other countries were by the war. It is a most delightful country, as most of you know. It is called "the playground of the world," and truly it is a playground, beautiful and inviting. There the people are a little more care-free than they are in the other parts of the French mission; and, being in general a Protestant country, they are less difficult to approach on religious matters.

So, summing up the conditions as they exist at the present time in France, Belgium and Switzerland, I can truthfully say that I believe our missionaries will accomplish just as great a work among the French speaking people as has been accomplished among the British, the Norwegians, the Dutch, the Germans and those of other parts of the world, if we continue to work to that end; and, for one, I feel to encourage those who have the opportunity of going to France, or to the French mission to accept the call, and devote their time, efforts and talents to the building up of the Lord's work in those countries. The gospel is for all mankind. It is not alone for the British people, although our first missionary labors in Europe were among them, but it is intended for other nations of Europe and for those in the far parts of the earth.

It is interesting to note the change that comes into the lives of those who have accepted the gospel. It is interesting to note the difference in home life; the change of conditions; the better feeling that exists between father and son, between mother and daughter. There seems to be kindled in their hearts a new love for one another and for their fellow-men, and truly that is the spirit of the gospel of Christ.

It has been my privilege to watch these changes in the lives of some of those with whom I have been associated, and I declare unto you that the gospel is molding the lives of those who receive it and are living it. I believe that we, the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, should devote our time and talents to the advancement of the Lord's work, because, after all, we are here but a short period of time and it is our duty to give these glad tidings that we have received to others who have not been so fortunate as we have been in being born here in the valleys of the mountains. I feel and believe as did Nephi of old when he said, "I will go and do the thing which the Lord hath commanded, for I know that the Lord giveth no commandments unto the children of men, save he shall prepare a way for them that they may accomplish the thing which he commandeth them." I believe that where the Lord has laid down a rule, where he has given a commandment, that in every case he provides the way by which we, his children, may fulfil these commandments which have been given unto us. So, is there any reason that, as Latter-day Saints, we should falter? Is there any reason why we should not heed the principles of the gospel of Christ? Is there any reason why we should not perform the duties assigned us by the authorities of the Church? I say there is no reason. I believe that it is the duty of every Latter-day Saint to observe the principles of the gospel in his life. I believe that it is the duty of every man, woman and child who has been baptized into this Church not only to keep the commandments of the Lord, but to strive also to give some new hope, some encouragement, to those who have not been blessed as we have been.

When we are traveling in the world, we find that the conditions which exist among Christian people are appalling, i. e., we find such diversity of opinion with reference to the teachings of Christ. We find that different sects are teaching various doctrines, and the result is that the world at large is thrown into confusion. It is difficult for one who has not heard the teachings of a commissioned servant of the Lord to select the principles and doctrines that he should follow in his search for the way of salvation. It is the hope and purpose of our missionary work to give guidance, and point the way, to those who are seeking truth, and I am glad to say that so far as my travels have revealed, our missionaries are accomplishing that purpose. There is no work in the world that gives a testimony of the gospel as does the missionary work. To go forth, bearing the Priesthood, to give a reason for the hope that is within us; to go out and stand for truth and for righteousness, against the evil forces which are constantly opposing, is a great privilege, a choice blessing.

The missionaries in France are devoting their time willingly; they are working conscientiously. They know the obstacles before them. They realize that the French have not in the past received the gospel as have the other people in Europe, because they have not had these teachings as some of the other people have had them. Therefore the missionaries are devoting extra time and additional effort for the furtherance of this noble work.

I commend very highly the faithful and conscientious efforts of all those with whom I was privileged to labor, because they are men of true character—they are men who have the spirit of the gospel at heart.

I had the pleasure of going to Palestine, about two years ago, and while traveling there many things occurred that have strengthened my testimony and increased my understanding of the great value of our teachings. On one occasion I entered the Church of the Nativity at Bethlehem—a church which has been erected over the birth-place of our Lord and Savior. I had two companions with me, and as we viewed with reverence the interesting things within the church, our attention was drawn to long strips of carpet and small mats which seemed to separate the floor space into various sections. We walked on through the church toward the back where we were conducted through a small door down a few steps to the manger, the very place, we were told, in which the Christ-child had been born. But our curiosity was again aroused when we noticed that an Arab, wearing the Mohammedan costume and armed with a rifle was standing guard over this sacred place, and it was upon inquiry that we learned the reason for this unusual condition. A few years previous to our visit the different Christian denominations who had been worshipping at the same time in this church had not agreed upon some particular topic of discussion and a battle had arisen; a real genuine fight in which several were wounded. As a result of this it was decided, perhaps unanimously, by these Christian sects, these pseudo-Christians, may I call them, to divide the Church into sections designating a particular section to each sect; and in order that there should be no further confusion or fighting they also decided to place an Arab guard, not a Christian, but an Arab guard, over the birthplace of the Savior. Imagine such a condition! How disgusting it seems to us to know of the necessity of having an armed Arab guard standing in that most sacred place to keep Christians from killing one another.

That brings to mind the very thing that exists today throughout Europe, that exists generally throughout all the world—the lack of brotherly love and respect for the rights of others. Hatred often arises among Christian denominations—not love for their fellow-men; not the spirit of the gospel of Christ, but in their place antagonism, strife and contention.

Now that my mission has been completed and I am back among the Latter-day Saints, I rejoice in the opportunity of meeting with you. I am happy in the knowledge that we, as a body, are united. We are making an effort to wipe out the differences that exist throughout the Christian world, by earnestly teaching the true gospel of the Lord; the gospel of good will and fellowship; the gospel of peace. True, we are having difficulty in winning our way and bringing people to the light of gospel truth. Perhaps, in numbers, we shall for a long time be in the minority, but we have the assurance that to us has been given the true and everlasting gospel of Jesus Christ. We know that the prophet, Joseph Smith, was a true prophet of God, and we know that in these, the last days, we are being directed by the Lord through his servants. This is his Church; we are his children and it is our privilege to receive the blessings which he has promised us, provided we are faithful and true to all the covenants we have made with him.

I bear you my testimony that I know that this is the true work of the Lord. I know that we are living in a day and age when it behooves everyone of us to hold firm and steadfast to the principles of the gospel. I pray that the Lord may strengthen all of us, that he may give us his Spirit at all times to guide and direct us in all that we do, so that eventually we shall attain salvation in his kingdom. May God bless us all. May the spirit of this conference influence our lives, and may we carry to our homes the determination to go on in this work and to do the things which will bring us happiness and joy, not only in this life but in the life to come. I pray for these blessings in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER EUGENE J. NEFF

Former President of the Hawaiian Mission

Last evening I had decided that I would come to conference early this morning, that I might gain entrance to the Tabernacle and hear the keynote of this conference given by the President of the Church, when a party, casually, informed me that I was to be one of the speakers here this morning. I assure you, my brethren and sisters, that I desire an interest in your faith and prayers the few moments I may stand before you. I have stood before many large congregations, but I have never stood before any that I did not feel reliance on the Spirit of the Lord to give me utterance. I have preached the gospel in the Hawaiian Islands, spending eight years of my life there. I have stood before thousands of tourists and aboard steamers, enroute to and from that land, the governor in his palace, and defended the word of the Lord before him. I have stood in large hotels before five hundred or more of their prominent citizens in a reception given to Prince Otoni, a Japanese who is the head of ten million Buddhists of Japan. I have stood in our conference assemblies in Honolulu, in our beautiful chapel there, where we have had a congregation as large, or nearly as large, as the congregation here today. I have also met with our Hawaiian people in a little grass hut, when only four or five of us would be gathered together, sitting on the mats and there preaching the gospel to one another. But, as I say, I never stand before a congregation of any size or kind but that I feel reliance on the holy Spirit to give me utterance.

I was pleased this morning to hear this splendid choir of the Dutch people. Like Brother Kimball, I am a descendant of the Dutch people, my father being one of the Pennsylvania Dutch, who emigrated to Utah in 1847. I am thankful also that God has made as one all nations of men, that he has gathered us from the north and from the south, from the east and the west, from the isles of the sea, and that all over the world he has sent his messengers of salvation, and the people have come to Zion. I regret, however, that some of those who have made such sacrifices to come to Zion, who have made all but the supreme sacrifice to come to Zion, have come only to apostatize. I also know missionaries who have spent years in the mission field bringing salvation to the souls of people who sat in darkness, who have returned home and neglected the chance of salvation to their own souls.

As I said before, I have spent eight years in the land of sunshine and flowers, in the land of fair Hawaii, the land said to be the only place under the sun—the only part of the garden that was not touched by the curse on man. Those little dots, as they appear on our map, in the Pacific ocean, really seem to be a part of the paradise which has not received the measure of the curse which some of the other nations have received. The gospel has been firmly established there. We have there the third largest mission in the Church, with fourteen thousand members, with baptisms exceeding all except two others in the Church.

It was partly through the instrumentality of George Q. Cannon, I believe, the father of Brother John Q. Cannon, who offered the opening prayer, that the work was established there.

The Lord has always been mindful of the seed of Lehi, and as early as 1842, the Prophet Joseph, by revelation, sent Parley P. Pratt, Peter Whitmer, Jr., and Ziba Peterson on a mission to Missouri to bring the message of salvation to the seed of Lehi. While their mission was not altogether successful as far as conversion was concerned, yet it showed the deep interest which the prophet had in that chosen people, the seed of Lehi.

Before the prophet's death he sent missionaries to the Society Islands, and they labored there and opened up that mission.

Three years after the pioneers arrived here in Utah, in 1850, at the conference held in October of that year, Brigham Young called ten missionaries to go to Hawaii and open up the work there. Some people thought it was wrong to take the strength of their manhood out of the valleys at that time and send men to the nations abroad; they needed them here; they wanted to redeem this desert. Why should they go to Hawaii and other lands on missions, when it seemed that their services were most needed here in Utah, in redeeming the country from its barrenness?

In those days many missionaries went on foot over the plains, third class on the boat, and second on the railroad—if there was any second. Things have changed since then, and today we go on beautiful, palatial ocean liners, with all the conveniences of the world, and we go first class. Not so with these first missionaries who went to Hawaii. They embarked on the voyage, and worked their way to the port of Honolulu, arriving there and wending their way up through the narrow streets to find lodging for the night, and the next day repairing to Punchbowl Hill, or, some say, Pacific Heights; and there they knelt in prayer and dedicated the land of Hawaii and themselves to the preaching of the gospel of Jesus Christ. That was in 1850. Since that time there have been over eight hundred missionaries go to Hawaii. There have been many hundreds and thousands converted. Today we are reaching back and working for the forefathers of those people and are doing work for them, in the temple at Laie. Truly the gospel of Jesus Christ has reached out for the salvation and redemption of the Hawaiian people.

Elder George Q. Cannon, who was the youngest of the first missionaries to go to Hawaii, went from Lahaina to Wailuku, going down the valley of Iao and to the city of Wailuku. As he crossed the Wailuku river, his foot slipped and he fell into the water. Discouraged he arose and intended to retrace his steps, but the Lord revealed to him that he was to go to the city of Wailuku and there the way would be opened up before him, so he continued on his way. Now it happened that a certain chief who lived in that city had a manifestation that a white man would come that day to him with the message of salvation. He related this to his little girl. As Brother Cannon came along, the girl saw him and ran to her father informing him that the white man had come. The chief went out and invited Brother Cannon into his home and Brother Cannon taught him the gospel. That was the means of opening up the work in that place. Brother Cannon learned the language and with the other elders went from city to city, and at Pulehu they performed the first baptisms. It was in this village that Elders David O. McKay, Hugh J. Cannon and E. Wesley Smith, in 1921, the latter then presiding in Hawaii, were visiting when they were led to pray. As they were praying under a beautiful pepper tree, one of the Hawaiian brethren had a manifestation. As they finished the prayer, Elder McKay officiating, the native elder said to Brother E. Wesley Smith: "Did you see an arm extended while Brother McKay was praying?" Brother Smith answered that his eyes were closed and he did not. The other brethren seemed to sense an unusual feeling as if visitors from the unseen were present, and when they were leaving the place Elder McKay declared that the veil between them and the spirit world was very thin. Elder Cannon spoke up and said, "There was no veil." I believe that the spirit of his father was present upon that occasion, as he loved the people of those islands. I believe that he loves them today and that he is interested in them as much as he ever was.

The first missionaries went from this section around to another little town on the east side of the island, and there they gathered in a grass hut one hundred people to hear the message of these strange white men. As they all sat around the mat and heard the voice of this missionary from Utah, they were transfigured before George Q. Cannon, and he saw ninety-seven of them become white, and three of them remained dark. He did not understand. He did not know why it was that three of them would remain dark and all the rest should become light. He received a partial answer to this manifestation when it was learned that ninety-seven of those people in meeting at this time joined the Church, became devout members, lived and died Latter-day Saints, while three of them never did. It is said that they will become a white and delightsome people. They are delightsome at present, and I believe they are going to become white. They are growing whiter from year to year. I have said to myself and to some of my intimate friends that I thought the Hawaiian people would become white and delightsome, through intermarriage. I do not know whether that is according to the doctrines of the Church or not, but they have married the oriental races and married white people on the islands to such an extent that today there are more half casts than there are pure Hawaiians.

Possibly the natives appear light to us and dark to people who are not acquainted with them. When we are laboring among them we do not notice their dark skin, we are one with them. We are not two nations but one nation in the work of the Lord. I remember that twenty-five years ago, on my first mission, when I first arrived in Honolulu, I saw the little Hawaiian boys diving for pennies dropped from the boat. I thought they were dark, but they do not look dark to me today. The Book of Mormon is the only record that reveals the origin of these people, although some people have endeavored to connect them with the negro, which cannot be done.

During the time of the Johnston Army difficulty all the missionaries in the islands and in other lands were called home to Utah. Several thousand of the natives had joined the Church and for a while they were left without missionaries. The Church bought land at Lanai for the purpose of gathering the members of the Church there. Walter M. Gibson, an adventurer and an ambitious man, joined the Church and was sent to the islands as a missionary. He was to go to the Society Islands, but he landed in Honolulu and thought that place was good enough for him, so he stayed. He represented himself as an elder and had his certificate and other credentials to show and thus won the natives who believed him to be one of the leaders of the Church. He gathered the people together at Lanai and ruled over them with a high hand. He took advantage of their native simplicity and established himself among them with almost supreme power. A report reaching President Young of conditions, he sent Elders Ezra T. Benson and Lorenzo Snow, who were apostles, and Elders Joseph F. Smith and William Cluff, down to the Hawaiian Islands to adjust the trouble there with Gibson. Elders Joseph F. Smith and William W. Cluff had been missionaries in the islands and were therefore acquainted with the people and their language, Elder Smith speaking it very fluently. When the brethren arrived they discovered that Walter M. Gibson had organized the members of the Church in various ranks, charging them for the Priesthood he conferred according to the importance of the office. He was also collecting their tithing and spending it as he pleased and thus he was becoming rich at their expense. The missionaries endeavored to get Gibson to repent, but he would not, and so they had to cut him off the Church. After laboring diligently and with much difficulty, they finally got the native Saints to understand that they had been deceived. The brethren predicted that Walter M. Gibson would lose his influence and power and would eventually die in the gutter if he did not repent. After this he rose in power on the islands for a while but eventually was forced to leave and went to San Francisco where the prophecy was literally fulfilled. Mr. Gibson endeavored to convince the Saints that the missionaries were usurpers, and he said: "Hearken to them, if you will, but you know what I have done for you." Elder Joseph F. Smith who was spokesman for the brethren said in substance: "This man whom you uphold as a leader and a representative of the brethren in Salt Lake City is a usurper. He was not sent here. He has gathered you and has changed the ordinances and transgressed the laws of the Church," and finally the people were convinced.

The people after they were convinced gathered again at Laie, where a gathering place was established and where the temple now stands.

I rejoice in having had the privilege of laboring in Hawaii. These eight years have been the sweetest years of my life, and I long to see the interests of the Hawaiian people promoted. I want to see them grow, as I know they will grow under the able leadership of President William M. Waddoups. The work is growing there, and it is marvelous how many God has called together from that land. People today almost concede the Hawaiian people to the "Mormon" Church. I have never seen Chinese and Japanese—those who we claim are not susceptible to the truth—intermarry with the Hawaiian race without their descendants becoming susceptible to the gospel, and we are bringing them now to a knowledge of the truth.

I see my time is up. I pray that the Lord will bless the people through these sessions of conference, that we may be inspired of the Lord in gathering together to hear the word of the Lord.

"Blessed is he who can play upon the harp of life the harmony of God,
Who can see in lofty heights, and moonlit plains,
And wooded dell, and flowing fields of grain,
The love of his own Maker;
Who can hear in song of bird and buzz of bee,
In rippling rills and mighty cataract's fall
The voice of his own Creator;
Who counts himself as one small part of God's great whole,
Yet forms a golden link in life's unbroken chain.
Who sees and knows and feels God's presence everywhere:
He has learned the harmony of love and life,
Of God and man."

Amen.

A male chorus from the choir sang, "Rock of my refuge."

ELDER J. GOLDEN KIMBALL

Of the First Council of Seventy

I am very desirous that what I may say to you good people will be under the influence of the Holy Spirit.

I have been in the service for a long time. If I have ever been vain—and no doubt I have been—I think men are really more vain than women, and that is a hard blow!—I have no ambition at the close of my life other than to serve God and keep his commandments, give service, and do my duty.

I do not know that I have ever had a greater desire in delivering a message to the people than the hope that the Lord will burn it into their hearts. After years of experience, I have learned that it is not what you say that counts, it is what you feel. It is not what the speaker delivers, it is what he thinks. If Latter-day Saints are to fulfil their destiny among the children of men, they must do their own thinking, and men and women and children in this Church, if they keep the commandments of God and are under the influence of the Holy Ghost, are entitled to inspiration, to revelation, to dreams and visions, for their own salvation. But that is as far as you can go, and any person who thinks he is living so close to God that he can direct this Church, unless he repents, he will apostatize, as surely as God lives. God never gave us inspiration and revelation to take the place of the prophet of the living God.

I am a great believer in looking forward, not downward. I am not a believer in looking backward, except for wisdom and for the experience that others have had. With me it is the future. But I want to tell you there can be found a great vision in the past, and what Brother Neff has said about the brethren in the Hawaiian mission can be said of other men. When I think of men, I think of my father. He was a young man—they were all young men at the time of the great apostasy, when there was not a quorum in the Church, from the presidency down, that was not shaken—when Hyrum Smith, the patriarch, the brother of Joseph, whispered in father's ear, "You are to go to England for the salvation of the Church."

One thing I desire to get before you is this: Our people are sensitive to some things, they are full of criticism. God never created a man that could please all the "Mormon" people—and if any one ever tries to please all of them, he will fail. You cannot please all the people. The Savior did not please all. They crucified him and killed all his witnesses. And so it has been throughout history. Some people do not think you can write anything by inspiration and read it. But I want to ask the people, after all the experience I have had, "How can you tell when you have the spirit—when you pray and when you administer? I have never been able to tell until it comes, and when it has come to me and I have thought I had it, some people did not think so.

I have before me, in a written document, something I am going to say. You may not remember it, but I will say it anyway. I never wrote a book in my life and never will, but I have written thousands of things and pigeon-holed them and never read them to anyone else but myself. I want to advise this people, if the Lord ever does give you an inspiration, for heaven's sake write it down and remember it. If Joseph Smith the prophet had not done that, you would never have had some things contained in the Doctrine and Covenants. I have in my possession an inspired writing by my father that no one in this Church outside of a few of his family has ever read and no doubt it never will be in print. Why? Because it was given to Heber C. Kimball for his own good, for his own encouragement, and it would surprise you more than anything you have ever received, if I should stand here and read what God revealed to his servant Heber C. Kimball. But it was not for the Church.

I am about to read something to you. You know I am a native. I guess I look like it too, don't I? I was born in these valleys, up here on the hill, six years after the pioneers arrived. I do not remember much about their hardships and about the famine, but I certainly look like I had passed through the famine! I recall that the first thing these great men did, President Brigham Young and his followers, was to select their inheritances. Heber C. Kimball had the privilege of taking one of these city blocks. And now his posterity are a race of people that we think numbers more than two thousand. He went up on the hill, dug the rocks out, and built a stone wall around the block. And I was kept inside of it on Sundays. And I hate rock walls yet!

I will read to you from a talk I made in San Francisco about four years ago. I have never delivered it or read it since. I desire to find out what you think about it. It is about "The Most Beautiful of Cities," and it begins with a quotation.

Kenneth L. Roberts said: "There is frequently a peacefulness and tranquility about various ancient things like old furniture and old books and old clothes and old cities, provided they were good before they began to grow old, that tend to soothe the minds of those who associate with them."

"The inhabitants of the youngest states and the newest cities are the ones that emit ear-splitting screams of wounded pride and injured innocence at the mildest and most justified of criticisms." "Mormons" may modestly advertise Salt Lake City as a wonder, or an enchanted city and it might sound by comparison with New York, Chicago, or San Francisco like a child's description of a new henhouse, which may or may not be an exaggeration. I read Brisbane's comments as he passed through Salt Lake and, being a native, I branded him as a poor humorist.

I am told, in a mild-mannered way, that Salt Lake City would have had a population of 500,000 people, if 350,000 hadn't gone to California. We have a process of cleaning our city of all growlers and kickers. We smoke 'em out and then the atmosphere clears, the sun shines, the grass turns green and the flowers grow, and we honestly can claim Salt Lake to be—"the Most Beautiful of Cities."

The following excerpts were taken from an article entitled "The West as I Saw Her." I read the article while in California, and if I had not written it down, I never would have had it, because I am like you people, I only hold a pint and I soon run out! The article was written by Shaw Desmond, Irish author and publisher, in the March number of Scribner's Magazine. The article is based on the writer's experience gathered during three visits to America in which he spent nearly a year, lecturing in the chief cities and covering some 50,000 miles:

"There is a City of Dreams in America as little known, so far as I have read her guide-books, as one of Rider Haggard's Lost Cities of Africa. Nobody that I have met in America knows anything about this city, and this especially applies to those who say they have visited it.

"It is easily the most beautiful city I have seen on the North American continent. I think it must be one of the most beautiful cities in the world, and the way to it in mid-winter is hard and cold and cruel; then, all at once, it burst upon me, 'my City Beautiful.' I was running into Salt Lake. Once more I, with whom the Indians had ridden along the invisible trail by the side of which the iron rails had been laid, seen by the eye of imagination, was looking at a tented wagon, at the 'prairie-schooner' of the old days, about it a body of silent men, with mouths of leather and jaws of steel as they broke through the last pass in the mountains to find the land of promise laid out before them with the snow-capped mountains eternally sentinelling," [Do you feel that? I feel that in every fibre of my being] "inside which they were to build their city, the city to be the most beautiful of the cities of the continent.

"Europe believes two things about Salt Lake and believes them periodically. It believes that every man there has at least four wives and that every now and then its streets 'run with blood.' (Europe still has confused ideas about avenging angels.) My first difficulty in Salt Lake was to find a 'Mormon.'" [They are hunting for them yet!] "A red-faced man in a wondrous uniform of gold and crimson with a badge in his hat looked like the real thing, but upon near inspection and conversation, turned out to be a Baptist and a red-hot Baptist at that. He had some mystic job at 'meeting strangers,' though I did not find that he 'took them in.' I rather think they had to be Baptist strangers. Salt Lake City is the city of shocks. I received shocks to every preconceived opinion I had ever had about the 'Mormons,' not only did I discover that plural marriages are unknown, but that it was quite impossible, save by a doubtful effort of imagination, to separate the sheep from the goats, that is to say, the 'Mormon' from the Gentile; and to you kind reader I leave it to decide which are sheep and which are goats." [And you have to have inspiration to separate them today. I am in favor of ear-marking and labeling them, so you will know them!] "I discovered a quiet respect for the 'Mormons' by their Gentile friends, a constant and ever-flowing tribute to 'Mormon' industry, 'Mormon' art, 'Mormon' initiative. The 'Mormons,' I discovered, were not '100' but '101' per cent Americans, obvious by their loyalty to the American flag, proud of their American citizenship, and proving it all by shedding their blood under Uncle Sam in the great war." [By the way, the Kimballs were just as loyal, for Heber C. Kimball had thirty grandsons in the world war. I am happy to say that not one of them was killed—and they did not run, either.]

"I hold no brief for the 'Mormon' outlook," says this Irish poet, "but in a rather lengthy stay in Salt Lake, during which I was afforded unexampled opportunities of investigation free from 'suggestion,' I accumulated enough genuine data, checked from Gentile sources, to cause a revelation of the real 'Mormon,' whenever it is given to the world. I made hosts of friends at Salt Lake, where I lectured to all sorts and conditions of men and women, from the Chamber of Commerce to a lecture under the auspices of the University of Utah. I came to the city without expectations, I left it with the picture of its icy snows under the dawns descending, as I lay in my room with its glass walls, left with the memory for all time of its broad streets, of its giant organ, upon which my 'Mormon' friend permitted me to play, of its white 'Mormon' temple, its lake of the dead and the limitless sage and salt surrounding it. It remains for me a remembrance unforgettable."

Did you ever hear a "Mormon" talk like that? Did you ever hear a "Mormon" damn this country? Well, I want to advise them to quit it. Every "Mormon," son and daughter, ought to lift up his voice in praise to God that he led those great prophets and their people to a place of safety. Think of it for one minute, my father, among the rest, was driven from his homes five times! No wonder they felt to praise God and dedicate this place to his service.

I have now come to what I want to burn into you, and I wish the Lord would give me the power to do it.

A NEW GENERATION HAS ARISEN

A prophet in the wilderness was still crying, but there were few to pay heed—there was scarcely anyone to listen—material force was in evidence in its might. It seemed so foolish to rely on so slender a thing as Divine support.

It ought to be self-evident to a Pagan that arrogance and earthly power can vanish over night, all that is not built upon God shall fail. To trust to material standards of strength brings calamity; material force, as apart from God and opposed to him, cannot succeed. Why can't race-"Mormons" understand that?

A new generation has arisen! The people seem so content, so free from all concern; but like the Jews, in the days of Joseph, they can be hurled from their high position into the bitterness of slavery. And we are going into slavery and bondage, and debt, as fast as we can go!

We older men think our story should be told of our pioneer fathers and mothers, and the faith of our ancestors, and we write a book, preach a sermon or two, and think our task is ended.

This new generation that has arisen have discovered over night that a new world has been born and that the United States of America is about to assume the responsibility of saving the world, and they are content and satisfied.

At no time in the history of the Latter-day Saint people has there been greater danger for the new generation. The danger comes from ease, idleness, and luxury; as there never was a time when the people were spending their means as prodigally as now and ever reaching out after material things.

The prodigal dollar seems to be swallowing all that is great and noble with some of the new and rising generation.

To my mind many of the "Mormon" people are becoming content and self-satisfied. They show evidence of falling down in their spiritual efforts. I know it takes courage to say it. I know that if we say anything to criticize the "Mormon" people, they are disturbed. Well, they need to be disturbed! What they need is a little dynamite! It seems to me a great deal of that which has been gained by faith, adversity, sacrifice and years of hard work is being let loose of by the thoughtless and careless.

Our fathers and mothers died for the faith and we are living on the faith of our pioneer ancestors: But behold! another generation has arisen, and in the very instant of our self-content the silence is broken by our being hurled from our mighty purpose.

Joseph Smith, the mighty prophet, was chosen of God to send forth the message of salvation to the children of men—he was martyred—but that was not the end. It was the beginning of this great work.

President Brigham Young rightfully succeeded him, and his followers with him fled to the Rocky Mountains.

Brigham Young led the way for the first treckers of adventure-some spirit in the year 1847, and he and his followers were the original builders in what Daniel Webster christened "The Great American Desert."

On entering the Salt Lake Valley, Divine Intelligence at once manifested itself in all his deliberations. "This is the place." Why, to some people that has become a chestnut, a hoary chestnut! But it was inspiration from God. "This is the place." There beat in the heart of this great man—he was a master, a prophet of God—a great load of care, the destiny of his people! How I have suffered for just being the father of a family, the destiny of my children! And here was a great prophet, with the destiny of a great people.

One has to believe to understand the destiny, object, and purpose of this people. The leaders understood and believed; they knew; God revealed it to them. President Brigham Young and his followers said, We will make this barren waste bloom and furnish clean, unsullied wealth for thousands of poor people from all over the world, who have been crushed under the Juggernaut of our Christian civilization—we are going to plant them under the shadow of the Rocky Mountains, we will create an Eden out of the desert, we will lay out townsites, cities, and build churches and schoolhouses and raise wheat and vegetables. God's children shall be converted to the gospel of Jesus Christ and be given land. They shall have a chance for life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They shall know their toil will bring them some returns, so that they can have a home and a hope for the future.

It was a big thought, a great idea, manifested by Divine Intelligence. He was a prophet. He had a vision of the future.

These great leaders did not want the land and water for themselves—they wanted men to be God's agents—stewards for God, and hold the land in trust as a sacred inheritance. This land was to belong to the lowly of the earth and to be saved for the hewers of stone and the drawers of water.

When I think of my father, who had his inheritance, owned the land where most of the Capitol grounds are and away off to the left, I remember that he took these poor English people that had emigrated from Europe, and took them up on the hill, showed them a lot, and asked them if they would build a home, and they said they would, and it cost them $2.50! Heber C. Kimball and the brethren never speculated and made money off the people. Any charges to the contrary are false.

These valleys in the mountains were to be made to bloom and blossom for the poor, whose hope is the land, that gave them birth and life and would receive them in its bosom when they died and made a safe return to their home.

Just take the time to think of the thousands of acres of lonely, thirsty land waiting for centuries to be reclaimed from the ruins of ages. They saw in vision green fields, and farms, just as Joseph Smith prophesied it would be. "It is the place where you'll find all the things your souls are hungering for. Where the people will own big farms, with green fields of wheat and grass, with purple blossoms and long rows of fruit trees and vegetables." Is that true? It should be true, and that was the intent and purpose of our leaders. My father pleaded with his family, almost as he would plead for life, to keep their inheritance. I am the only one of them on the block, and I am trying to sell, too!

All will be most beautiful, in the Desert! Through those words I can get a vision. I have a moving-picture mind. It was a vision, a dream come true. Nobody was there to despoil their dream.

A new generation has arisen. Think of your pioneer fathers and mothers who built better than they knew. Think of the men, women, and children toiling in sweat shops, with little food, families without money, without hope and without fuel, facing cold winters in these great cities, who have been gathered to a barren empire which our ancestors have transformed into an Eden—a land of liberty—a home for the oppressed of God's children, where they can have life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience. The stranger has found his way amongst us and many of us have "sold our inheritance for a mess of pottage" and are seeking elsewhere hoping for more ease, more idleness, more luxury. In this once lonely, sage-covered, wind-swept valley there should be erected a granite monument and written thereon this epitaph:

"Who seeks for heaven alone to save his soul,
 May keep the path, but will not reach the goal,
 While he who walks in love may wander far,
 Yet God will bring him where the blessed are."

Henry VanDyke.

On that occasion, looking upon those people in the San Francisco chapel and I prophesied; (You know I am a son of a prophet.) and our young elder there, Joseph E. Larkin, wrote:

"A prophecy made by President J. Golden Kimball of the First Council of Seventy, at a meeting held in the San Francisco L. D. S. chapel, March 16, 1924, and is, as near as I remember, as follows:

"I prophesy that before many of you go to the other side you will have a burning desire in your hearts to return to the places where the leaders of the Church have counseled the Saints to settle, and you will give anything in the world to have a home there."

Brethren and sisters, I am told that North and South America is Zion, but with all of its beauty and splendor and wonderful opportunities, there is no place in the world as safe for the Latter-day Saints as where God's servants had their inheritance. God bless you. Amen.

The choir sang, "Hark, hark, my soul," with Jane Van Roosendaal, Nellie Katwyk and Nellie Bruin singing the solo parts.

President Kimball announced that the audience had certainly appreciated the music rendered by the Choir, "I always feel to bless our singers."

The benediction was pronounced by Elder Arthur Barnes.

SECOND OVERFLOW MEETING

A second overflow meeting of the conference was held in the Assembly Hall at 2 o'clock, Sunday afternoon, April 3.

Elder Rulon S. Wells, of the First Council of Seventy, presided.

The music was furnished by the Dutch choir, of Salt Lake City, Elder A. Van Roosendaal, conductor; Elder Frank W. Asper at the organ.

The choir and congregation sang, "How firm a foundation."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder R. S. Collet.

Miss Nellie Bruin sang a solo, "Save me, O Lord."

ELDER BRIGHAM S. YOUNG

Former President Northwestern States Mission

My dear brethren and sisters: It is a great privilege I enjoy in standing before you for a few moments. During that time I trust that I may enjoy the spirit of the conference, which has marked the preceding meetings of the morning. I have recently returned from a mission to the Northwestern states. It was a glorious period in my life. One of my regrets is that every man in our communities may not have the pleasure and enjoy the profit of presiding over a mission. It is one of the finest and most developing experiences that can come into the life of a Latter-day Saint.

Perhaps the most baffling and most difficult problem to overcome in missionary labor is the indifference of the world to the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. We learn that men of intelligence, who are otherwise engaged in the deep quest for truth, give no consideration to the most wonderful and vital philosophy that has ever been revealed to the world, in the system incorporated in the gospel of Jesus Christ and revealed through the Prophet Joseph Smith. It establishes an idealism that is incomparable, in the history of the world, except where the truth has formerly existed. Men who are seeking the good of their fellows, if they would but heed the call of the gospel, could accomplish to the fullest of their heart's desire. I was disappointed in men whom I met, men of high character, men of intelligence, men with vast intellectual understanding, but who were incapable, apparently, of seeing either the philosophy or the wondrous saving power incorporated in the system of theology revealed through the Prophet Joseph Smith. And yet when I come to draw comparisons between the indifference of the people of the world and, unhappily, the indifferences manifest among the people here at home, I am not so greatly astonished.

Today marks the 97th anniversary of the establishment of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. How far have we who have lived in the light of that gospel progressed under this wonderful system that God has given us for our development? You have but to ask yourselves what effect it has had in our lives; and as it has affected our lives, so have we made progress. As we advantaged ourselves of that which the gospel has for all men, and particularly for those of us who have been reared in it, to that degree are we extended in the breadth and depth of our understanding. The gospel is of a character that a man may be benefited by it if he will, but it has no help for the man who fails to take advantage of that which it offers. It is a perfect system of self-development. A man can rise to the most exalted heights, if he will; or he may loiter by the way, waste the day-light until he is overtaken in his darkness and thence must grope his way, because he failed to take advantage of the light.

Today is our day, brethren and sisters. We cannot hope, when the night comes, when the grave has demanded its own, for the development and progress that is available to us today. These bodies of ours God has given us for development. We are separated from them when we go into the grave. We are not ourselves, we are only partial when the body and the spirit are separated. Why will we loiter, instead of developing that which is perfect, the human soul. Separated, it is a divided thing; together, it may rise to the most exalted height. We preach to the world faith. Have we faith? We preach to the world repentance. Do we repent? Do we place our feet each day upon the mistakes of yesterday, using them as stepping stones to a higher life, to the new birth symbolized by the baptism of water? Have we taken to ourselves every day the new birth of the Spirit? Have we risen to more exalted heights? Are we in closer communion with God than we were yesterday? If not, we have failed to take advantage of the opportunity offered in the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The prophet said, "You must acquire capacity." To do what? To endure, to suffer, to wait, to be patient, to plod, ever with the goal in view of the service of the Almighty and the salvation of his children. The reason God is God is because he has acquired all for which we are laboring. To the degree that we fail in acquisition and development, to that degree must we wait before we can come into the presence of him who has overcome all things.

It is true that we have the gospel of Jesus Christ, but it is only of value to us as we profit by what it offers. Are we profiting? That is for us to answer. If we are not honest, if not truthful, do not love our neighbors; if we are not devoted to the service of God, we have lost, have failed in development, failed in expansion. We have failed, as the Prophet adjured us, in the acquisition of capacity.

The glorious thing in this gospel to me is, as the Prophet has told us, that we must acquire capacity that we may learn how to be gods ourselves. The most tremendous thought that was ever revealed to the human family was, that we, the sons of God, may rise to be what he is. That is the most glorious thing that ever animated the human heart or stimulated the human mind, that we, weak, erring though we are, may be even as God, our Father. What a tremendous thought. Can we do it by permitting ourselves to be engaged in the grovelling things of the world, or descend into the filth that marks the age in which we live, or shall we rise above it? As Brother J. Golden Kimball said here this morning, shall we think for ourselves? Shall we be of those who radiate the light of the gospel of the Son of God, or shall we follow after the world, partaking of what the world has to offer and sharing in the sufferings that must inevitably ensue? Sin is death, as righteousness and the works of God are salvation. Let us hold, as Shakespeare says, a mirror up to our souls wherein we may see reflected what we are. We are radio stations. From us emanates just what we are. We are sending out into the universe these flashes that come from the human heart, that come from the soul which is a god in embryo.

This people, after 97 years of activity and teaching, should be as a city set upon a hill. And, as was said here this morning, Salt Lake City is a noted city, by reason of its history, its manner of establishment, the circumstances which produced the development of this intermountain country. We are a noted people, by reason of the achievements of the Latter-day Saints in the valleys of the mountains. This is a remarkable city. But, if we were living as the Almighty intends that we should live, we would be so remarkable that no man or woman would come among us but would testify of the truth that this is indeed the city of the Saints, a place where God abides.

I am anxious for our people. I am anxious that the gospel of Jesus Christ may be extended to the world. We can preach it. May all of us in our lives so manifest the glories of the gospel that men and women shall praise God because of having seen manifest in us the gospel of his Son. This I ask in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN H. ANDERSON

Former President Swedish Mission

My dear brethren and sisters: I sincerely pray that God may inspire me with his holy Spirit in what I shall say.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has a message to the world: they declare that God created the heavens and the earth and all that is in them; that he is the Father of our spirits; that we lived with him in the eternal world; and that Jesus Christ is his only begotten Son, the Savior and Redeemer of the world. Further, that God arranged a plan before this earth was organized by which his sons and daughters who would obey could return into his presence.

The fundamental of that plan is faith in God and in his Son Jesus Christ. Jesus, in speaking to the Jews, called their attention to this very important fact. He asked them, "Do ye believe in God?" They claimed to believe in God. Then he said, "Believe also in me." Have the people of the world the message of Jesus Christ? Do they actually believe in him as the Savior and Redeemer of the world? Christ says, "Whither I go ye know, and the way ye know. Thomas saith unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way? Jesus saith unto him, I am the way, the truth and the life: no man cometh unto the Father, but by me." Jesus is the way, the truth and the light; no man cometh back to God except through Jesus Christ.

This plan requires not only faith in God and in his Son, but it requires repentance from sin, leaving off wickedness and all that which is wrong before God; for if one desires to enter into the presence of God, one's sins must be taken away. The plan provides baptism for the remission of sins. And in order that one may remain faithful and true to God, so that he shall not falter by the way-side, a further arrangement is provided, the bestowal of the Holy Ghost, which leads men and women into all truth, leads them back to God, and makes it possible for them to live that Christ-like life which shall eventually prepare them for, and entitle them to, eternal life.

We read in the holy scriptures that Jesus took Peter, James and John upon the Mount and there conversed with Moses and Elias, and a cloud over-shadowed them, and a voice was heard from the cloud saying, "This is my Beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased, hear ye him." Was this voice only to Peter, James and John? It was the voice of God to all his children, born and unborn, declaring that this was his Son Jesus Christ, the well beloved. "Hear ye him." Have the people of the world caught the echo of the sound of that voice? Has faith entered into their souls? Do they believe Jesus Christ to be the very Son of God, as the Father declared he was? More than a hundred years ago this same voice came back to the earth and declared to the boy prophet, Joseph Smith, that this was his beloved Son and to hear him, and from that day to this the message has gone forth from the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints that God has again spoken, declared anew the divinity of his Son, the way to salvation, the plan prepared for his children, that it might be possible for them to return to him and gain eternal life.

What the world needs today is a spiritual awakening, a realization of what God requires of them, a turning away from sin, seeking the way to which Jesus Christ calls attention.

Jesus remarked to his disciples, when he sent them out to preach the gospel and to baptize in the name of the Father and of the Son and the Holy Ghost, "I will be with you even unto the end of the world." But what requirements did he make? "Observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." That warning is to all the world, to those who accept Jesus Christ and the gospel plan. They are required to observe and keep all of the commandments and the sayings of Jesus. If it so be that we do that, he will be with us even to the end of the world. Salvation and exaltation are promised only upon condition that we remain faithful unto the end.

I bear witness to you this afternoon that the gospel of Jesus Christ is restored and that this is the Church and kingdom of God established upon the earth. I also bear witness to you of the truth of the saying of Jesus when he said that the kingdom of heaven is likened unto a pearl of great price, that when men found it they went and sold all that they possessed that they might possess that pearl of great price.

The gospel of Jesus Christ means more to me than all the gold and silver of this world, and all that this world has to offer. I prize my standing in this Church above all. And I pray that God will bless you, and each of us, that we may continue faithful unto the end, and those who have not yet made covenant with God, that they may seek until they shall find. Go to God and he will not turn away from you but will show you the way, the truth, that shall eventually save and exalt you in his presence. God bless you. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH QUINNEY, JR.

Former President Canadian Mission

I believe I appreciate the great responsibility that rests upon one who is called upon to proclaim the gospel of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. Four years ago, it was my privilege to enter the ministry in the Dominion of Canada. During that length of time there have been many experiences which have come to me, for which I am grateful. Like President Young, I feel that if it were possible for every man to be called into the ministry, what a wonderful blessing it would be to him. I appreciate beyond my power to express to you today the honor that came to me to preside over one of the missions of the Church. I am grateful to the authorities of the Church that they have had confidence in me that has given me inspiration and encouragement to work in that part of God's vineyard. I am grateful that I have been associated with young men and women who have devoted themselves to the work of the ministry, in bearing their testimony concerning this great and mighty work. I am grateful that I succeeded a man who had spent a number of years in different parts of the world, whose experience taught me many things. I am grateful that there has been a man chosen and selected to take my place who is filled with the testimony of this work, whose fine intelligence and spirit will count much for his leadership in that part of the world. It was my privilege to accompany him during three or more weeks through different parts of the mission, and I want to say in favor of President Charles H. Hart, that he has won for himself a place in the hearts of those with whom he has come in contact. I am sure that his leadership will bring many souls to a knowledge of this work. I am grateful for my honorable release. I am grateful for the responsibilities that now confront me. And through the help of God I hope and pray that I shall always be engaged in some activity where my life will touch the hearts of men and women and inspire them to a greater realization of the greatness of the gospel of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. This period of my life in the Canadian mission has been the greatest since I can remember. I have filled missions before, but I believe that I have a deeper understanding of life as it fits into the gospel of our Lord and Master than I ever have had before. My testimony concerning the divinity of this work has grown, and my joy has been when the opportunity has come to me to stand in the presence of men and women, on the streets, in the halls and in the cottages, bearing witness to the restoration of the gospel of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ.

[Just prior to the time of my departure from the mission field, I was invited into a home, and in the course of our evening's conversation, naturally we drifted upon those principles that we were advocating. The gentleman of the home made this statement, "I believe that you have one of the finest and best religions that I have ever known, but there is one thing that I cannot understand or comprehend: Why is it necessary in this day and time to have a prophet, or prophets of God?" I asked him if he accepted the Bible as being the word of God. His reply to me was that he accepted this sacred record.

"You believe, do you, that Adam, in the beginning, talked with God, and that it became necessary for God to reveal to him his mind concerning the gospel of Jesus Christ at that time?" He said, "I accept that without any mental reservations."

"You accept the thought, do you, that is expressed in Holy Writ, that God directed Noah through the light and power of his Holy Spirit to do the work that he did, and that Noah was in constant communication with him concerning the work that he should do, in order to bring the gospel message to those who were then living?"

"I accept of that," he said.

"And you accept the historical record that Enoch talked with God, and that all that Enoch did in bringing to pass the proper interpretation of the gospel of our Lord was a necessary thing in his day?"

"I accept that without any mental reservations," he said again. And so we went down through the prophets until we came to the day of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. We asked him the question if he accepted in his heart the plan of life and salvation as it is recorded in the New Testament, and that that plan of life and salvation affected human life here, hereafter, and in the days before we came into the earth. He said, "So far as I have been able to see and understand, I believe Jesus Christ is the Son of God, that he is the author of such a plan as you suggest, and that he was guided and directed by the spirit of revelation in all the things that he accomplished while he was upon the earth; that, through his sonship, through his mission as the Messiah, as the Redeemer of the human race, he brings not only salvation here upon the earth but an exaltation through obedience to his principles in the kingdom of God, in the hereafter."

I said to him, "If you believe all of that, I think that I am able to reason with you and show you how necessary it is to accept Joseph Smith as an instrument in God's hand in bringing to pass the restoration of the gospel of our Lord and Master Jesus Christ."

He replied, "I would be glad if you could impress that thought in my heart and in my mind."

We therefore referred to that passage of scripture that we so frequently use in the ministry, the revelation of John, while he was upon the isle of Patmos: "And I saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people. Saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." And I asked him if he believed in that scripture.

He said, "I must accept of it, if I accept of Jesus Christ the Lord, because it was his gospel that the angel was to bring."

"Then you must accept the thought that either that angel has come and delivered his message, or that he is to come."

"I believe," said he, "that that angel must come or that he has come."

Then we spent the remainder of the evening in explaining to him the claims that were made by the Prophet Joseph Smith concerning the advent of the angel Moroni, bringing to him the everlasting gospel, as we see it and understand it and feel it, as we read those passages in the Book of Mormon. We were able to come to a conclusion that the gospel of our Lord and Master had been restored to the earth. His heart was lifted and there seemed to be a spirit take possession of him and he praised God. From the expressions that followed, weeks afterwards, I am sure of his appreciation of the knowledge and the feeling that he had concerning the divinity of this work.

My brethren and sisters, I believe there is no need in all the world that is of greater importance to us than to have a deeper meaning of the gospel of our Lord and Master. I wonder, sometimes, if we understand that passage of scripture that is so frequently quoted in the world: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." I wonder if we catch the significance and the depth of that thought, that love. We know our love for our own offspring, and how difficult it would be for us to sacrifice any one of them for a cause, unless we were commanded of God. I believe that we can understand pretty well what Abraham was up against when he was commanded by God the eternal Father to offer his son Isaac as a sacrifice. But that was not comparable to the love that God had for his children here upon the earth, that he would offer his only begotten Son to redeem mankind, to introduce into the world a plan of life and salvation, that by yielding obedience to it we would receive our exaltation in God's celestial kingdom. And that is what the message of Jesus Christ means to every man and woman in this world, so far as they are able to understand it.

I am thankful, beyond my power to express, that I have had the opportunity of bearing witness that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of the living God, that the gospel of redemption was instituted by him in the eternal worlds before his advent into mortality, that I was a party with you in accepting of that plan. I am grateful that I have had the privilege of bearing witness that the restoration of that gospel has come to mankind through the instrumentality of the Prophet Joseph Smith.

I stand as a living witness to the healing power of God, my eternal Father. Had it not been for the power of the Priesthood of God, I should not be here today, I should have passed on years ago. But through the love of God, through his son Jesus Christ, the recognition of his Priesthood, the healing power thereof, I have been permitted to live on the earth, to leave my testimony not only at home but in many of the nations of the world and on the islands of the seas. I bear it to you at this particular time, and ask God to bless it and sanctify it to our use and us to his service, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir sang, "God is with his people," Elder D. Jongejan singing the solo part.

ELDER E. L. BUTLER

Former President Samoan Mission

When I was introduced as one who has been president of the Samoan mission, I imagine, possibly many of you felt somewhat as Brother Parry, who, when I was bringing some children with me through the Temple grounds with a party of tourists a week or so ago, asked if there were any missionaries present, and if so to stand up. When I arose, he said, "Brother, where were you a missionary?" I said, "In Samoa." And he said, after scratching his head, "All right, I'll bite. Where is Samoa?"

I assure you that it is indeed a pleasure to me to be here today. I certainly enjoyed the first meeting of this conference in the Tabernacle this morning, the good sermons of President Grant and President Ivins. It has been nearly six years since I had the opportunity of attending a general conference of our Church. I have been in the islands for five years and four months on this, my second, mission to Samoa. In all, I have spent about nine years in the islands.

Possibly that mission seems insignificant to many in this audience, but it might surprise some of you to tell you that we have more adherents to our Church in Samoa than we have in the whole great continent of Australia. And I believe there are just as faithful souls among the Saints in that mission as there are in any other mission in the world. I believe that last year we had more converts in that mission, with our eighteen missionaries, than they had with somewhat more than forty in the Australian mission. They are sincere converts, and they are a fine race of people. And what I would like to say today, if God will bless me with his Holy Spirit while I stand before you, is something that will cause the mothers, the fathers, or the brothers and sisters, or those who are supporting their loved ones in the various mission fields, to feel that their means are not wasted. I want to thank the fathers and the mothers, yes, and the brothers and the sisters, of those missionaries we have in Samoa for the hearty support they have given them, in the way of encouraging letters, and in the money expended to care for those missionaries while they are in the mission field. Brethren and sisters, your means and your kind words are not wasted. Those missionaries are giving an account of themselves, are doing a splendid work; and the prophet of God is not wrong when he is sending out somewhat more than 1,200 missionaries each year to different parts of the world. As Brother Young and Brother Quinney have said, it is one of the grandest opportunities that comes into a man's or a woman's life. Many of us who are in this audience are missionaries or have been missionaries. Some of you are sending your boys and girls; some of you are waiting for their return. Sometimes we feel that it is a sacrifice, that it is hard to raise the means to support John while he is away, or Mary while she is in the mission field. But it is just as essential that we work for the development of the spiritual side of the nature of our children as it is that we work for the development of their mentality, or the development of the physical side of their natures. With all due respect to the work accomplished by the auxiliary organizations of our Church, the greatest training our children get is when they are in the mission field preaching the gospel.

I want to tell of a few little incidents that happened while I was in the mission field, just to illustrate the experiences that your sons have. After I left Salt Lake City and while we were on board the steamer, I was in charge of a company of eleven missionaries, a number of them going to Honolulu, the others to the Samoan mission. On the way between here and the Hawaiian Islands, there was on board an officer of the Reorganized Church, and we had many opportunities for a discussion of the principles of the gospel. At Honolulu another officer of the Reorganized Church came on board, and he asked the privilege of explaining to these young men the difference between our doctrines and those of the Reorganized Church. He said, "Some day we expect to have all you 'Mormons' come in with us in the true Church." I said, "All right, brother, but if you want to explain your side of the question to these young men, I think it no more than fair that I have a chance to answer you and have them all listen." He said that was fair. I said, "I have no doubt that any one of them could answer you all right, but I ask that privilege."

We went to one of the largest staterooms on the boat, and for an hour and a half this man explained the principles of his religion and the difference between the "Mormon" Church and the Reorganized Church. We did not have time that day to finish our discussion, but the next day we met in this same stateroom and for about an hour and a half I answered his arguments one by one to the best of my ability. I felt satisfied when these young men came up and shook my hand and said, "Thank God, we are 'Mormons.'"

Brethren and sisters, as mission presidents, we are doing all we can for the development of your boys and girls who are placed under our care. We are doing our best for their benefit, to see that the spiritual side of their natures are developed as they should be. But do not expect too much of the mission! Do not expect too much of a mission president. I say, do not expect too much, but do all you can at home before they go on missions to see that they live their religion. Do not believe that old saying that a rough and ready boy, or one who has sown his wild oats, makes the best missionary. It may be true to the extent that the boy or girl who has the energy in them makes the best missionary, but it is not true that the one who has sown wild oats makes the best missionary. That is not true, because he has to overcome many of the characteristics developed through his life before he can be a true missionary.

We have a varied experience in our mission. We have to learn another language, and we meet and do most of our work among the islanders, the natives. But we also have the opportunity of meeting the white people who are there. One or two instances I would like to relate.

About three years ago, my wife and I were asked by a chaplain of the navy in Tonga Tonga, Tutuila, Samoa, to take charge of his service. (This is in line with the statement of President Grant this morning, speaking of the tolerance that is shown today toward our work.) The chaplain sat in the back of the hall. We had an audience of about forty-five or fifty, consisting mainly of the officers of the U. S. Navy with their wives. Governor Kellogg of American Samoa was present. We did our best to present the truths of the gospel to those people. Most of them had never heard the principles of our religion. You can judge of our success by the fact that when that meeting was closed, from the Governor down, every one came and shook our hands and invited us into their homes—something which had never been done before. Later we had an opportunity of holding service there a number of times. The youngest elder in our mission at that time, Elder Benham, from Clinton, held service there. At one time when the chaplain had gone away the Governor came to me and told me that he was going to ask one of our missionaries to take charge of the Thanksgiving service for the Navy, because the chaplain would be away. Elder Benham, who had associated with these people, was chosen to take charge of that service. That chaplain had experienced difficulty in getting more than five to ten out to his services, but on the morning when Elder Benham went down, the sailors, the officers, got together and they were practically all unanimous in their decision to attend the service—because of their love and respect for the “Mormon” missionary; not because of the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ, but on account of their love and respect for that young man who was holding the service.

We had the opportunity of entertaining Sir Charles Fergusson, the Governor General of New Zealand, and Lady Fergusson at our mission headquarters in Apia, Samoa, together with Sir George Richardson, the Governor of Western Samoa, and Lady Richardson, his wife. I presented both of those gentlemen with a volume of the book, The Fruits of Mormonism, by Dr. F. S. Harris and N. I. Butt. I learned afterwards that the gentlemen read those books. They acknowledged to me that they did not know anything about “Mormonism,” but they told one of our elders later, when they visited one of the other islands, that they were interested in our doctrines. At the time that I was released to come home and my successor, Elder Willard Smith, from Canada, was appointed to take my place, we called upon Sir George Richardson at his home. I might say, incidentally, that it is the old home of Robert Louis Stevenson which is now the Government home. Our mission headquarters are in the shadow of the hill upon which is located the grave of Robert Louis Stevenson. We called at the home, and met Sir George Richardson and Lady Richardson, and introduced President Smith and his wife. Afterwards we met him in his office, and we talked over business affairs, and he said that he had great respect for the work we are doing in Samoa, and said that as far as it is in his power, he will give us his support. He said that he and his wife had often talked about the character of the “Mormon” elders. He said there had been many come to Samoa since he had been there, three and a half years, and he had never known one of them to commit an act that would bring disrepute upon his name. And he said, “You know, Elder Butler, how many young men I have had to send back to New Zealand because of their acts in coming to this island. Why is it that your boys come out here, young men, and can stay here three years, and we never hear of a smirch upon one of their names, but our boys come from New Zealand in governmental capacity for government positions, and we have to send a certain per cent of them back, because their acts are something that bring a stigma upon the government?" I said, "It is the government that they have in their own homes and the teachings under which they are reared."

I feel that I have talked long enough. I pray the blessings of our Father in heaven upon this audience, upon our conference, and I want all of you fathers and mothers to feel that whatever you expend in sending your boys and girls upon missions is well expended.

God bless you is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER ANDREW JENSON

Assistant Church Historian

Just before Christ ascended into heaven, he addressed his apostles as follows: "All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth. Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you." (Matt. 28:18-20.)

In obedience to that command the apostles of old and others preached the gospel, first, in Palestine, and later, in the surrounding countries. Paul, the apostle of the Gentiles, was the first missionary, as far as history tells us, to testify of the risen Redeemer in Syria, Asia Minor, Greece, Italy, etc. It is not known into how many countries the missionaries of the earlier Christian Church extended their operations, but it is an established fact that they preached in most, if not in all, the countries bordering on the Mediterranean. Some legends, at least, would have Thomas and others preach the gospel in England, as well as in far-off India. It must be remembered that the world was not known to the people in those days as it is now. For instance, America was perhaps not known to the people of the eastern world, nor was the south part of Africa known to the nations, in the northern countries, until centuries later.

The angel designed to restore the gospel anew in our day is heralded by John the Revelator in the following language: "And I [John] saw another angel fly in the midst of heaven, having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell on the earth, and to every nation, and kindred, and tongue, and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God, and give glory to him; for the hour of his judgment is come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sea, and the fountains of waters." (Rev. 14:6.)

While the prediction reads that the angel had the everlasting gospel to preach unto them that dwell on the earth, it is not to be supposed that he personally would have to proclaim it with his own voice, or by his own exertion to everybody. The natural conclusion is, that men in mortality would be called, as had been the case in all former dispensations, to do the missionary work among their fellow-men. Thus it was that Joseph Smith was chosen as an instrument in the hands of the Lord to usher in a new dispensation, and no sooner had he been favored with a glorious vision, early in the spring of 1820 (in which he saw the Father and the Son), than he bore testimony of what he had seen and heard. Afterwards he received several visits from the Angel Moroni, in whose appearance the Latter-day Saints see the fulfilment of John's prediction. Several years passed during which other holy messengers restored the Priesthood to the earth through the instrumentality of Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, and as soon as the Church was organized missionary labors were commenced in earnest. And while Oliver Cowdery is credited with preaching the first gospel sermon ever delivered by any elder of the Church in our dispensation, it is but fair to the Prophet Joseph Smith that he should be called the first Latter-day Saint missionary, for ever since he had received his first vision, in 1820, he, even in the midst of severe persecutions and sufferings, ceased not bearing his testimony to the effect that he had conversed with angels and had been chosen of the Lord to introduce a new gospel dispensation.

By careful study of the early historical documents of the Church we have been able to ascertain that the Church sent out at least sixteen missionaries in 1830, including Joseph Smith and Oliver Cowdery, already named. In addition to these, David Whitmer, Samuel H. Smith, Joseph Smith, Sr., Don Carlos Smith, Parley P. Pratt, Hyrum Smith, Newel Knight, Richard Ziba Peterson, Peter Whitmer, Jr., Sidney Rigdon, Frederick G. Williams, John Murdock and Orson Pratt, all performed missionary labors in several of the states in 1830. The record also shows that fifty-eight missionaries were sent out from the headquarters of the Church to preach the restored gospel, in 1831, seventy-two in 1832, forty-one in 1833, one hundred eleven in 1834, and so on.

Until 1837, the preaching by the elders was confined to the United States and Canada, but in 1837, Heber C. Kimball and others opened up the great missionary work which since that time has been carried on continuously in the British Isles. In 1843, the first missionaries were called to preach the restored gospel to a people who did not understand the English language. I have reference to the Society Islands mission, which was opened early in 1844 by Noah Rogers, Addison Pratt and Benjamin F. Grouard, who were called as missionaries to the islands of the Pacific in 1843. Two or three thousand natives of Tubuai, the Tuamotu Islands, and adjacent groups soon became identified with the Church.

During the exodus of the Saints from Nauvoo in 1846 and 1847, missionary labors were somewhat at a standstill, as many of the young brethren who had previously been engaged in the missionary fields were chosen as pioneers, or as soldiers in the Mormon Battalion, but after the Saints had found a more nearly permanent home in the valleys of the Rocky Mountains, missionary labors were carried on with vigor and much success. Then it was that the first missionaries were called to continental Europe, and also to the Hawaiian Islands; soon branches of the Church were raised up in several European countries, and missions established, most of which are in existence to this day. Altogether the Church has established about forty distinct missions, known by the following titles: United States, Canadian, Palestine, Tahitian, French, Italian, Scandinavian, Swiss, Icelandic, South American, German, Maltese, West Indian, Gibraltar, South African, Chinese, New Zealand, Siam, Netherlands, Samoan, Austrian, Finnish, Mexican, Turkish, Belgian, Tongan, Japan, Armenian, etc.

The missionary labors in the United States have been grouped into several distinct missions, each of which includes several states, such as the Eastern States, the Northern States, the Southern States, the Indian Territory, the Central States, the Western States, the Northwestern States, the California and the Northcentral States. The original Scandinavian mission has also been divided into the Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian missions. Also the British mission has, at times, been segregated into smaller groups which have been known under different titles, such as the English, the Welsh, the Scotch and the Irish. By recognizing these general sub-divisions we find that the Church since its organization, in 1830, has established about forty distinct and separate missions, of which twenty-seven are still in existence.

After a thorough study of Church history, and by gathering information from all possible sources, we are now able to state from actual count that the Church, since its first organization in 1830, and until the close of the year 1926, has sent approximately 35,275 missionaries out from the headquarters of the Church to preach the gospel in many lands and climes. But this number does not by any means represent all the missionaries who have labored for the spread of the gospel. For, while the elders delegated and sent out from the headquarters of the Church usually opened up the several missions throughout the world, thousands of local elders (that is, converts who in the different states and countries were ordained to the ministry) have labored with equal zeal and success; and particularly in countries where the English language is not universally spoken, these local, or native, elders have had, in many instances, even more success than some of those sent out from headquarters. In earlier days there were perhaps twenty local missionaries to each American elder in the British Isles, the Scandinavian countries, and even in Germany and Switzerland. That rule, however, has been reversed in later years when most of the missionary work has been done by American elders. But taking a retrospective glance at the missionary operations of the Church, during the ninety-seven years of its existence, we are safe in making the assertion that, at least, 70,000 elders and missionary sisters, called and set apart regularly to the ministry, have been engaged in actual missionary labors in the world, by maintaining that the local, or native, elders have equalled in number the missionaries sent out from Church headquarters.

In view of these facts, it may consistently be left to the good judgment of fair-minded persons who are interested in the great Latter-day work, commenced by the Prophet Joseph Smith under divine guidance, whether the elders and missionaries of the Church have been true to their calling to preach the gospel as they have been commanded, to every nation, kindred, tongue and people. And especially when it is considered that this great host of laborers in God's vineyard have preached and labored mostly without purse or scrip, or at least have done their work at their own expense, or at the expense of parents, relatives and friends.

If there are any countries in the world which have not been covered by Latter-day Saint missionaries, it is surely not the fault of the Church, nor is it to be ascribed to any neglect on the part of its missionaries. It is mostly due to the fact that religious liberty does not exist in all nations, and that, in many instances, our elders have been prohibited by stringent laws from fulfilling the divine command. In several countries they have even been forbidden to land, and in other countries where they have succeeded in landing, they have been imprisoned and banished. I am convinced that the Church authorities have always been willing, and are still willing, to send elders to every nation under the sun, whose governments and inhabitants would be willing to receive them. God grant that the elders of modern Israel may soon enjoy the privilege of preaching the gospel, without hindrance, in all the world. Amen.

ELDER RULON S. WELLS

Of the First Council of Seventy

I have greatly rejoiced in the testimonies and instructions we have received from our brethren, and in the excellent music which has been rendered here in this session of conference. Surely our hearts have been filled and we have rejoiced in the blessings of our heavenly Father. No greater work was ever undertaken than that of saving the souls of the children of men. No greater work has the Lord God of heaven ever undertaken than to save the souls of his children. It is the grandest, the greatest undertaking that ever has been inaugurated. Even he who fashioned the heavens and the earth, and all things that in them are, has no greater work than that of saving his own children. We find that in the revelations of God given to the Prophet Joseph, as recorded in The Pearl of Great Price. Indeed, it is the writings of Moses, translated by the gift and power of God, through Joseph Smith the prophet, wherein he says, "This is my work and my glory, to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man." We may look out upon this great universe in which we live; the planet on which we stand, the earth, is merely a little speck in that great universe; yet, he it is who made that universe. And this earth upon which we stand, with all of its wonderful mechanism, with the wonderful revolutions which this earth makes upon its own axis, once in twenty-four hours, giving us day and night, and then upon its orbit around the sun in its allotted time of 365 days 5 hours 46 minutes and 48 seconds, year in and year out with mathematical precision! What a wonderful thing it is! The other planets make similar revolutions in their allotted times. And then again we look farther out into the universe and see those glittering stars, each one, as we are told by astronomers, is a blazing sun, having its own planetary system similar to the one of our own solar system. How marvelous is the work of God, all over this universe!

Is there anything greater than the making of a universe? Yes, to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of God's children. The worlds have been created to become the habitations of the children of God. Shall they be of greater consequence than the children of God themselves? Oh, no! The great work of God is to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of his children. And it has been written that though a man shall labor his whole life and save but one soul, how great shall be his joy with that soul in the kingdom of our Father. These reflections ought to make us think seriously of this work of God, with which we are identified, and in which we should have our part, for he has invited us to have part with him in that great and glorious work. How great shall be our joy, or how great shall be the joy of those men and women who go out into the world, who leave their homes, their fathers and their mothers, their wives and their children, and all that they love and hold dear, and go out and devote years of their time in helping our Father in heaven to accomplish his great and glorious work of bringing his children to a knowledge of the truth, that they may have eternal life!

This gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ has within it the power of God unto salvation, it is working upon those who have embraced it, who have received it, and the result is that this people are the best people on all the face of the earth. It is working in their lives! They are learning how to do something for their fellow-men; they are learning how to control themselves and to become better men and better women day by day. And as we come from week to week, partake of the emblems of our Lord's suffering, to our Sacramental meetings, and there with clean hands and pure hearts, we are indeed eating and drinking eternal life into our souls. Why? Because in doing so we are keeping this command of God and bearing witness that we do always remember Christ, who gave his life as a ransom for all mankind. But we must come to the table of the Lord in a repentant mood; full of faith, manifesting our faith in him as the Savior of the world, for there is no other name given under heaven whereby men and women can be saved.

I say that this gospel is working. It is sanctifying and purifying our hearts; if we are living it, and practicing the principles of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, it is sanctifying our hearts, it is making us better men and better women than we were, we are growing in the knowledge of God and in good works day by day. That is the plan that the Almighty had, and he expects that his children shall derive the benefit if they will only obey him.

The saving of a human soul! What a great work it is. Even though that soul be only your own, what a great and glorious work it is, if you shall only succeed in that!

What is a soul? You know there are a great many peculiar ideas in the world regarding what a soul is. Men have an idea that it is something fluttering around on the inside of this anatomy, and they call it a soul. Contrast their vague conception of that soul with the clear, concise definition that was given to the prophet Joseph in that glorious revelation known to us as Section 88, in the Doctrine and Covenants, "And the spirit and the body are the soul of man." Our spirits which came from God, begotten of him in the eternal worlds, and for which this world was created, and our bodies that we obtained in coming here, constitute our souls. The spirit, dwelling in this body, animating it and making it alive, is a child of God.

There are many things to accomplish in bringing to pass the soul's immortality and its eternal life, but before it can ever enter into the presence of God it will have to be sanctified from all unrighteousness, for no unclean thing can enter there. And so we read in that same section of the Doctrine and Covenants, "And the resurrection of the dead is the redemption of the soul." The spirit and this body, in conjunction, make a human soul. After a while they separate and the spirit will go back to God, whence it came, and the body, the other part of that soul, will return to mother earth, whence it came, and that separation that takes place we call death, the natural death, the temporal death. But after a while it is to come and take up that body, this spirit is, and become immortal. By what power can that be done? By your own individual power? No. This same revelation explains by what power that shall be done, for it says, "The redemption of the soul is through him who quickeneth all things"—through him who created man in the very beginning, the Creator of the heavens and the earth, who makes the grass to grow, who makes the birds to fly, the fish to swim, the beasts to rove upon the fields—every living thing. Through him who quickeneth all things, through him shall be brought to pass this resurrection from the dead which is the redemption of the soul. Redemption from what? From death and the grave. Therefore, we read on, "This soul must needs be sanctified from all unrighteousness." Why? "That it may be prepared for celestial glory." That is what the revelation says. Hence the gospel has been revealed, that we might sanctify and purify our lives from all unrighteousness.

That is what the gospel is for, and it is working upon this community. We are not all perfect; we are a long way short of it, but it is working. It is making us better men and women than we were, we are growing in the knowledge of God and in good works day by day. Let us continue to advance and to grow. Let us lay hold on eternal life by keeping the commandments of God, by cleansing and purifying ourselves from all unrighteousness. That is what the gospel teaches us and that is what it is for. Now we hear of the glad tidings that come from the mission field, how our boys and girls, our young men and women, who go out as missionaries, are placing splendid examples before the people in the world. What splendid news we hear of our young men and our young women everywhere throughout all the missions of the world! And we also hear a good report of our young men and our young women here at home. They are the best, the cleanest, the purest men and women, boys and girls, that are to be found in all the world, freer from the contamination of the world, freer from those terrible diseases that afflict a wicked and a corrupt world. Let us continue to walk in the truth, let us continue to abide in that gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, for it will cleanse and purify us from all unrighteousness.

This is the work of a lifetime. Do not get the thought that you are good enough just as you are, for though good as you are and clean as you are, honest as you are, virtuous as you are, we can all improve, every one of us. Let us grow in the knowledge of God and in good works. Let us not approach the world in that Pharisaical spirit, "I am holier than thou." Oh, no; for "we are all sinners, and if any man think he is without sin, he deceiveth himself and the truth is not in him." What advantage, then, have we over the world? Why do our missionaries go out into the world if they are not perfect, if they are not free from sin and also have need to practice repentance? Do our missionaries need to repent? Of course, they do; so do you, and so do I, and so does every child of God. And there is no progress without repentance from sin, and without faith in God. These are matters for daily practice in these things that pertain to sanctifying and cleansing ourselves from sin.

Good? Who is there that is good? Remember the Pharisee who came to the Savior and said, "Good Master, what good thing shall I do, that I may obtain eternal life?" And the Savior turned around to him and said, "Why callest thou me good? There is none good but one, that is God." That tells the story. We are weak, mortal, human beings, but we have received the gospel, that has within it the power of God to cleanse us from those sins and from that weakness. Why do we go out to the world? Because we received that gospel, and it is our duty to promulgate it and carry it to the farthest ends of the earth. We have advantages that the world does not have. And what are they? We have the help of God. And how does he help us? By giving us the Holy Ghost. But he does not give us that holy Spirit until we have been through this cleansing process, until we have faith in him, until we have repented of our sins, until our sins have been remitted by our being baptized and buried with him by baptism unto his death and then come forth in the likeness of his glorious resurrection. Then we are prepared to receive that marvelous gift. And that is what we have received, and that is the way the Lord helps us to gain the victory over evil—by his help, the sweet companionship of his holy Spirit, and every man and every woman who receives this gospel has the gift of the Holy Ghost. It remains with them. Its influence is felt wherever they go. And those who come in contact with them feel in their souls that this is a servant of God, or a handmaiden of God, sent to them with a message of life and salvation; for they have the gift of the Holy Ghost; that is what our elders go out with. They go out prepared, having been endowed with power from on high. They go out prepared to bestow that gift upon their fellow-men, that they may have the same advantages which the Lord in his mercy and goodness has granted unto us.

That is the gospel. Let us appreciate it. It is the power of God unto salvation. It is working with the Latter-day Saints. Let us endeavor to make it work with all the children of God with whom we can possibly come in contact, for they are all the children of God, precious souls in his sight. He desires to save them. He loves them. He so loved them that he sent his Only Begotten Son into this world, that they might not perish, that those who belong to him and keep his commandments, obey his gospel, might obtain eternal life.

Now, brethren and sisters, may the Lord bless us all; may his Spirit be our constant guide and companion; may we all grow in the knowledge of truth day by day and in good works, that we may glorify our Father in heaven, that those who see us shall glorify him and glorify his work, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir sang, "Inflammatius," Mrs. Jane Van Roosendaal singing the solo part.

The benediction was pronounced by Elder Thomas Leishman.

SECOND DAY

MORNING MEETING

The second day of the conference opened Monday morning at 10 o'clock, April 4, 1927, with clear skies after the rain of the preceding day.

President Heber J. Grant presided.

The choir and congregation sang, "Come, come, ye Saints, no toil nor labor fear."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder David K. Udall, president of the Arizona temple.

A duet, "See the mighty angel flying," was sung by J. A. Boshard and Bob Robinson.

PRESIDENT RUDGER CLAWSON

My brethren and sisters: I ask your support and faith for me during the few moments that I shall stand before you.

The keynote of the conference, as it was given by President Grant yesterday, and quite strongly supported by the speakers who followed—his counselors and others included, was the divine mission of the Messiah, and also the divine appointment of Joseph Smith to be the restorer of the gospel.

THE MISSION OF THE LORD JESUS CHRIST

If I may have the power of utterance, I would like to dwell for a few moments on the mission of the Savior. We have no authentic picture of the Savior, as we have no absolutely authentic picture of Joseph Smith, the Prophet. But we do have a pen picture of the Savior that has behind it reasonably good authority. It was published some years ago in the Millennial Star, and subsequently in the Juvenile Instructor. I am very sure that Latter-day Saints, and those who missed seeing this description would be very pleased to hear it now. We must take it for what it is worth, but I may say that it is a matter and a description of very peculiar interest. It is taken from a letter from Publius Lentulus to the Senate of Rome concerning Jesus Christ:

A DESCRIPTION OF THE SAVIOR

"It being the usual custom of Roman Governors to advertize the Senate and people of such material things as happened in their respective provinces, in the days of the Emperor Tiberias Caesar, Publius Lentulus, President of Judea, wrote the following epistle to the Senate concerning the Savior:

"Conscript fathers: There has appeared in these our days, a man of great virtue, named Jesus Christ, who is yet living amongst us, and of the people is accepted for a prophet of truth, but his disciples call him the Son of God. He raiseth the dead and cureth all manner of diseases—a man of stature somewhat tall and comely, with a very reverend countenance, such as the beholders may both love and fear; his hair of the color of a filbert full ripe, and plain to his ears, but thence downward it is more orient, curling and waving about his shoulders; in the midst of his head is a wave or partition of his hair after the manner of the Nazarites; his forehead plain and very delicate; his face without spot or wrinkle, beautiful with a lovely red; his nose and mouth so formed that nothing can be reprehended; his beard thickish, in color like the hair of his head, not very long but forked; his look innocent and mature; his eyes grey, clear and quick; in reproving he is terrible; in admonishing, courteous and fair spoken; pleasant in conversation, mixed with gravity. It cannot be remembered that any have seen him laugh, but many have seen him weep. In proportion of body most excellent; his hands and arms most delectable to behold; in speaking, very temperate, modest and wise. A man of singular beauty, surpassing the children of men."

ISAIAH'S PREDICTION OF THE COMING OF THE LORD

The coming of the Savior was predicted by ancient prophets who looked forward to that event with joy and gladness of heart. In the ninth chapter of Isaiah we find these words:

"For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given; and the government shall be upon his shoulder: and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, The mighty God, The everlasting Father, The Prince of Peace.

"Of the increase of his government and peace there shall be no end, upon the throne of David, and upon his kingdom, to order it, and to establish it with judgment and with justice from henceforth even forever. The zeal of the Lord of hosts will perform this."

I certainly feel, my brethren and sisters, that these wonderful words could not then, and could not now, be applied to any man in the flesh upon the earth except the Messiah. And I may add that his birth was attended by a number of extraordinary incidents, giving proof that the heavens approved of his coming and rejoiced in his advent.

THE ANNUNCIATION

This very remarkable circumstance occurred just prior to his natal day:

"And in the sixth month the angel Gabriel was sent from God unto a city of Galilee, named Nazareth,

"To a virgin espoused to a man whose name was Joseph, of the house of David; and the virgin's name was Mary.

"And the angel came in unto her, and said, Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women.

"And when she saw him, she was troubled at his saying, and cast in her mind what manner of salutation this should be.

"And the angel said unto her, Fear not, Mary: for thou hast found favor with God.

"And, behold, thou shalt conceive in thy womb, and bring forth a son, and shalt call his name Jesus.

"He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest: and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David:

"And he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

"Then said Mary unto the angel, How shall this be, seeing I know not a man?

"And the angel answered and said unto her, The Holy Ghost shall come upon thee, and the power of the Highest shall overshadow thee: therefore also that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God."

THE BIRTH OF CHRIST

It was an extraordinary incident. And then again we read in the second chapter of Luke the very interesting account of his actual birth:

"And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered.

"And she brought forth her first born son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn.

"And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flocks by night.

"And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid.

"And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people.

"For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord.

"And this shall be a sign unto you; You shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger.

"And suddenly there was with the angel, a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying,

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men.

"And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us.

"And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger.

"And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child.

"And all they which heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds.

"But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart.

"And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them."

THE DOUBTING OF THE JEWS

Now, we see the birth of the Savior was attended by a number of very extraordinary incidents, but it seems that his birth was hidden from his people, the Jews, generally. And I think it was due to the fact that they were unbelievers. They could not bring themselves to acknowledge that this babe who was cradled in a manger was the Son of God, the Savior. It was true they were looking for him, but they expected him to come with demonstrations of power, as King of kings and Lord of lords. The great mistake that the Pharisees, the Sadducees and others made in respect to this important event was that they had their eyes upon the second coming of the Savior, and therefore overlooked his first coming. It was a sad mistake upon their part. I think it was rather fatal to their welfare, the lack of this knowledge; and wherever there was a lack of faith, the Savior could do but very little.

JOHN THE BAPTIST EVEN IN DOUBT

Even John the Baptist, the forerunner of Christ, was somewhat in doubt concerning him. We read in Matthew 11:2-4:

"Now when John had heard in the prison the works of Christ, he sent two of his disciples,

"And said unto him, Art thou he that should come, or do we look for another?"

"Jesus answered and said unto them, Go and shew John again those things which ye do hear and see:

"The blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, the dead are raised up, and the poor have the gospel preached to them."

CHRIST ORGANIZED HIS CHURCH

The particular attention that I wish you to give in respect to the divine mission of the Savior is this, that when he entered upon his ministry, which embraced but a short period of time, he organized his church with apostles and prophets, pastors and teachers, high priests, seventies and elders, with bishops, priests, teachers and deacons. He gave to the world a complete plan of redemption, and in connection with this plan of redemption the Savior preached the gospel, the everlasting gospel, which was before and which would be after, and continuous. He said to his apostles on one occasion: "Ye have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit." And this utterance of the Savior signified, I think, the authority by which his apostles were called and sent forth, and also indicated in a way the will of God, because the Savior said, "I came not to do mine own will, but the will of him that sent me." And so of course we must assume that it was the will of the Father that he should organize this church and put into it these various authorities.

CHRIST'S MARVELOUS DOINGS CREATED A PROFOUND IMPRESSION

The marvelous work accomplished by the Savior, and his doings and sayings made a profound impression upon the world in his day, and upon the world in our day. It was the great central theme that is described by the Bible. The prophets of old were looking down to his day, and after his crucifixion the prophets were looking back to his day. It is said in the scriptures that Christ "went about doing good," and in reflecting upon that expression I have wondered in my own mind if a greater compliment or greater praise could be given to any man than that he went about doing good. But mark you, brethren and sisters, the fact that he did go about doing good brought down persecution upon him. It was not for any evil thing that he did that he was persecuted, because he was without sin, a righteous man. It was because of his righteousness.

UNDER THE SPIRIT OF PERSECUTION

Paul, the apostle, in one of his epistles to Timothy said: "Yea, and all who live a godly life in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution." And persecution began with him very early and continued throughout his life. He said to his disciples upon one occasion:

"Blessed are ye, when men shall hate you, and when they shall separate you from their company, and shall reproach you, and cast out your name as evil, for the Son of Man's sake.

"Rejoice ye in that day and leap for joy: for, behold your reward is great in heaven: for in the like manner did your fathers unto the prophets. * * *

"But woe unto you, when all men shall speak well of you! for so did their fathers to the false prophets."

Now, I apprehend, my brethren and sisters, that it would be very difficult for anyone of us to rejoice and "leap for joy" under the spirit of persecution, and yet we are enjoined to do that, and I think if we could do it, it would be a very proper thing, a very fine thing. Under that spirit of persecution Jesus the Lord was finally brought before Pontius Pilate and under some very extraordinary, foolish charges, he was condemned to death. The following is what purports to be the death warrant of Jesus Christ; if it be true, and it seems to be, you will find it very instructive:

"THE DEATH WARRANT OF JESUS CHRIST

"Sentence rendered by Pontius Pilate, Acting Governor of Lower Galilee, that Jesus of Nazareth shall suffer death on the cross.

"In the year XVII of the Empire of Tiberias Caesar, and the 4th of March, the city of holy Jerusalem; Annas and Caiaphas being priests, sacrificers of the people of God. I, Pontius Pilate, Governor of the Praetory, condemn Jesus of Nazareth to die on the cross between two thieves—the great and notorious evidence of the people saying:

"1. He is a seducer.

"2. He is seditious.

"3. He is the enemy of the law."

And yet Christ said he came not to do away with the law, nor to condemn it, but to fulfil the law, because he was the Lawgiver.

"4. He calls himself falsely the Son of God."

Is not that an extraordinary charge to have been brought against the Savior—that he called himself the Son of God? And the very people who brought the charge and prosecuted him to the bitter end were also sons of God.

"5. He calls himself King of Israel."

Now mark the sixth charge brought against the Savior. You will see how extraordinary it is:

"6. He entered into the temple followed by a multitude, bearing palm branches in their hands.

"Order the centurion, Quintos Cornelius, to lead him to the place of execution. Forbid any person whomsoever, poor or rich, to oppose the death of Jesus.

"Witnesses:

"Daniel Robani,

"(A Pharisee)

"Janus Zorobabel

".....Capet,

"(A citizen)."

Jesus shall go out of the city by the gate Strenuous. Here is a note:

"The above sentences are engraved on a copper plate, which was found in an antique vase of white marble, while excavating in the city of Aquila, in the kingdom of Naples, in the year 1825. It was discovered by the Commission of Arts, attached to the French Armies. At the evacuation of Naples it was found enclosed in a box of ebony in the sacristy of Courtem. Mr. Denmon, of the Commission of Arts, caused a model to be made of the plate. At the sale of his curiosities it was bought by Lord Howard for 5,844 francs (£243, 10s).—Courrier des Etats Unis.”

THE APOSTLES ALSO SUFFERED PERSECUTION

I might say in conclusion, my brethren and sisters, that the apostles of the Savior suffered also most seriously from the spirit of persecution. All of the apostles, as I remember it, except one, gave their lives for the testimony of Jesus. John only escaped because of the promise of the Master, who said that he should live until Christ's second coming.

I am sure a contemplation of these things will be very profitable to us. The Lord bless you, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER GEORGE ALBERT SMITH

I feel very humble this morning, and my soul is filled with gratitude to our heavenly Father for membership in this Church. Of all the blessings that have come to me in life the most precious is the knowledge that God lives and that this is his work, because that comprehends all other blessings that I may hope to enjoy in this life or in the life that is to come.

THE WEATHER FIFTY-SEVEN YEARS AGO

Fifty-seven years ago today, I am informed by good authority—the testimony of my mother—there were two feet of snow on the ground in the Salt Lake Valley. And when I contrast this beautiful morning—the sun shining, birds singing and flowers in bloom—I have an impression that there is quite a difference in the climatic conditions. And I also have reason to believe that there is a very great difference in the general condition of our country and the circumstances surrounding the membership of this Church, since April 4, fifty-seven years ago.

MANY CHANGES IN OUR LIVES

It is peculiar how many things transpire in our lives in a short period of time. If you men and women who are here who have passed fifty years of age will review and consider how many remarkable circumstances have transpired, how many inventions and discoveries have been recorded, within your memory, you will realize that we are moving at a very rapid pace.

THE GOSPEL WILL BE PROCLAIMED IN POWER

The Lord revealed to one of his prophets that at the coming forth of the Book of Mormon he would commence his work among the nations for the restoration of his people. When we realize with what speed the gospel of Jesus Christ may be disseminated now as compared with the year 1830, we can see that the Lord has set his hand and the opportunity to know is offered to men. It will not be long now, until in every part of this world the gospel may be heard through the servants of the Lord proclaiming it in power. Our heavenly Father will adjust conditions in the world so that the gospel may be preached. The great World War has readjusted the boundary lines and changed conditions in some nations, and the conflict that is now on in China, and the earthquakes and other disturbances that are afflicting mankind, will be in preparation of the further promulgation of the word of the Lord.

MISSION OF THE MEN WHO BEAR THE PRIESTHOOD

Your mission is a very remarkable one, you men who bear the Priesthood. Upon you has been conferred divine authority. You did not obtain your right to preach and teach the gospel and officiate in its ordinances as a result of training in a college or university. You received your authority from men divinely commissioned to act as servants of the Lord, and it was conferred upon you by those who received it direct from Jesus Christ our Lord.

JOSEPH SMITH'S MISSION

Joseph Smith was only a boy when the hands of Peter, James and John were laid upon his head and he was ordained to the Melchizedek Priesthood,—he and Oliver Cowdery. A little later Joseph Smith was directed to organize a Church. He was only a young man, but he organized it under the direction of the Redeemer of mankind. And it is patterned after the Church which was organized by the Savior when he was upon the earth. I have no doubt there were many who looked upon this young man as an upstart, and thought it was ridiculous that one who had not been educated to become a leader should presume to lead. But he was like the other servants of our heavenly Father who have lived upon the earth, who have been called by the Lord to perform a special labor, and the lack of knowledge pertaining to the things of this world did not preclude the possibility of the Lord's giving unto him information that made him equal and even superior in many respects to those who had possessed great earthly opportunities that were denied him.

It has always been a source of satisfaction to me that this youth possessed such a character that his father and his mother, his brothers and sisters, yes, and his uncles and aunts, who were much older than he was, were impressed with his testimony and were glad, notwithstanding it was unpopular so to do, to ally themselves with him and his teachings.

TESTIMONY OF PATRIARCH JOHN SMITH

I have here a document that was printed in the Deseret News, in the year 1851. It is a statement of an uncle of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and there are a few things in it that I think may be interesting to you. It indicates the faith of this good man, who, by the way, was the first stake president in the Salt Lake Valley. I refer to John Smith. He became Patriarch of the Church. He was an uncle of the Prophet Joseph Smith, and was born in 1781. This is his statement. I will read only a portion, because it is somewhat lengthy:

"It is now upwards of twenty-one years since the organization of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, with six members, most of whom are numbered with the dead."

Before proceeding I want to call your attention to the fact that this was written not long before the death of this good man.

"Soon after its organization I heard the gospel through my nephew, Joseph Smith, Jr., and obeyed the commandments of the Lord by entering in at the door, which is baptism.

"If the Presidency and Twelve who are now living had not been servants to the cause when Joseph lived, they would not have been worthy to fill the exalted stations which they now occupy; and always remember 'That he who is the greatest among you must be the servant of all.'

"Bring up your children in the way they should go, that they may be ornaments to the society and a blessing unto you in your old age; and remember that God will not hold you guiltless if you should neglect to attend to this matter. Remember also to teach them to pray; and cause your sons to take part in the family prayer; and beware what company they keep, for 'evil communications corrupt good manners.'

"Let not your daughters mix with the sons of the stranger whom you know nothing about, and who are not of the house of Israel; but gather your children together, and teach them the principles of truth and righteousness, and teach them to obey the laws of God, and the day will come that they will arise and bless you.

"Teach unto them every truth which God has revealed. Instill into their young minds every principle that will make them a noble race, and remove from their paths everything that is contrary to God and his commandments. * * * You will then have a race of children who will rise in the midst of Israel, and will break the shackles of superstition, and be fit beings to carry on the work which their fathers commenced; and the Spirit of God will assist you in doing these things, provided you put forth all your energies with your might. * * *

"Let every elder of Israel put on the garments of righteousness, teaching by precept and example the true principles which exalt the mind, expand the understanding, and make man a fit companion for his Creator. Never dishonor the high and holy calling which has been placed upon him by teaching and suffering to be taught in his home or anywhere that he has influence or power to control, doctrines that are not of God. * * *

"I must conclude, for I feel the infirmities of age creeping on, and knowing not when the Lord shall require me hence, I wish to take this opportunity of adding my mite to the testimonies of the thousands who are scattered throughout the globe, and of those who are gone beyond the veil, and who sealed theirs with their blood.

"In Kirtland, Ohio, four brothers sat in the patriarchal seat in the temple of God, and I only of that number am left to tell the tale; and as I am now past the time allotted to man to live, it is reasonable that I also will be gathered unto my fathers in the time appointed of God.

"I therefore bear my testimony, which I wish translated into every language and read to every Saint, and printed wherever the type is used; that the world may see and hear what I have to say; for if I were young I would visit them, when they should hear from my lips that God has again spoken from the heavens; that he has again condescended to send his angels to visit fallen man, and point out the way whereby he can be saved. He appointed Joseph Smith a prophet, and revealed unto him his commandments.

"I testify that Joseph Smith was a Prophet, Seer, Revelator, and a man of God; and what was revealed through him will prove life and salvation to those who believe and obey, or death and condemnation to all who count it as naught, and harden their hearts against the truths he preached and practiced. I knew him—"

I want to impress this paragraph upon your minds:

"I knew him when at his mother's breast, I watched and counselled his youth, but when God spoke and taught him, I bowed to his superior knowledge, and although he was a boy and I an old man, and his uncle, yet I was not ashamed to learn true principles from him, and like Paul at the feet of Gamaliel, drank in the truths which flowed from the prophet's lips.

"I was in jail with him and his brother Hyrum a few hours before they were killed, and I can testify before God, that they died innocent of any crime, and that they sealed their testimony with their blood.

"I testify to all men, that I know that the angel has appeared which John the Revelator saw, who had the everlasting Gospel to preach to every nation, kindred, tongue and people, saying with a loud voice, Fear God and give glory to him, for the hour of his judgment is come.

"And I call on all men, priests and people, kings, potentates and rulers, to cease their strife, come and obey the gospel, gather with Israel, obey the commandments of God, that you and your dead may be saved and brought up in the first resurrection.

"I say to the Saints that by the power of the holy priesthood vested in me, as Patriarch, I bless you, and I say unto you, Be faithful and you shall be blessed in your basket and your store; you shall have all blessings which were promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob; and the Lord will preserve you as in the hollow of his hand, and no power shall stay the work, for everything that shall be brought against it will fail. * * *"

He concludes by signing himself "John Smith, Patriarch of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints."

I read this, my brethren and sisters, for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that that was the class of people from whom the prophet of the Lord sprang. Men and women who had faith in God, who were readers of the scriptures, who believed in the power of God, and who, where it would be natural for them, because of their age, to direct the youth of their own household, were humble in their souls, and prepared to bow to the superior wisdom, not of the boy, but of our heavenly Father who inspired him.

It is a beautiful testimony to me because in the evening of his life, when he was all ready to pass to the great beyond, he wanted to leave that testimony to the Latter-day Saints. There is much more in the document, but I do not feel like I ought to take the time to read it.

TESTIMONY OF PRESIDENT GEORGE A. SMITH

I have another short document which is from his son, and I shall read a short paragraph from it, which has a bearing also upon something which you may be glad to know. This is from the historical discourses of President George A. Smith, a counselor to Brigham Young, reported by David W. Evans, in the year 1869:

"We look around today and behold our city clothed with verdure, beautiful with trees and flowers and with streams of water running in almost every direction, and the question is frequently asked, 'How did you ever find this place?'

I answer, We were led to it by the inspiration of God. After the death of Joseph Smith, when it seemed that every trouble and calamity had come upon the Saints, Brigham Young, who was President of the Twelve, then the presiding quorum of the Church, sought the Lord to know what they should do and where they should lead the people for safety. While they were fasting and praying daily on this subject, President Young had a vision of Joseph Smith, who showed him the mountain we now call Ensign Peak, immediately north of Salt Lake City, and an ensign fell upon that peak, and Joseph said, 'Build under the point where the colors fall, and you will prosper and have peace.' The Pioneers had no pilot or guide, none of them had ever been in the country or knew anything about it. However, they traveled under the direction of President Young until they reached this valley. When they entered it President Young pointed to that peak, and said, 'I want to go there.' He went up to the point and said, 'This is Ensign Peak. Now, brethren, organize your exploring parties, so as to be safe from Indians; go and explore where you will, and you will come back every time and say, This is the best place.' They accordingly started out exploring parties, and visited what we now call Cache, Malad, Tooele and Utah valleys, and other parts of the country in various directions, but all came back and declared this was the best spot."

THE FAITH OF ASAEI SMITH AND DESCENDANTS

Asael Smith believed in this latter-day gospel. He was the father of John Smith, the first man to whom I referred, who was the father of George A. Smith, who was the father of John Henry Smith, who was my father, and I have a son in Germany preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ—the sixth generation in the Church in our line, doing his mite as each of these individuals has done in this one family. And then we have many other families of that early day represented in the mission field. Some of the men upon this stand are descendants of those who were in the Church in an early day.

MEN OF STRONG CHARACTER HAVE PROCLAIMED THE GOSPEL

There are throughout the organized stakes of Zion, men of strong character, men who think and reason for themselves, men who have tested the value of the gospel of Jesus Christ by observing its teachings, men who have not been afraid to go into the world and proclaim an unpopular doctrine, men who have been willing to offer their lives in order that the gospel might be proclaimed. It is to humble men like these who do not exalt themselves in the eyes of their fellows, who believe in the divine mission of our Savior, who know as they know they live that our heavenly Father has revealed himself in this latter day, that our Lord has given a living testimony of the truth. This great Church has been presided over by men who have been specially prepared, specially taught, specially equipped for that high honor that has been conferred upon each as he has taken his place. Our heavenly Father in his wisdom has surrounded these leaders of Israel with others who like themselves have faith and who do not bow to the individual, because of his personality or individuality as president of the Church, but who recognize him as the mouthpiece of our heavenly Father and sustain him and uphold him and pray for him, and love him, in order that they, too, may receive the blessings of our heavenly Father.

There is no other organization like this in the world. There are no other people led as this people are led. It is truly said that those who preside are just men. It is through them that our heavenly Father will perform his work. It is through them that the gospel must be taught, and I call your attention to this fact: Not one of these men who have presided over the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints but has been willing to give his life for it if need be. The first one did give his life, and the others have been just as willing, if need be, in order that the work of our heavenly Father may be perpetuated, and that all men might be called to repentance. The man who presides over us today is not presiding because of his own native ability. He is not presiding because he is the son of some great potentate, but he is in the position he occupies because our Father in heaven knows the integrity of his soul. Realizing the determination he would have to carry this message to all the nations of the earth, he prepared him for the high calling that has been conferred upon him. He presides as the representative of our heavenly Father.

LET US TEACH OUR CHILDREN THE GOSPEL IN THE HOME

Brethren and sisters, let us remember the teachings of the gospel of Jesus Christ. The good man to whom I have referred, and whose instructions I read, who was one of the early patriarchs of the Church, advised us to teach our children. If there is anything needed among the people today more than another, it seems to me it is that we shall honor Home Evening, as it was recommended to us by President Joseph F. Smith; that we shall meet with our children around our own fireplaces and teach them the gospel of Jesus Christ, the power of God unto salvation. And if we will do that, we have been promised that the Lord will add his blessing.

TESTIMONY

Fifty-seven years ago today I first saw the light, not very far from where I now stand. It has been fifty-seven years of experience, with some privations, some difficulties, some anxieties, and much happiness. In your presence I thank my heavenly Father for the opportunity that has come to me. I am grateful to have the companionship of my brethren and sisters in this wonderful organization, and there has not been a day since I arrived at the age of accountability; there has not been a moment of time since I had the power to reason and think and understand for myself that I have not known as I know that I live that this is my Father's work. God help us to be worthy of the splendid privileges that are ours. Help us to be worthy of him who gave us life and being and honored us with his holy Priesthood; and in kindness and love let us reach after those who do not understand, drawing them by cords of kindness and love, that they, too, may partake with us of this blessing which is the power of God unto salvation to all those who will believe and obey.

That the Lord may give us this power, and that we may pass it on to our children and our children's children to the latest generation, that in his own due time, when he shall gather his jewels, we, who have had this great opportunity, may find our names enrolled in the Lamb's book of life, is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER GEORGE F. RICHARDS

Notwithstanding I was born in the Church and have passed my sixty-sixth birthday, I feel but a mere child in this great latter-day work. In speaking to you, my brethren and sisters, this afternoon, I will call your attention to the word of the Lord to his servant, Moses, as recorded in the Pearl of Great Price, Book of Moses, first chapter and thirty-ninth verse:

THE WORK AND THE GLORY OF THE LORD

"Behold, this is my work and my glory—to bring to pass the immortality and eternal life of man."

I conclude from these words that with the Lord the salvation of man was the end he had in view, and that all other works of his are but a means to that end. In these last days, after a period of spiritual darkness has been over the earth and the hearts and the minds of the children of men for centuries, our Father has restored anew the gospel, established his Church, and restored the holy Priesthood, having the same end in view.

THE GOSPEL TO BE TAUGHT

The gospel is the law of the Lord by which all men are to be judged and to be condemned or justified according to merits, therefore justice demands that the gospel be taught unto all men. The Lord has most graciously provided that this shall be done, that those who do not have the opportunity of hearing the gospel in the flesh shall have an opportunity of hearing it in the hereafter, and that those who have not the opportunity of receiving the saving ordinances of the gospel in life may have the work done for them vicariously by their kindred who come after them. This principle of the living working for the dead, and of the dead looking to the living to do the necessary work for them, is what is called the turning of the hearts of the fathers to the children, and the hearts of the children to the fathers, and it has the same end in view, that of the salvation of men.

I think the President of this Church has the same motive concerning the Latter-day Saints and the children of men generally that our Father in heaven has, and that is to bring about, by the means at his command,—the organizations, institutions and workers in this Church,—the salvation of the children of men. It would please the President of this Church more than anything else if we who are members of the Church would be true and faithful to our covenants and keep the commandments of the Lord.

FAITH THE MOVING CAUSE

If we had sufficient faith, my brethren and sisters, I feel sure that there would be no doubt in regard to our salvation. Faith is the moving cause of all action. It is the foundation of all righteousness, and righteousness is the thing that is going to save men and women in the kingdom of God. One of the purposes of our meeting together in these conferences is that the faith of the Latter-day Saints may be more firmly established; that under the influence of the Spirit of the Lord, which is always present in these conference meetings, and the instructions that are given, we may be reminded of our first love, of this the gospel of our Redeemer; that we may be reminded of the manner of men and women we should be. The very elect of mankind have been chosen out of the world, and very few indeed, in the language of the scripture—one of a city and two of a family—to carry on the work of our Father, looking to the saving of his children.

TESTIMONIES HAVE STRENGTHENED FAITH

Those who were present yesterday morning at the opening meeting of this conference and heard the remarks of President Heber J. Grant must have been deeply impressed, as I was, with the strength of character and of testimony of this our beloved President. Many evidences were brought forth proving the truth of this work, and that Joseph Smith was indeed a prophet of God; and a powerful testimony was borne that God lives, and that Jesus is the Christ, the Savior and Redeemer of mankind. The testimonies of others of the brethren have been in accord, all calculated to strengthen the faith of the Latter-day Saints and to convince those who are not members of the Church. We, each and all of us, ought to feel as our Father in heaven feels in regard to man's salvation, and that so far as we have the power we should endeavor to lead men and women with whom we may be associated to an investigation of the truth, and possibly through the blessing of the Lord to membership in his Church, and finally to salvation.

FURTHER CONCERNING TESTIMONY.

I realize that some are less credulous than others. The evidences presented which have convinced us beyond question or doubt seem to be insufficient for the converting of many of our Father's children. For this, of course, we are sorry.

Nature's testimony of God is incontrovertible. Men may question the authenticity and the truth of the scriptures, perhaps, but the evidence of nature is incontrovertible. The Apostle Paul in reasoning with the Romans used this expression:

"For the invisible things of God from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are left without excuse."

Men are known by their works. A prophet is known by his works. The tree that bringeth forth fruit is judged by the fruit. The things which God our Father has created, all that we see in nature, are his handiwork and testify of his existence, of his power, and of his love. Hence we sing that beautiful hymn:

"Earth, with her ten thousand flowers,
Air, with all its beams and showers,
Heaven's infinite expanse,
Sea's resplendent countenance—
All around, and all above
Bear this record, God is Love."

There are other evidences. The Savior said to one of his apostles, St. John, 20th chapter:

"Thomas, because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed; blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed."

The Lord expects men and women to receive the testimony of those who have seen:

"And many other signs truly did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book;

"But these are written that ye might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that believing ye might have life through his name."

The scriptures tell us that no prophecy of the scripture is of any private interpretation, "for prophecy came not in olden times by the will of men, but holy men of God spake as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost." The scriptures, then, are the product of the Holy Ghost, and they are written that they might testify of him. And they have so thoroughly testified of him that men believing on him, by reason of the testimony of these scriptures, have reasoned out also a philosophy, that God, who is the Father of Jesus Christ, is a personal, immortal and glorified being.

Let me read to you of Henry Ward Beecher's conclusions, drawn from the scriptures. He says:

"I am compelled to say that I must form an ideal of God through his Son Jesus Christ. Christ is indispensable to me. My nature needs to fashion the thought of God, though I know him to be a spirit, into something that shall nearly or remotely represent that which I know. I hold before my eyes therefore a glorified form. But after all the glory, whatever may be the nimbus and the effulgence round about it, it is to me a glorified form of a glorified man, and I therefore fashion to myself out of the spirit, that which has to me as it were a divine presence and a divine being; namely, a divine man."

Why cannot other intelligent men and women reach the same conclusion from these same scriptures? It seems to require more evidence to convince some than others. To me these are convincing evidences, and the fact that we teach truly scriptural doctrine is one of the strong evidences of the truth of this work in which we are engaged.

THE LORD HAS RAISED UP WITNESSES TO TESTIFY

Now again the Lord has raised up witnesses who are to testify, and the people who hear them are supposed to believe, and if they do not believe they will be left without excuse.

I will read from the first chapter and eighth verse of the Acts of the Apostles:

"But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you; and ye shall be witnesses unto me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth."

That is the kind of witnesses the apostles of the Lord were to be in his day, and in this day he has also special witnesses, and the people are expected to hear their testimony.

You remember the parable given by the Savior, of the rich man and the poor man, how that the rich man found himself in torment after life, because of his neglect to do the things he knew he should have done, and when he appealed to Father Abraham to send someone from the dead down to earth to visit his five brothers and warn them that they might not come to that place and condition of torment, the answer was, "They have Moses and the prophets. Let them hear them. And if they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither would they be persuaded though one were sent from the dead."

THEIR TESTIMONIES WILL STAND AGAINST THE WORLD

These testimonies borne by the servants of God in this day will stand against the world. Men of the world need a tutor, a Phillip, to explain the scriptures to them so that they may understand them.

MONUMENT TO THE THREE WITNESSES AND THEIR TESTIMONY

Last Saturday we unveiled a beautiful monument here to the memory of Oliver Cowdery, David Whitmer and Martin Harris, the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon, who testified that an angel of God came down from heaven and brought and laid before their eyes, that they beheld and saw, the plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated by the gift and power of God through Joseph Smith; that they heard a voice from heaven saying that the plates had been translated by the gift and power of God, and that voice commanded them to bear record to the world, and they gave their record and testimony to the world.

Another testimony, that of eight reputable men, who declared that Joseph Smith, having the plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated in his possession, showed the plates to them and that as many of the leaves as he had translated they did handle with their hands and they saw the engravings which were upon the plates, and declared that they had the appearance of ancient work and of curious workmanship.

BOOK OF MORMON TESTIFIES OF THE WITNESSES

I shall read to you what is found in the Book of Mormon telling of these witnesses who should be raised up, long centuries yet to come, after this prediction. It is found in the Book of Ether 5:3, 4:

"And unto three shall they be shown by the power of Gōd; wherefore they shall know of a surety that these things are true.

"And in the mouth of three witnesses shall these things be established; and the testimony of three, and this work, in the which shall be shown forth the power of God and also his word, of which the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost bear record—and all this shall stand as a testimony against the world at the last day.”

Why? Because men and women learning of these things are supposed to accept the testimony of these witnesses.

The testimony of all these witnesses is a direct testimony of the truth of the Book of Mormon. We declare that it contains the fulness of the everlasting gospel as restored through an angel, as the plates from which this book was translated were given to Joseph by an angel. And thus the vision of John the Revelator on Patmos was fulfilled, when he saw that an angel should fly in the midst of heaven having the everlasting gospel to preach to them that dwell upon the earth, etc.

THE TESTIMONY OF THE PROPHET JOSEPH SMITH

Those witnesses and their testimony, to me (perhaps I am more credulous than some), is an equally strong testimony that Joseph Smith, who translated from those plates the Book of Mormon, is a true prophet of God; and, being a true prophet of God, his story of his first experience when he went into the woods to pray, and in answer to his prayer the Father and the Son appeared to him, must have been true. For, had it been false, he would have been a great imposter, and God never would have used an imposter in bringing to light this truth, the Book of Mormon, the fulness of the everlasting gospel. So that these testimonies are to me just as strong evidence that Joseph Smith's story of the visitation of the Father and the Son is true, and that means that God the eternal Father is a personage having a body of flesh and bones and spirit, a glorified immortal being, and his Son Jesus Christ is like the Father. To me it is also satisfactory evidence that what the Lord told Joseph Smith, as Joseph explains it to us, is true in regard to a universal apostasy, and the intention of the Lord to restore his gospel and his Church in the near future. The visitation of the angel Moroni to Joseph is an established fact by these witnesses, by their testimony, also the visitation of John the Baptist and the conferring of the Aaronic Priesthood upon Joseph and Oliver, and later the visitation of Peter, James and John, who held the Melchizedek Priesthood, who conferred upon Joseph and Oliver the keys of that Priesthood.

Now just a word or two from the Doctrine and Covenants in conclusion. We read in the 20th section:

“Therefore, having so great witnesses, by them shall the world be judged, even as many as shall hereafter come to a knowledge of this work.

“And those who receive it in faith, and work righteousness, shall receive a crown of eternal life;

“But those who harden their hearts in unbelief, and reject it, it shall turn to their own condemnation.”

May the Lord add his blessings, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER SAMUEL O. BENNION

President of the Central States Mission

I am very happy, my brethren and sisters, to be in attendance at this conference, and I hope and pray that I may be led to say that which the Lord would have me say.

I do not know just what effect the testimonies of men, who have been members of the Church for many years, have upon those who do not know the truth, or just how far they may be led through such testimonies to investigate the gospel. But there is one thing by which they must be impressed, and that is that an organization that has held its own without a change for nearly a century is almost without a parallel in the world. The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has not changed in its doctrine. It is almost one hundred years since the Church was organized, and the doctrines that were taught by those early elders are still taught by the men and women of the present time.

Those early leaders taught that man had an ante-mortal state, and we have held to that doctrine for a century. In my experience I have not found any man able to prove that doctrine to be untrue; on the contrary, I have read the testimonies of hundreds of men and listened to thousands of them bear testimony that it is true, and give good scriptural evidence for it. The elders of the Church testified in the beginning concerning the Father and the Son appearing to the Prophet Joseph Smith, and declared unto the children of men that he is a personal being. The Church has taught this doctrine since that time, for nearly one hundred years, and in my experience I have never found nor read of anyone who has been able successfully to prove that it is not true, or that it was not a doctrine from the beginning of time.

These principles of the gospel must surely find lodgment in the hearts of the honest wherever they are found and where men are able to study them. I glory in the fact that the Church has never wavered in the least in all its history in doctrine or in organization; that it has constantly grown until it has become the greatest organization in all the world, in its order and system, in the excellence of its social scheme, in the perfection of its doctrines, and in its spiritual power. These things must certainly attract the attention of men. They are a warning to the children of men that the Lord has spoken, and the lives of men who testify of these things and live in accordance with these principles must be taken into consideration by those who oppose them and say they are not true. The Lord will undoubtedly call such to an accounting sooner or later.

I have heard men and women by the hundreds testify that they know the gospel is true; that its principles have been revealed from the Lord; that they know they lived before they came into this world; that they know that God our eternal Father has a body of flesh and bones; that they do know that the power of the Priesthood is among the children of men and that the Lord has revealed, and does reveal and will constantly reveal his mind unto his servants here in mortality.

They have testified unto me that they know they have been born again; that the doctrines which they had been taught previously were false; namely, that the Father through his Son had done all that there was to do, and left nothing for them to do but to acknowledge Christ and be saved. They have testified that they have found that there was something for them to do; that they must needs be baptized and receive the laying on of hands through the authority of the Priesthood on the earth. As a result they were baptized by fire and born again into a newness of life; they were thereby able to comprehend that the Father and his Son were personal beings; they were able to comprehend that they lived before they came into the world; they were able to understand the need of baptism for the dead, as well as for the living; they were able to see the eternity of the marriage covenant; they were able to see the great plan of our Father and to realize that this life is just a part of the existence of a human being. This knowledge made them in reality new individuals, they were thenceforth different in their lives.

Not long ago I had a conversation with a sister eighty-two years of age who had just been baptized into the Church. She told me that she had been so bitter all her life that she would not even talk about the gospel of Jesus Christ according to the "Mormon" idea of it, and while visiting with a friend who belonged to this Church she had made the request that religion be not discussed at all. The good sister, who was a very dear friend of hers, said, "All right, we will not discuss religion." But she left the Book of Mormon open where this other sister could find it. She also left some tracts which she had purchased where they might be read by her friend if she so desired. The sister told me that she was so prejudiced when she saw that book open that she turned around and backed up to it and closed it for fear she might see something she would believe. However, at length, she read a pamphlet, and then another. She finally read the Book of Mormon, and was baptized. She told me that she had reared a good family, which she had loved as only a mother can love. She said she thought she had been as happy as a person could be when she was rearing her little children,) and when they grew to manhood and womanhood she had the privilege of living with them. She was still near them but now they were so enraged at her joining the Church that they would hardly let her visit them. Notwithstanding this she had never been so happy in all her life as she has been since she joined the Church. She had found nothing else to compare with the happiness she has found through the revelations of the Lord to Joseph Smith the Prophet in this day. In the hours of the night when she awakens she finds herself never alone; she has much to think about, much to read, and much to do. She said to me, "I have been born again. I know that I lived before I came into this world, and I know that my Father has a body of flesh and bones, and I know that the Lord has spoken in these the last days and has revealed unto Joseph Smith the truth. I am born again." And she said also, "I could no more go back to my old way of thinking and my old way of worshipping the Lord than I could go back to yesterday."

Truly these testimonies written and spoken, distributed in all parts of the earth where Christians reside, must awaken in the hearts of the honest of the earth a desire to love the Lord.

My testimony unto you, my brethren and sisters, is that I know there has been no change in the doctrines of the Church. I have read the writings of the early elders of this Church in the days of the Prophet Joseph and those who were with him—Brigham Young, Heber C. Kimball, Willard Richards, Wilford Woodruff, and all those mighty men. I have read many of their sermons recorded in the Journal of Discourses, and in the other histories that were kept and are now in existence. I have made it a matter of investigation for many years, and I have never found any change. The same spirit which prompted those men prompts the men and women of today, and it is the greatest testimony to the children of men, or ought to be, that there is one guiding hand which directs and governs the destinies of this Church.

I know my brethren and sisters, that God lives and that Joseph Smith was his prophet and is his prophet, and that the power of his priesthood and his prophetic appointment was delivered to Brigham Young, who followed him, and that it is here in the earth today, with President Heber J. Grant. I know there is no other organization under the shining sun that holds the Priesthood and the power of God to administer in the ordinances of the gospel on this earth. I know that the history of this Church must be recognized and reckoned with. I know men who say there is no such thing as revelation in our day, yet the Book of Mormon has never been proved to be untrue by any man who has written or spoken about it. I know, my brethren and sisters, that the judgments of God are just, and that his rewards are certain and sure. I take great pleasure in bearing this testimony unto you.

I take great pleasure and happiness in my work in the mission field, where I have been for a long time, and where I have traveled among the children of men in the six states of the Central States mission—fifteen millions of people. There is a great body of men and women there who bear testimony constantly that this is the work of God. The work of God our eternal Father is greater today than it has ever been before and more surely established in the hearts of the children of men, for witnesses such as this fine old sister I have referred to are found in almost all of the counties of the states where I preside. And what is true of that woman is true of others, whom the Lord God our eternal Father has raised up as witnesses in all parts of the world; their testimonies are the same.

My brethren and sisters, we ought to be happy in a knowledge that this is the work of God, and that he has reserved us to come forth in this day and generation of time when the fulness of his gospel is in the earth. I pray that we may be able to keep the commandments of God and walk in his paths and sustain him through his priesthood, and I do it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir and congregation sang, "High on the mountain top."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Mark Austin.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON MEETING

The meeting began at 2 o'clock in the Tabernacle.

President Heber J. Grant presided.

The choir and congregation sang, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet."

Prayer was offered by Elder Lewis R. Anderson, president of the Manti temple.

A baritone solo was sung by Wm. H. Russell, "Open the gates of the temple."

ELDER ORSON F. WHITNEY

In the few minutes that are mine to occupy, I would like to say something for the especial benefit of the stranger within our gates—something that may help him or her to a better understanding than possibly they now possess of what the world terms "Mormonism." It may also serve as a reminder to the Latter-day Saints, especially to the younger or less experienced members of the Church.

A COMMON ERROR

The commonest error in relation to "Mormonism" is the notion that it is a new religion, and that it originated with Joseph Smith in the Nineteenth Century. Those who hold this view, and allow it to limit their vision of the subject, will never understand "Mormonism" aright.

For this reason: They are considering only a part of it—a very important part, it is true, but still only a part; and their comprehension of that is necessarily imperfect, since some knowledge of the subject in its entirety is essential to a thorough understanding of any part thereof.

THE TRUE TITLE

The only new thing about "Mormonism" is the nickname that it now bears. Its true title is "The Everlasting Gospel" (Rev. 14:6), the gospel of Jesus Christ. It did not originate with Joseph Smith, nor with any other man. It is not a product of human wisdom. It is of divine origin. It was instituted in the heavens before the earth was formed, as the means of uplift and promotion for "the lesser intelligences," in the midst of whom the Great Creator found himself at the beginning, and who became his sons and daughters, first in the spirit and afterwards in the flesh.

THE GOSPEL'S ANTIQUITY

It is the gospel of Christ, but it did not make its first appearance upon this planet at the time of Christ's crucifixion. While it seemed new to that generation, who were "astonished at his doctrine," in reality it was older than all the ages, older than Earth itself, and had been given to man again and again before any preaching of it by the ancient Apostles. It was a restored gospel then, as it is a restored gospel now, and had been revealed from God out of Eternity at the very beginning of Time.

THE MACHINERY AND THE POWER

The gospel is more than a code of laws and ordinances, an embodiment of eternal principles, obedience to which must precede entrance into the Church and Kingdom of God. The machinery is one thing; the power that moves the machinery is another. God is the author and giver of both. Divine authority, the authority of the Priesthood, comes with the gospel, to make operative for man its laws and ordinances and the eternal principles of which it is composed. The gifts of the Holy Spirit are also necessary—imperatively so, in order to render effective the great plan of salvation, exaltation and eternal glory. Faith, repentance, baptism, and the gift of the Holy Ghost are indispensable parts of the celestial machinery; but of what avail, if the power were not turned on?

The fall of man and man's redemption from the fall, are basic principles of the divine plan—the very foundations upon which it rests. If Adam had not fallen, had not become mortal and subject unto death, he and his descendants would not have been in a position to avail themselves of the gospel's uplifting powers. In other words, the spirit would have had no body, and consequently would have been incapable of exaltation. And if Christ had not died to redeem mankind, the machinery for human uplift would have stood still and death would have been perpetual. All that went before would have been in vain. Adam fell to give us mortal life. Christ died to give us life eternal.

THE DISPENSATIONS

There is only one gospel, but there are many gospel dispensations—as those periods are termed when God has spoken to man and revealed these saving principles, these exalting powers. "Mormonism," as commonly understood, stands for the restoration of the gospel in this Latter-day Dispensation. But that is not all. It stands for the gospel itself in all the dispensations, ancient and modern.

How many dispensations there are, I know not. But this I know: Whatever their number or the names by which they may be properly known, they are all inter-related, are links of one great chain, parts of one vast whole; and each, from the beginning, has prepared the way for its successor, the dispensation that was to follow. Before I finish, I hope to point out some of those relationships.

The relative importance of these dispensations is not to be gauged by the brief accounts given of them in the Bible. That sacred record was intended to emphasize the history and mission of the House of Israel, through which was to come the Savior of the World. Other things of vital importance are only glanced at. The Bible merely hints at the existence of the Land of Zion, the visit of the Savior to the Nephites, and the great events that were to take place upon this chosen ground.

JOSEPH THE PROPHET

Speaking of Joseph Smith. There are those who think that we worship him. We do not. We love him and revere his memory. He was God's prophet—that is our testimony concerning him; and he stands at the head of this last and greatest of the gospel dispensations—that is his proper place. He never claimed anything beyond it. Why should we claim it for him?

It is sometimes charged that we give him a standing next to Jesus Christ. I know of no warrant for such an assertion, nor for such a belief; and I am fairly well acquainted with the Church's history, doctrines, and divine revelations. Joseph, himself, testifies that Adam stands next to Christ, and Noah next to Adam, in the Priesthood.

ADAM'S PRESIDENCY

Joseph Smith also declares that Adam presides over all the gospel dispensations, including this, the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times. Each has its own immediate presiding authority; but the great head of the human family, the prince and patriarch of our race, presides over them all.

Is an illustration desired? We have one right at hand. President Heber J. Grant, the now visible head of the Church, by virtue of his general presidency presides over all the stakes of Zion, over all our outside missions, over every organization and institution in the Church; and yet each one of these has, under him and those associated with him, its local head, its immediate presiding authority. In like manner Father Adam presides over all the gospel dispensations.

THE PRIESTHOOD

Joseph Smith, in a great discourse on Priesthood, says:

"The Priesthood was first given to Adam; he obtained the First Presidency, and held the keys of it from generation to generation. * * * The Priesthood is an everlasting principle. * * * The keys have to be brought from heaven whenever the Gospel is sent. When they are revealed from heaven, it is by Adam's authority." (History of the Church, vol. 3, pp. 385-386.)

Adam was the first on earth to receive the gospel and to exercise the powers of the Priesthood. By means of it he was redeemed from endless death; and he taught his children these truths and transmitted them to posterity.

It was decreed by the Almighty, in Adam's day, that the gospel "should be in the world until the end thereof." How can this be harmonized with the idea and the need of gospel restorations? In this way: The gospel, because of the world's unworthiness, has been withdrawn at times, leaving but a partial illumination to guide mankind. But those withdrawals have been only temporary. Whenever conditions have become favorable, and the Lord's purposes have demanded it, the fulness of the Truth has been restored—brought back again;—

and by these repeated restorations, forming a continuous chain of dispensations, the Almighty has made good his decree, that the gospel "should be in the world until the end thereof."

ANCIENT OF DAYS

Says Joseph Smith: "I saw Adam in the Valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman. He called together his children and blessed them with a patriarchal blessing." This vision was, of course, retrospective, having reference to the time when Adam dwelt upon the earth. In another place the Prophet refers to the same incident in these words:

"Three years previous to the death of Adam, he called Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch and Methusaleh, who were all high priests, with the residue of his posterity who were righteous, into the valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman, and there bestowed upon them his last blessing. * * * And Adam stood up in the midst of the congregation, and notwithstanding he was bowed down with age, being full of the Holy Ghost, predicted what should befall his posterity to the latest generation." (History of the Church, Vol. 3, p. 388; Doctrine and Covenants 107:53-56.)

This alone indicates a relationship between Adam's dispensation and ours. But there is more to the same effect. The world has not seen the last of Father Adam. He is coming again—coming as the Ancient of Days, to fulfill the prophecy of Daniel concerning him. And he will come to the very place where, bowed with the weight of his nine centuries (men kept the Word of Wisdom in those days), he blessed his posterity before the close of his earthly career. In the Valley of Adam-ondi-Ahman, now in Western Missouri, almost within hailing distance of the ancient site of the Garden of Eden, where the New Jerusalem is to rise, will sit the Ancient of Days, counseling his worthy children and preparing them for the second coming of the Son of God.

A CLOSE RELATIONSHIP

Adam's mighty blessing upon his posterity, forecasting the history of the human race—the mightiest patriarchal blessing ever given—taken in connection with his prospective return into the midst of his righteous descendants, upon the precise spot where he bestowed his farewell benediction and uttered his wonderful, all-telling prophecy, shows a very close relationship between the first and the final dispensations of the gospel.

ENOCH AND ZION

And what of other gospel dispensations? What of Enoch, the seventh from Adam in the patriarchal succession? What of him and his period? Was it not prophetic of our day—symbolical of the building up of Zion in this dispensation? What is said of Enoch and his city, sanctified by the Law of Consecration, without which there can be no Zion, and consequently no coming of the Christ? Moses says: "And the Lord called his people Zion, because they were of one heart and one mind, and dwelt in righteousness, and there was no poor among them."

Such a condition will be again, and the Lord will come again, as he has promised:

"As I live, even so will I come in the last days, in the days of wickedness and vengeance. * * * And righteousness will I send down out of heaven, and truth will I send forth out of the earth, to bear testimony of mine Only Begotten; and righteousness and truth will I cause to sweep the earth as with a flood, to gather out mine elect from the four quarters of the earth, unto a place which I shall prepare, an Holy City, that my people may gird up their loins, and be looking forth for the time of my coming; for there shall be my tabernacle, and it shall be called Zion, a New Jerusalem.

"And the Lord said unto Enoch: Then shalt thou and all thy city meet them there, and we will receive them into our bosom, and they shall see us; and we will fall upon their necks, and they shall fall upon our necks, and we will kiss each other. And there shall be mine abode, and it shall be Zion, which shall come forth out of all the creations which I have made; and for the space of a thousand years the earth shall rest." (Pearl of Great Price, Moses 7:60-64.)

In other words, the Zion of Enoch foreshadowed the Zion of the Last Days, with which it is destined to blend. And not only Enoch, but all the patriarchs, prophets, and apostles who have lived on Earth since Time began, will come with Christ "when the Lord brings again Zion."

AS IT WAS SO IT SHALL BE

Noah, whose other name is Gabriel, the Angel of the Resurrection—how could we do without him? He holds the keys to bring us forth from the grave. He is one of our ancestors. His three sons reseeded the earth after the Flood; Shem peopling Asia; Ham, Africa; and Japheth, Europe. We are from Shem, through Abraham and the House of Israel, though mixed with the children of Japheth, the Gentiles.

In Noah's day "a veil of darkness" covered the earth; and according to revelation a like condition is to characterize the Last Day, thus foretold. The spiritual part of that prophecy is even now fulfilling. What could be darker in a spiritual way than "the gross darkness" that covers the modern world in relation to the things of God? Floundering—floundering—like blind men among breakers, not knowing how to swim, nor in which direction lies the shore! Such is the plight of even the wisest among them.

Of Noah's day, it is written: "As the days of Noe were, so shall also the coming of the son of man be." And it was the Son of Man—though I prefer to call him the Son of God—who said it. Baptized with water in the days of Noah, the earth will yet be baptized with fire and with the Holy Ghost.

ABRAHAM AND THE COVENANT

Our relationship with Abraham, I have already touched upon. We are among his descendants, and are actually taking part in the fulfillment of the promise made to him by Jehovah, that in his seed should all the nations of the earth be blessed. Are we not blessing the nations by carrying to them the gospel, and by administering its sacred ordinances for the living and the dead? The great fulfilment of that covenant is in Jehovah himself, who came through the lineage of Abraham, to be the Savior of the world. But a part fulfilment is in the world-dispersion of the children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, the blood of Israel, the blood that believes, supplemented by the present-day gathering of Israel, whose right it is to prepare the way before the God of Israel who is coming to reign.

MISSION OF THE CHRIST

Christ redeemed all mankind, "treading the wine press alone;" but the House of Israel prepared the way for his coming, and continued the work that he began. This is especially true of the prophets who foretold his advent, and the apostles who preached his gospel to Jew and gentile. Nor let the modern apostles, seventies and elders be overlooked, who are now preaching the gospel to the Gentiles, and ere long will carry it to the Jews.

Nobody, I hope, connects the Savior's mighty mission only with the age in which he was crucified. That was but a part of it. The death on Calvary was no more the ending of that divine career, than the birth at Bethlehem was its beginning. The Savior's mission is universal, extending from eternity into time and back again into eternity. All the ages of the past, all the gospel dispensations, from Adam to Joseph Smith, are parts of the all-embracing mission of the world's Redeemer. It is all Christ's work, from the hour of his election in the Eternal Councils, down to the Millennial Reign, during which he will sanctify the earth and prepare it for celestial glory.

The Mosaic-Judaic Dispensation was but preparatory to the Christian Dispensation; and the Christian Dispensation was a forerunner to the Dispensation of the Fulness of Times. They are linked together, and are no more to be considered independently and apart, than are the histories of the United States, Great Britain, the Roman Empire, and the parent nations that preceded them. They are all parts of one stupendous whole.

The first and second comings of the Savior complement each other. As Lamb then; as Lion now; not again to be sacrificed, but to ascend the Throne of David and reign over the House of Israel forever. It was to prepare the way before the glorious advent of the King of kings, that God's prophet, revelator and seer, Joseph Smith, was raised up, or rather sent down, to play his noble part in the winding up scene of the great Drama of the Ages.

And this is "Mormonism," the everlasting gospel, the bond that unites the present and the past, the children and the fathers; that binds together all the gospel dispensations, all things that are Christ's both in heaven and on earth. It is not an earthly growth. It is not of human planting. Its roots are grounded in eternity, and its branches have borne fruit through all the centuries of time.

Well might Brother Nibley say, as he said yesterday, "What has the world to offer in the place of it?"

ELDER DAVID O. MCKAY

An editorial in a local paper, last Sunday morning, referring to this great assembling of Latter-day Saints, contained the following comment:

A PEOPLE OF STRONG CONVICTIONS

"Those who attend this conference will see a host of sincere believers—indeed, they more than believe, they 'know' as many of them will assert. Naturally it took a people of strong convictions to stick it out in this valley when the pioneers came here in 1847. Quite as naturally a strong community would grow out of this beginning."

It is true, the Latter-day Saints are a people of strong convictions; and convictions—convictions of the truth—are the strongest, most potent factors in the world. It has been truly said that no historic event is so important as the advent of a conviction of a new truth. "The power of such conviction in the human soul is to build up institutions, to change the course of events, and to alter the tendencies of human affairs; and among all convictions there are none so strong, permanent, and unconquerable as religious convictions." "Ideas," says Paxton, "go booming through the world louder than cannon. Thoughts are mightier than armies."

TWO POTENT CONVICTIONS

If I were to couch in definite terms two of the most potent convictions in the hearts of the Latter-day Saints, I would name: First, an abiding assurance that the gospel, as taught by the Redeemer when he lived among men and which was later modified, changed and corrupted by men, has been restored by the Redeemer in its purity and fullness; and second, following naturally the first, a conviction in the heart of every member of this Church that the responsibility rests upon the membership of the Church to preach the restored gospel to every nation, kindred, tongue and people. It is this second conviction of which I wish to speak this afternoon.

A DESIRE TO MAKE ALL PEOPLE CHRISTIANS

Springing out of this sense of responsibility to bear witness to all people, is the desire to Christianize the world. Some Protestant ministers do not like to consider "Mormons" Christians. Be that as it may, the fact remains that the paramount desire in every Latter-day Saint's heart is to make all people Christians, and that is a conviction second only in power and urgency to the testimony that God has spoken in this dispensation. "Go ye and teach all nations," said the Savior to his disciples. "This promise is unto you and to your children and to all that are afar off, even as many as the Lord our God shall call," said Peter on the day of Pentecost. "Proclaim these things to the world," said the Prophet Joseph, through inspiration in this age, "that faith might be increased in the world, that mine everlasting covenant might be established."

WHAT THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS ARE DOING TO PREACH THE GOSPEL

I know of no other religious conviction that has affected the daily life of a people more potently than this desire to have every nation hear the message of this latter-day gospel of peace. Very few indeed are the homes in the Church that have not been influenced by it. At the present time the people are supporting over 2,000 of their sons and daughters in various parts of the world at a monetary sacrifice of approximately $1,800,000 a year. To know just how keenly this responsibility is felt and how willingly discharged, I will ask you to recall individual cases: A young man was called from this city to go on a mission to the Pacific Islands. He responded and gave his message to the world as best he could. A few weeks ago he came into my office and said: "I have been home a year, and I have succeeded during that year in paying all but $100 of the $600 debt I had when I returned. In another two months I will have it all paid, and my tithing in full besides." "Well, was it worth it?" said I. "Twice as much," he promptly replied. "I would not have missed that experience for anything." I met a young man when I was coming home from the Eastern States mission who had spent all his earnings in that mission, and also several hundred dollars besides, which a banker in his home town had furnished him, merely upon the young man's promissory note. He has paid his note since coming home, and although he has been in ill health part of the time, he rejoices in his missionary service. I met a mother on the train whose son was then in the mission field. She said she was having a difficult time to pay the taxes and other expenses and to keep her son in the field, and sympathetically I suggested that perhaps he might better be released. She turned in her seat suddenly and said: "Brother McKay, I would rather work these fingers to the bone than to have my boy come home before his duty is performed." These illustrations show that this conviction to preach to the world is one which moves to action. It is truly powerful, permanent and we hope unconquerable.

I have said two thousand missionaries are now in the field. President Grant reported in his opening remarks that there have been approximately between 35,000 and 40,000 missionaries sent into service since 1837. One of the Presiding Bishopric, informed me the other day that if we include local missionaries the number will approximate 70,000. Suppose that we consider just for illustration, that there have been 35,000 foreign missionaries out. Crediting each missionary with an earning capacity of $100 per month and his average expense in the mission field at $40 a month, and assuming that each missionary has averaged two years in the field, this desire to Christianize the world has cost the members of the Church $117,600,000. That is not including the amount of money spent by the Church for the return fares of the elders, nor the amount of money spent on chapels and halls in the mission fields. If you add merely the sum expended by the Church to that spent by the people during that time you will find that there has been expended by this Church for missionary purposes alone, approximately $121,500,000, over three-fifths of the assessed valuation of Salt Lake City during 1926, and nearly one-sixth the total assessed valuation of the State of Utah. In other words, the people have given in value, three-fifths of the city's assessed valuation in an expression of a desire to make the world believe in Christianity. I use that term in its proper sense—belief in 'Jesus Christ, the Redeemer of the world. Evidently' there is a force behind this conviction that the world needs Christianizing.

WHY THE WORLD NEEDS CHRISTIANIZING

But does the world need Christianizing? Our Protestant brethren say, "Why don't you send your elders out to the heathen, why go to Christian nations?" As I have said, our mission is to the whole world. We believe so-called Christian nations need the message as well as the so-called heathen lands, and Christian ministers by their own statements confirm this belief. For example: Recently in the Literary Digest under a glaring heading, "The crack of doom has sounded for Protestantism," one Reverend Herbert Parrish says that it is his conviction that "the sooner Protestantism disappears from American life the better. Its narrow sectarian spirit, fostering division, incapable of a large synthesis of values, of unity, unfits it to represent our national religious life. * * * As a moral guide it is superficial, depending on the exterior force of state legislation to effect the redemption of the race. As a mystical experience it is sentimental, without intelligence, and with narrow vision. As a teaching force it is vague, negative and uncertain. As an organization it is illogical and chaotic." That I consider a very severe arraignment of Protestantism by a Protestant pastor. I do not know him, nor do I know by what authority he speaks. But having this in mind yesterday, as I listened to President Grant quote a minister's prognostication as printed in the Anaconda Standard, I thought, well, here is another Pastor proving that minister's prognostication correct.

Probably a more trustworthy and authentic authority is Henry Emerson Fosdick, one of the leading thinkers in our nation today, who commenting on the need of modern religious leadership writes:

"No society ever has been healthy whose religious life was unhealthy. Even those who are impatient of contemporary formulations of faith, those who are outside the churches, and alienated from their denominational loyalty, should still be deeply concerned about the fortunes of religion. A society which, providing for the future, builds great factories, immense railroad systems, and even innumerable schools, but does not care whether the future has a wholesome religious life, is playing a fatally short-sighted game.

"In view of this fact the situation which we face is serious. Much of our contemporary Christianity is not making people better, but worse. It accentuates bitterness, brings out meanness, sanctions ignorance and bigotry, divides those who might otherwise be brotherly, and lapses from its high possibilities into a force for spiritual deterioration and decay."

Are not these statements and others that might be given, sufficient answer regarding the need of working for the Christianizing of the world?

ARE THE SO-CALLED "MORMONS" CHRISTIANS?

However, a more important question for us today is this: "Are the so-called 'Mormons' true Christians and does the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints contain the elements of a world-wide Christian religion?" It is my sincere belief and testimony that the Latter-day Saints commonly called "Mormons," are Christians in the truest and fullest sense of the term, and that this Church is world-wide in its comprehensiveness, in organization, and in its blessing and salvation of the human family. As true Christianity should and as it did in the days of the Savior, "Mormonism" combines the essential elements, in the teachings of Israel's prophets, priests and sages; and in accepting the Jehovah of the Old Testament as the Savior of mankind, it fulfils the noblest aspirations of the Hebrew race, thereby indicating a world-wide scope so far as Israel's people and Israel's God are concerned.

All that is "virtuous, lovely, of good report, or praiseworthy" in the teachings of all the great religious teachers of mankind—teachings that today are influencing hundreds of millions of God's children, are comprehended in the ethical teachings of the Church of Jesus Christ. What Charles Foster Kent says of the effect of true Christianity, is equally true of "Mormonism."

"It simply and satisfactorily unites religion and ethics by emphasizing religion and by giving to ethics the inspiration of a strong personal faith. It appeals to the individual will through both the reason and the emotions. Thereby it touches and completely commands the whole man: his intellect, his feelings, his faith and his acts. It sets before men a worthy goal; in the present life true happiness, won through self-denial and service, and preserved by faith that frees men from the harrassing fears and worries of life. For the future it holds out the sure promise of individual peace and joy and growth, since the object of its faith is the God of the living, whose beneficent rule is revealed in every phase of human experience."

"Mormonism" is an authoritative religion, yet at the same time the most thoroughly democratic Church on earth—a combination that is well worthy of serious thought. It emphasizes the universal bonds of human brotherhood. It seeks by training the individual conscience and will to establish a closely knit, world-wide fraternity. It glorifies humanity and all normal human relations. It is a spiritual force emanating from God himself.

At one time it grieved me to know that this Church was not numbered among Protestant churches. But now I realize that the Church of Christ is more than a protest against the errors and evils of Catholicism. This Church was established in the only way in which the Church of Christ can be established, by direct authority from God. Thus founded it invites the whole world to come to a Church recognized by God himself, and which offers every advantage that the human mind, the emotions and desires may contemplate in the fulfilling of the individual mission on this earth. "It is an ever-broadening wave of direct personal influence, destined ultimately to touch and transform all men, so that they like Jesus shall become Godlike." "Mormonism," as true Christianity, "subdues selfishness, regulates the passions, subordinates the appetites, quickens the intellect, exalts the affections. It promotes industry, honesty, truth, purity, kindness. It humbles the proud, exalts the lowly, upholds the law, favors liberty, is essential to it, and would unite men in one great brotherhood."

THE WORLD OUR FIELD OF ACTIVITY

Most earnestly do I hope that we shall never lose the great conviction that the world is our field of activity. Can you think of anything more potent in moving a people to action?

THIS ENTAILS GREAT RESPONSIBILITY ON US AT HOME

But what a responsibility this entails of leading good men and good women all over this world to know God, and to know what their mission is on earth! Fathers and mothers, fellow workers, do you fully realize today what it means to assume the responsibility of carrying the message of peace and good will to all men? The base of our operations must be here at home. Neglect your duty here and all you undertake abroad will be compromised, because people can rightfully ask: What do you do at home? What life are you living at home? "What you are," says Emerson, "sounds so loud in my ears I cannot hear what you say." Every elder therefore who goes abroad to preach this gospel must first live the gospel to the best of his ability, and have a conviction in his heart that he is preaching the truth. True, at first this testimony may be somewhat indefinite; but all our children have it to some extent. They breathe it as they breathe the mountain air, but they often neglect to define it, to express it in the plane of consciousness. It is the duty of presidents of stakes, bishops of wards, to make definite in the minds of missionaries this testimony of the truth. Through study, service, humility and prayer, this testimony will increase.

QUALIFICATIONS OF MISSIONARIES AND THE HOME

Another qualification is this: Every elder should be a Christian gentleman always. A gentleman—who is he? "Whoever is open"—nothing to hide, no downcast look because of the consciousness of guilt; "whoever is loyal"—loyal to the truth, to virtue, to the Word of Wisdom—"true, of humane and affable demeanor, honorable himself and in his judgment of others, faithful to his word as to law, and faithful alike to God and to man—such a man is a true gentleman," and such a man the elder of this Church should be who goes out to Christianize the world.

Brethren, it is a wonderful school to which we send our young men and women—the best in all the world. I weigh that sentence carefully—the best school in all the world! But it must never be considered a reform school for those who are the instructors therein. Keep young men who need reforming at home until they attain that degree of leadership which this Church requires.

In conclusion, then, with the abiding assurance in our hearts that God has restored the true gospel of Christ; with the unshakable conviction that he desires all mankind to hear this gospel, and that upon the Church rests the responsibility of proclaiming it to the world; let us first conform our own lives to gospel standards, first set in order our own homes, our own states, and then continue to Christianize the world; for

"Now the whole world hears,
Or shall hear,—surely shall hear at the last,
Though men delay, and doubt, and faint and fall,—
That promise faithful:—'Fear not, little flock!
It is your Father's will and joy to give
To you the Kingdom!'"

Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH FIELDING SMITH

I feel very keenly the responsibility that is upon me this moment, and yet I am glad to add a few words to those already spoken. We have assembled here to be instructed, and I suppose it is true in the case of each of the other speakers, as I know it is with me, that it is impossible to express all the thoughts that arise in the mind as we listen to these services.

PURPOSE OF THE CONFERENCE

I take it for granted that the purpose of these conferences is that we who assemble here may hear instruction. Moreover that the instruction may be as seed planted in our souls, taking root and growing, causing reflections in our minds. No doubt when we return to our homes we enlarge upon the things we have heard, and through faith and study gain greater knowledge, and thus draw nearer to our heavenly Father in the truth. If we do not, then we are not obtaining the full benefit of the meetings and the instructions given by the brethren. It is our privilege and duty, therefore, to study and enlarge upon the things that here are spoken.

THE FAITH OF YOUNG LATTER-DAY SAINTS

Reference has been made by some of the speakers to sentiments uttered by those not of our faith, and who are not kindly disposed towards the Church and its members, to the effect that the youth of "Mormonism"—and I place that word in quotation marks—are not walking in the footsteps of their fathers, and, that in time the children will depart from the faith and accept the teachings of the so-called "Christian" sects of the world. As one of the fifth generation in the Church I testify that I know this is not true, and that there is faith in Israel among the young people.

The gospel is, as the Savior said, like a net cast in the sea, which gathers of all kinds, and naturally there will be some that will have to be cast out because they are not good. Without a doubt there are those who come into the Church with ulterior motives, and some who are always weak in the faith. These latter may become discouraged and depart from the Church because they have not understood the truth. Again, we know it to be a fact that the unrepentant transgressor will deny the faith and turn away in a spirit of bitterness. However, I am assured, and I have that assurance in my heart through the teachings I have received from the Spirit of the Lord and from the inspiration that has come to me from the revelations of the Lord through his servants, that the majority of this people will always remain true.

SIGNIFICANT QUOTATION FROM DANIEL

Elder Whitney this afternoon referred to the prophesying of Daniel concerning the restored gospel and the Priesthood. Let me present a verse that Daniel uttered which to us, and to all the world, if they will receive it, is very significant:

"And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom which shall never be destroyed; and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand forever.

"Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out of the mountain without hands, and that it break in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made it known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter; and the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure."

That is the statement of an ancient prophet concerning this latter day work—this gospel of the kingdom which has now been restored, and the organization the Lord has established, in other words, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. It will never be destroyed. It shall not be given to other people. While many will come into the Church, and some will go out of it, the great majority of its members will remain true and faithful to the truth, and the Kingdom is bound to grow until it shall fill the earth.

WORLDLY RELIGIOUS SYSTEMS

I think that the Protestant ministers, to whom Elder McKay referred—Mr. Parrish and Mr. Fosdick—have spoken better than they knew in their arraignment of the Protestant world. Not only do their remarks apply to Protestantism, but to all creeds, sects and parties that are not recognized of the Lord, for he has decreed that in this dispensation of the fulness of times he would break in pieces and bring to naught every work that is not of him. He declared, through Paul, that it was "according to his good pleasure, which he hath purposed in himself, that in the dispensation of the fulness of times he might gather together in one all things in Christ, both which are in heaven and which are on earth; even in him." And as he has decreed, so he will fulfil. All things that pertain to the salvation of man have been restored in this dispensation preparatory to the coming of Christ and the setting up of his kingdom with absolute authority over all the earth. When that time comes, and Christ reigns, all that now exists contrary to that Kingdom and in conflict with it must come to an end. If people are engaged in works which are not approved of the Lord, the earlier they come to an understanding of the truth and come out of them and learn to serve the Lord, the better it is for them. It is far better to know the truth and forsake error than to remain in the systems of the world which are not approved by the Lord and therefore in due time must cease to exist. That day is near at hand, and because of it the Lord has sent forth his servants in the world proclaiming his gospel and crying re-penance, that all who will may hear and escape. It is within the reach of all who are willing to forsake error, to know the truth and the established work of the Lord.

THE ENEMY SHALL NOT OVERCOME

When the Priesthood was restored to Joseph Smith by John the Baptist (I speak now of the Aaronic Priesthood) the promise was made that it should remain on the earth and should not be taken away. So we look for the Church with all its power to grow and develop until all the righteous are gathered into the kingdom of God. For it is the will of our Father that all who are willing to serve him and seek light and truth shall have the opportunity. In a revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith, January 2, 1831, before the Church was one year old, the Lord said:

"Wherefore, gird up your loins, and be prepared. Behold, the kingdom is yours, and the enemy shall not overcome."

I have faith in that. He has given to us the kingdom. He has made us the promise that the enemy of the kingdom shall not overcome. We may have trouble. We have had trouble. We may meet with opposition, but that opposition shall fail in its endeavor to destroy the work of God.

Now the Lord has said something more in the verses which follow the one I have given you, and these are very significant and very timely:

"Verily I say unto you, ye are clean, but not all; and there is none else with whom I am well pleased."

THERE ARE SOME TARES IN THE CHURCH

The Lord could not say he was well pleased with all the members of the Church. For, even then, as now, there were some in the Church who were not clean. Nevertheless he did declare this Church was the only one with which he was well pleased. He could not say that of the systems and organizations extant which will not hearken to his word and obey his commandments, but set up doctrines of their own, contrary to his laws and ordinances. It is only natural, since he did establish his Church, to speak of it in the terms which he did and while expressing satisfaction with the organization as a whole yet point out forcibly the fact that there were in the Church some tares guilty of sin. After making this statement he further says:

"For all flesh is corrupted before me; and the powers of darkness prevail upon the earth, among the children of men, in the presence of all the hosts of heaven—

"Which causeth silence to reign, and all eternity is pained, and the angels are waiting the great command to reap down the earth, to gather the tares that they may be burned; and, behold, the enemy is combined."

GREAT THINGS TO TAKE PLACE IN THIS AGE

So the Lord points out the fact that great things are to take place in the earth in this day. The gospel has been restored, and the kingdom given to his Saints according to the prophecy of Daniel. It is not again to be removed, destroyed, or given to other people, and in his own way and time he is going to break down all other systems, that his kingdom may prevail and that he may come and reign as Lord of lords and King of kings upon the face of the whole earth.

THE RESTORED CHURCH NOT TO BE REMOVED

Again in reference to this same matter, which is in harmony with that which we have heard this afternoon from the other speakers, the Lord said:

"And verily I say unto you, the rest of my servants, go ye forth as your circumstances shall permit, in your several callings, unto the great and notable cities and villages, reproving the world in righteousness of all their unrighteous and ungodly deeds, setting forth clearly and understandingly the desolation of abomination in the last days.

"For, with you saith the Lord Almighty, I will rend their kingdoms; I will not only shake the earth, but the starry heavens shall tremble.

"For I, the Lord, have put forth my hand to exert the powers of heaven; ye cannot see it now, yet a little while and ye shall see it, and know that I am, and that I will come and reign with my people.

"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. Amen."

So again in these modern scriptures the Lord has called attention to the fact that he is going to destroy systems and organizations and combinations that are false. And how is he going to do it? By giving their members the truth, if they will receive it; by giving them the privilege of coming out of those organizations to receive the truth and have every opportunity to come into his kingdom, for his hand is outstretched ready to greet them. If they will not come; if they will not receive his message, then of course they must fall with their systems. Truth will prevail; truth will stand when all else is removed, and it is destined to cover the face of the earth.

FALSE SYSTEMS TO BE DESTROYED

In one of these scriptures I have presented, the Lord said the angels are waiting to reap down the earth. I heard President Wilford Woodruff make the statement, in this very spot where I now stand, at a conference of the Church, that these angels had been sent forth on their mission to reap down the earth, to tie in bundles the tares for the burning and to gather the Saints of God. I heard him make this statement on several occasions. Moreover he said from that time forth, and that was about the year 1894, earthquakes, pestilence, war, famine, plague, and other commotions among both men and the elements would increase and continue until the coming of Christ.

In the revelation known to us as the "revelation on war," the Lord declared that he had decreed the overthrow of nations, "until the consumption decreed hath made a full end of all nations." In that day, when this shall come to pass, the nation set up by the Lord must reign supreme and all other powers, kingdoms, organizations and societies shall pass away, for so it is decreed.

ADVICE AND ADMONITION TO THE SAINTS

Now, just a word or two in conclusion, as advice and admonition to the Latter-day Saints. We are living in perilous times. I do not feel that we ought to sit down and take things easy, to partake of all the sins and follies of the world and their systems and do just as they do in all respects. We should strictly observe the Sabbath day. We should keep the Word of Wisdom. We cannot afford to discard the doctrine of prayer. If we turn away from these principles which mean so much to us, we cannot be approved of the Lord. The world is turning from these fundamental principles. They do not mean to the ordinary individual in the world what they used to mean. Many professed ministers of Christ are making light of these sacred things; not all of them, for there are yet some who are devout and sincere in the things they are teaching. However, a great many professed teachers of the gospel have discarded the fundamental truth upon which salvation is based. We should not pin our faith in men, or in their philosophies and their worldly teachings. The world is full of doctrines and vain philosophy diametrically opposed to the gospel of Jesus Christ. And I say to you, my brethren and sisters, we ought to follow the admonition the Lord has given us to stand in holy places and be not moved, and be just a little more firm in the keeping of his commandments. We should make a more careful search of the Scriptures and the revelations of the Lord.

We have no business violating the Sabbath day. In the Priesthood conferences, which have been held in the stakes of Zion during the past three months, we have put a great deal of stress upon this principle. We have been teaching the people the necessity of observing the Sabbath day and keeping it holy. I regret very much that, even in communities of Latter-day Saints, this doctrine is not looked upon as it ought to be by some; that we have those among us who seem to feel that it is perfectly right to follow the custom of the world in this regard. They are partakers of the ideas and notions of the world in violation of the commandments of the Lord. But if we do this the Lord will hold us accountable, and we cannot violate his word and receive the blessings of the faithful.

We cannot afford to discard the doctrine of prayer. We should be teaching our children in our homes to pray; we should pray in secret, and in our hearts, and before our families. Without the spirit of prayer we cannot please the Lord; we cannot stand before him in favor if we are not willing to acknowledge his hand in all things and keep his commandments. These are the words he has given us by revelation.

NECESSARY TO WALK IN THE FULL LIGHT OF TRUTH

We cannot afford not to pay our tithing, nor can we afford to turn away from any other principles of the gospel. I fully endorse the remark made by one of the speakers here yesterday, that it is necessary for us to walk in the full light of the truth, not in part of the truth only. I haven't the privilege of discarding some of the principles of the gospel and believing others, and then feel that I am entitled to the full blessings of salvation and exaltation in the kingdom of God. If we want exaltation, if we want the place which the Lord has prepared for those who are just and true, then we must be willing to walk in the full light of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and keep all the commandments. We cannot say that some of them are small and insignificant and therefore the Lord will not care if we violate them. We are commanded to live by every word that proceeds from the mouth of God. "Why call ye me Lord, Lord," he says, "and do not the things that I say?" So he spoke to his disciples when he was with them, and he has also spoken to us in this day in a similar way, saying: "If ye love me, keep my commandments."

I pray that we may all walk in the light of the truth as it has been revealed to us, observing to do all things required by the Lord, which, through our faithfulness and perseverance, will insure our exaltation in the Kingdom of God. This is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

INTRODUCING STAKE PRESIDENTS

I have been calling, from time to time, for brief remarks, not to exceed five or six minutes, from some of the stake presidents. All of the stake presidents, with the exception of one, who happened to be absent, have had the privilege of either opening or closing our meetings by prayer. But there have been so many changes made of late in stake presidencies, that there are about thirty-six of them at present who have not had the opportunity of speaking. We will now call on some of those who have been longest in office, asking them to occupy five or six minutes.

ELDER C. ALVIN ORME

President of the Tooele Stake of Zion

My brethren and sisters: As I approach this position there is a scriptural saying which comes to my mind, to the effect that, "The place whereon thou standest is holy ground."

I rejoice in the testimonies that we have heard during this conference. As I came into the building yesterday morning, President Grant was delivering his opening address, and I rejoiced in the testimony which he had in his heart of the divinity of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the necessity of obedience unto that which has been revealed by the Lord, through the Prophet Joseph Smith—the sacred ordinances of the House of the Lord, in the temple marriages and other ceremonies, and in the testimonies of the healing power that has been in the Church since its organization. That power which characterized the ancient Church, and the power and authority given unto the apostles of the Lord Jesus Christ during his ministry, to heal the sick, to open the eyes of the blind, and cause the lame to walk, is in this Church. I add my testimony, to those which have been given during this conference, that those principles and powers and gifts are with the Church, and that we enjoy them. As men and women in Israel who have had these precious truths and gifts given to us, may we treasure them, prize them highly, and live by the revelations which God our Father has given for our salvation. May we walk in his paths and attain the degree of glory and eternal life that he has promised unto the faithful, which all who have been baptized by immersion for the remission of sins, and who have had hands laid on them for the gift of the Holy Ghost, being born of the water and of the Spirit, shall have by living according to that which God has revealed. I bear testimony to these things in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER BYRON O. COLTON

President of the Roosevelt Stake of Zion

My dear brethren and sisters: This is certainly a surprise to me, and I assure you that I am in need of your sympathy and faith, that the time I may occupy may be for our mutual benefit and blessing.

I have rejoiced in all the testimonies which have been borne during this conference. The inspiration of the Lord has been with those who have spoken, and I am sure that the Saints who have been gathered together here have found joy in listening to them.

From my youth I have been taught the principles of the gospel. In my early youth my father paid little attention to the Church and its organization, but during all that period of some seventeen years, I have heard my mother repeatedly say she never ceased to pray that he might yield obedience to the principles of the gospel, and accept the same of his own volition. Though he was born of Latter-day Saint parents, as was the case with many "Mormon" youths at that time, he went into neighboring states and places, and for a time seemed to lose the faith, but later accepted it and has been true to it ever since.

I am grateful to my heavenly Father that I was born of goodly parents, that through them a testimony of the truth has come to me. I do not hesitate to think that perhaps it would have been difficult for me to accept the gospel, had I been found in the world as many people have been. I rejoice in the opportunities that have come to me, in the responsibilities that have been given to me, because out of them I have found joy and satisfaction, and I have seen in my brethren a desire for the benefit and blessing of the people about them. In the councils of my brethren, into which I have had the privilege of being called, and in joining with them, I have never seen aught, nor heard aught that was not good, never any manifestation or desire, or intent to injure any, but always the spirit of service and consideration, that those who make up the Church and those not of the Church should be benefited and blessed. Nothing but good has ever been evidenced in their intent and their purposes. To these testimonies also have come the testimonies of the Spirit, and in trial and in responsibilities that I have borne I have seen evidences of the truth of this work. I do not doubt it. I have never had any doubt as to the integrity of the men who have been called of the Lord to lead this work.

I see in the scriptures, in the standard works of the Church, in the writings of those whose minds have been drawn out to write of the things of the Lord, and teach the people, that which is for our good. I rejoice in the Book of Mormon. To me it is an indisputable testimony of the truth of this work. Its very existence demonstrates to me, together with a knowledge of its coming forth, that it is of the Lord. So also with the Pearl of Great Price. The thought came to me while some of the brethren were speaking this morning that it is a strange thing that the records which were found seemingly so mysteriously, that made up part of the Pearl of Great Price, should find their way into the hands of the Prophet Joseph, and yet, if the Lord had a servant on earth, if he had a prophet in existence, isn't it only natural that it should find its way into his hands, and should be published to the world?

I bear you my testimony, my brethren and sisters, that the peace of the gospel has come into my soul, and I am satisfied without any doubt whatever of its truth. I see in its principles a philosophy that would serve the human race, principles that will mean our salvation temporally and spiritually; and I feel, my brethren and sisters, that the little service that I can render, the little value that I may be to my brethren and sisters, and to myself, in all the things that I may be able to do, and that the Lord may help me to do, is of little consequence unless the Lord helps me and helps others to understand me and my endeavors to keep his commandments and to serve in this work. It seems to me that the frailties of human kind, the weaknesses of human nature, and the littleness of men, particularly of myself, grow upon me from time to time, and I recognize how much I need the blessing and Spirit of the Lord and his help to uphold me and guide me in the work that I am called upon to do.

I pray the Lord to bless us with satisfaction and with joy, and with a continued testimony of his goodness unto us. I thank him for these things that have come into my life, for the privileges and blessings that have come to me through the gospel, and I do it, and bear my testimony unto you, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER WAYNE H. REDD

President of the San Juan Stake of Zion

The thought of standing before this vast audience and speaking to the Saints, and to those who may be listening in over the radio, almost overawes me. But I am happy in the thought that I am associated with this class of people. I feel that the greatest knowledge in this world is a knowledge of God, for the Savior said to know Jesus Christ is life eternal; and I feel the greatest thing that anyone can do in this world is to conquer himself and to bring himself into line with the gospel of Jesus Christ.

The Lord in his goodness and mercy to me gave me a testimony, while yet in my teens, and as I have labored in the Church from that day to this, it has grown brighter, until I feel that I know that the gospel is true, whether I know anything else in the world or not.

I have a great many things for which to be thankful, as one who comes from the land of magnificent distances and the home of the noble red men. I feel that the thing that we have most to be thankful for, that has happened in our neighborhood in recent years, is the fact that the Indians who have harrassed the people in that section since the settlement of that country a few years ago, are rounded up, and the government has come there and taken charge of them and settled them, and has chosen one of our people to teach them how to live better. One of our returned elders is the man who is looking after them. The government is now putting their children in school and they are fed and clothed, and it is not necessary for them to pillage the settlers and to harrass the women and children.

The Lord is good to his people, in every section where they turn unto him and serve him. The greatest desire of my life is that I may be worthy of the confidence that my brethren have imposed in me. I have every confidence in those who preside over me. Never in my life have I seen anything in their conduct that would cause me to lose confidence in them. I know that the Church of Christ is growing, and that those who are seeking after the Lord may find him. I have said a great many times that I think it is about the easiest thing in the world to know that the Lord lives, if men will be honest, truthful, virtuous, attend to their prayers, and live a Christ-like life. I want to say to the Latter-day Saints, that if our boys and girls will but function in the organizations of the Church, take part therein, and live clean lives, they will know that the Lord lives, that Jesus is the Christ, and that the resurrection is a reality, the most wonderful knowledge in all the world.

May we all be true to the covenants we have made with one another, and to the testimony of Jesus Christ which is implanted within our hearts; and be obedient in all things, that we may be saved in his kingdom, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus. Amen.

President Grant announced that the general priesthood meeting would be held Monday evening at 7 o'clock.

The choir and congregation sang, "Redeemer of Israel."

Benediction was offered by Elder Geo. W. Green, former counselor in the presidency of the Lethbridge stake of Zion.

Meeting adjourned till 10 o'clock a. m., Tuesday, April 5, 1927.

THIRD DAY

MORNING MEETING

The conference reassembled on Tuesday morning, April 5, 1927, at 10 o'clock.

President Heber J. Grant announced the opening hymn, "O say what is truth?" which was sung by the choir and congregation.

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Joseph R. Sheppard, president of the Logan temple.

A duet, "O God, our help in ages past," was sung by Arlene Davis and Hyrum J. Christensen.

ELDER JOHN M. KNIGHT

President of the Western States Mission

Words fail me, my brethren and sisters, adequately to express my feelings, in attending this conference. I have been thrilled by the testimonies which have been borne in my hearing by the presiding authorities of the Church.

I am very grateful for the privilege given unto me to render service in the mission field. That service has brought into my life a joy that is more than pleasure, a joy that is greater than happiness. It is a privilege to attend the sessions of conference, held here semi-annually, and to partake of the spirit of these gatherings, to worship with you before the Lord. "Man," says one great philosopher, "is incurably religious. The desire to worship is inherent, inborn."

We read frequently in the public press that there are some fifty million people in the United States identified with the various churches in this country; that there are between fifty and sixty million people who are not identified or affiliated with any church organization. There is, however, a tremendous amount of personal religion in the world. I find in my association with the people that are not identified with any of these organizations that they are deeply religious, many of them, that they think for themselves, and it is from this class that the majority of our converts, in the Western States mission, come.

I asked a prominent clergyman in the state of Colorado, a short time ago, what his greatest problems were. He answered me that the three great characteristics of present-day church life are, our intense triviality, the uncertainty of our position, and our complacency, national, civic and religious. Said he, "We have sociability instead of sacraments, statistics instead of salvation." I assured him that we were not so situated, and stressed the fact that we were not uncertain with regard to our position on fundamental doctrines of the Church. The burden of our message to the world has been that God has spoken and that he has delivered his word and restored his gospel anew to the children of earth, in the nineteenth century. We have renewed the promise that has come down through the ages from the Master's lips, that if men will serve him and keep his commandments and yield obedience to the saving ordinances of the gospel, they shall know of the doctrine, whether it is of God, or whether we speak of ourselves.

I asked a lady a few days ago why she was not identified with any of the churches of the world, and she replied, "Because in my investigation of the various systems of religion, I have discovered so many theological contradictions." We invited her to make a thorough investigation of the claims made by the Latter-day Saints, and assured her that she would find no theological contradictions; but, on the contrary, she would discover that the Church is built upon a solid foundation; that it is built upon Jesus Christ our Lord and upon the foundation of apostles and prophets, the Savior of the world being the chief cornerstone; and that she would find peace to her soul if she would obey the commandments of God and the fundamental doctrines that are taught by the Church. She has later assured me, having come into the Church, that she has had greater joy in the few months she has been identified with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints than in all her experience up to joining the Church.

There is only one way that we may be satisfied of the truth, and that is through the power of the Holy Ghost, which is promised to every individual who obeys the gospel of the Master. The clergyman to whom I have referred made this statement: "Christ is the supreme issue confronting the world at the present time." Our declaration to the world is that they may know the Christ if they obey his gospel. Through the power of the Holy Ghost they may be assured of his reality, and the efficacy of his atonement in redeeming the world. He declared to his disciples that all power was given him in heaven and in earth and instructed them to go out and preach the gospel of repentance, baptizing in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, teaching people to observe all things whatsoever he had commanded them. He had said to his disciples that no man knoweth the Father save the Son. Neither knoweth any man the Son, save the Father, and him to whom he will reveal him. He invited men and women everywhere to come unto him, and to take upon themselves his yoke, for he said, "My yoke is easy, and my burden is light." Amplifying the statement of the Master, the Apostle Paul declared that no man, speaking by the Spirit, calleth Jesus accursed, and no man can say that Jesus is the Christ but by the Holy Ghost.

We affirm that the Church which we represent out in the world, this Church, is the Church of Jesus Christ. He organized it; he owns it, and it is his, and the organizations represented here today are the instrumentality through which our Father may promulgate the glorious truths of the gospel to the nations of the earth.

I bear my testimony to you, my brethren and sisters, that I know, as I know that I live, that these things are true, that God lives, that Jesus Christ, his Son, is the Redeemer of the world, and that Joseph Smith was and is a prophet of the living God, and those who have been associated with him are men of God and are the mouthpiece of our Father unto the children of men.

Reference was made to the fact that some of the younger generation would deny the faith. I call to mind that we have in the Western States mission at least one who was associated with the Prophet Joseph Smith in Nauvoo. I attended a meeting in a small town where he resides and listened to his testimony. I listened to the testimony of his son and his grandson, and his great-grandson, and every one of them testified that he knew that Joseph Smith was a Prophet of God. The man who had been an eye and ear witness to the power that rested upon the prophet of the nineteenth century was no more sure of his position than the youngest man who bore his testimony, because he had received that witness from the Holy Spirit.

May God help us to appreciate our responsibility and to render service in the cause of Christ, that the world may be left without excuse in the day of judgment, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN G. ALLRED

President of the Northcentral States Mission

I sincerely desire that the few moments I occupy I may be inspired by that same spirit which has characterized this conference thus far.

One of the ancient prophets, as he saw in prophetic vision the introduction of this great work, said that it was to be a marvelous work and a wonder. It is not only to be a marvelous work and a wonder in one way, but in every way.

Another prophet, in speaking of the ministry of this great work, said that in the latter days the Lord would gather his Israel, one of a city and two of a family and bring them to Zion, where he would give them pastors after his own heart, who would teach them with knowledge and with understanding.

When the Redeemer was in the world he chose twelve pastors. What was the status of these pastors? Certainly they were men after God's own heart. The Lord passed by men like Gamaliel who educated one of those pastors, and at whose feet one of those pastors listened and was taught; passed by Herod and all of the mighty men, so far as worldly wisdom was concerned, and went out into Galilee and chose ordinary fishermen. He took those twelve men away to the mount, and said to them: "You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you, and ordained you, and I give you power." That power which he gave those men afterwards concerned the whole world. Even the Roman Empire was shaken to its foundations, for they defied it when they had Peter and John before them as prisoners, and charged them that they should not preach Jesus Christ any more in Jerusalem. The simple answer of Peter and John was: "Shall we obey man or God?" and the Roman Empire said: "If ye do not obey man, we will incarcerate you with chains and ball." And they put them into prison, but that power which God had given them released them from that prison and they went back and said, We are preaching things that we know; we are not preaching that which we have believed or which we think is correct. We are preaching that thing which we do know. They knew not only that Jesus was the Christ, but they knew that his doctrines were of God, by the same power that they knew he was the Christ. They knew that his doctrines contained the elements of salvation.

Now what kind of pastors has the Lord raised up in this day and generation? What of these forty thousand men who have been sent forth to preach this gospel from the beginning of this Church, in 1830? Where were they educated? Where were they trained? Whence came their knowledge? They were men after God's own heart, and one of the things that characterized these ministers was that they went out and declared the things which they knew. Not from book-learning; not from scholastic education, but by the same power that Peter knew, and they knew by the same power that Peter knew, and they declared as Paul did when he said, "Brethren, I come not to you with the wisdom of men, nor the learning of the world, but with the revelations of Jesus Christ." And these young men and women have faith. They have been largely young men and women who have gone out into the world—men and women after God's own heart. And they have borne witness, and that witness has been effective because it has been inspired.

Not long ago in our mission one of our young lady missionaries, only twenty years of age, was invited to dine with a sectarian preacher. As soon as the luncheon was over he proceeded to ridicule her and her religion. She was young in the field, and not able to cope with him and his learning, and after he had spoken at some length in ridicule of the message that she had been sent forth to proclaim, she simply gathered her wraps and hat, and stood at his door, and in the majesty of her young womanhood, and in the power of her calling, she bore testimony that she knew that Jesus Christ was the Redeemer of the world, and that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the living God. The wife pushed her husband aside and went over and put her arms around the girl and hugged her and said, "That is the kind of testimony; that is the spirit that will win the world."

God has chosen pastors after his own heart, and he has planted in the hearts of those pastors an individual testimony that God lives. Is it not true all over the missions? Ask these mission presidents, if the young men and women who come to them, many times without this testimony, do not in a few months time stand up and say, "I know the Church is true." That is the thing the world needs today—men and women who know whereof they speak, and who are able to back up what they say by the prophecies and teachings of the prophets of God.

One elder said not long ago: "We want to preach the things the Lord has revealed, and then go to these scriptures and prove that that is the thing he revealed in ages past."

This is the work of God. He is gathering Israel from the nations of the earth, one of a city and two of a family, and he is bringing them to Zion. He is doing it by the very power which he introduced into this great work and planted in the hearts of the young men and women of Zion, who, I testify, will never fail to proclaim this truth to the world. I have been associated with these young men and women to the delight of my soul, knowing that there are no better men and women in all the world than these whom God has sent out to preach the gospel.

I bring to you, my brethren and sisters, from the Northcentral States mission, the love, the faith, and a testimony of the integrity and the virtue of the young men and women who comprise that mission. God bless the Latter-day Saints. Send us more help. Men and women who do not know will know, if they come into the field and will live a godly life and follow the instructions of the brethren. They will know the truth and will be able to stand up with their brethren, shoulder to shoulder, and testify that they know this work is true.

May God be mindful of his people ever, and bless them so that the testimony which they now have may increase and grow. May we be witnesses to the world, for this gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in it, not to convert the world, but as a witness, and then shall the end come. May we make this witness ring from one end of the earth to the other, and fulfil the responsibility which God has placed upon us, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN H. TAYLOR

President of the Northern States Mission

I am very happy, my brethren and sisters, to have the privilege of being a missionary, preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ. I am sure that all of the missionaries, at times, become more or less restless, and rather anxious about the advancement of the work in the mission field. At times we feel that the work is rather slow and that we are not quite accomplishing what we should accomplish. This feeling undoubtedly comes because of the love of the gospel that we have in our hearts and the knowledge that it is the gospel of salvation, and that without it men and women cannot be saved in the kingdom of God. Therefore, we are anxious that the gospel may come to the knowledge and understanding of all of the men and women of the earth.

Recently I was approached by a gentleman who has charge of a radio station. He made inquiry as to whether we wanted to use a time on the Sabbath day to deliver our message to the people by radio, reaching perhaps three million people. We have commenced that service at home and undoubtedly this kind of education, in the gospel of Jesus Christ, will be established in the different parts of the earth, so that all may have the privilege of listening in and obtaining some understanding of the gospel we are preaching.

The Lord is opening the way, and as we come to the large cities and are shut out of the buildings, and it is very difficult to get in touch with the people, the Lord is opening a way whereby we can reach them in their homes and explain the gospel to them. I am sure that we will never abandon the personal labor of the missionary, but we will some day reach more of the homes than we are reaching at the present time.

This gospel is a strenuous one. It makes men and women work. It requires great service at the hands of people who belong to the Church, and if men and women want to find an easy church, an easy way to get religion, the Church of Jesus Christ is not the place for them. We require service at the hands of the people, and the nearer men and women live up to the gospel precepts, the stronger and the better they are. We are not afraid for our young people who understand the gospel of Christ. We are afraid for our young people when they are ignorant and untrained in the beautiful truths and doctrines that we teach in our Church. We are convinced and have proof of the fact that if our young people will study and learn the beautiful truths of the gospel that there is no danger of their going astray or accepting other teachings. We are not withholding books from them. We are not keeping them from association with men and women. In fact we send them out by the thousands that they may come in contact with the trained and the untrained, that they may more thoroughly become familiar with the gospel of Jesus Christ. And just as surely as they will go out and study the gospel and acquire a knowledge of its principles and become educated in its service and acquire humility that they may have the Spirit of God, our young people will always stay with us and will grow up to be men and women who will serve God and keep his commandments.

I am rather surprised, as I travel among the people, at their attitude in regard to Jesus Christ, the Son of God. I had the opinion when I was young that everyone believed in Jesus Christ, and that our great duty perhaps in a missionary line would be to preach Joseph Smith and his great mission. But we find that it is necessary in this day to preach Jesus Christ and him crucified. In fact that was the message and the admonition of the prophet to the first elders who went out into the world to preach the gospel. The instructions of today seem almost like repetitions of what has happened in the past. We read in the Book of Mormon about Korihor and Nehor and others who went out and preached against the coming of the Savior, and told the people that he was not to come, and that it was not necessary to put faith in him, that in the end they should be saved in the kingdom of God. We know that we cannot be saved in the kingdom of God unless we acknowledge Jesus Christ as the Son of God, we know that he came upon the earth and gave his life that we might live again.

May the Lord bless us and help us as a people to stand true and firm in the faith of our fathers. I trust that we will not give up our faith in our Lord and Master Jesus Christ. I trust that we shall never do anything that may cause us to lose our faith and so make us ashamed of the gospel or of the Prophet Joseph Smith. He is a prophet of God and restored to us the gospel of salvation. May we love our Savior, be true to his teachings and follow out his admonitions, I humbly pray in the name of Jesus-Christ our Redeemer. Amen.

ELDER WM. R. SLOAN

President of the Northwestern States Mission

This is truly an inspirational sight, my brethren and sisters, to stand in the presence of these mighty servants of our eternal Father, and I assure you I feel my weakness and my humility this morning as, perchance, I have never felt it before in all my life.

I read an article in the February issue of Current History. The article is entitled "The Re-building of Pre-Historic America and American Art." The writer said most of us believe it was Columbus who discovered America, but that facts are now available to prove that America had been peopled; that great cities and towns had flourished here, not only of tens and hundreds, but of thousands, many hundreds of years before the time of Columbus.

As I listened to the remarks of President John M. Knight I was reminded of an experience which I had three years ago in his mission. Down in an Indian pueblo,—south of Albuquerque, New Mexico, I met an Indian by the name of Pablo Chito. He speaks English, Spanish and French and nine different Indian dialects. In my conversation with him I said: "Pablo, how do you account for these many tribes of Indians, and where do they all reside?" He said, "They are all residents of the state of New Mexico." "Do you mean to tell me that each of them speaks a different dialect and that not one tribe understands the language of the other?" He said that was true. I said, "Pablo, have you ever read the Bible?" He said, "Yes, I have." I said: "Do you remember the 48th and 49th chapters of Genesis, where old father Jacob called his son Joseph, and he with his two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, met that good old Patriarch? Father Jacob crossed his hands and laid his left hand on the head of Manasseh and his right hand upon the head of Ephraim. Joseph, seeing the mistake of his father, went to correct him, and said, "Father, you have your right hand upon Ephraim, and Ephraim is younger." Father Jacob said, "Joseph, I know what I am doing. Manasseh's blessings shall be great, but Ephraim's blessings shall be greater. Ephraim shall become a multitude of nations." Then in the next chapter we read of his calling his twelve sons together, and he said unto Joseph: "Joseph's blessings shall extend above those of his progenitors. Joseph is a fruitful bough by a well, and his branches shall run over the wall, and they shall become a multitude of nations," etc. I said, "Pablo, have you read that?" He said, "Yes, I have," and he said, "I would like to tell you something, Mr. Sloan. Do you see that little house yonder?" As he pointed, he said: "That house was built four generations before Columbus discovered America. You think that he was the first man to discover America." Then he said: "Mr. Sloan, I have a diary that goes back twenty-three generations before Columbus discovered America, and there were many white men here before Columbus' day." This struck me with a force that I had never felt in my life before, and I have tried to analyze his statement. This man's diary goes back twenty-three generations before Columbus discovered America. I have done some little temple work myself and I have been figuring back to enumerate, if I could, just what a numerous posterity that would mean, and I have only gone back twenty-one generations. If you read that wonderful Book of Mormon you will see that there have been thousands and millions of people who have lived on the American continent, and Mr. Hampden, in his article in Current History, enumerates them as millions and millions of people.

Just recently I received a letter from one of the missionaries in the Northwestern States mission in which he recounted this experience to me. He said: "President Sloan, we called on a man and left with him a Book of Mormon." I do not know why the missionary should have done this without any explanation whatsoever as to the contents of the Book of Mormon and as to its purpose. But he said the man took the book and as he read it he found that it spoke of a wonderful people which came from Jerusalem. They lived upon this continent for a few years and then they divided and subdivided, and conflicts arose, and a curse was placed upon some of these people and a dark skin was the result of this curse. This man thought to himself, "Can this be the negro race of people?" Then as he read further along in the book he found that some day these people were to become white and delightful again, and he could not imagine that this would be the negro people. One day after reading from this book and thinking much about it he went to visit his daughter who lived just a half block distant from where he was then residing. He spent the afternoon and stayed all night at his daughter's home. During the night, after he had retired and fallen asleep, he had what you may call a dream or a vision, or what you will. He was taken into a valley through which a river of water was running. Trees were on both sides of the stream, and among the trees and on each side of the river were numerous tents of Indians, or tepees, or wigwams, as you wish to call them. The Indians were there in hundreds, going about their daily duties, etc. He saw nothing to this, however, except a large tribe of Indians. Then this part of the dream closed and he was carried over into his own home, into his own bedroom, and lying on a little center table near his bed was a copy of the Book of Mormon. He saw the book lying there and as he beheld the cover of it he saw a light emanating from the book, and it arose about twelve inches above the book. There it stood for a second or two and then gradually ascended clear into the heavens. He connected the two together and the next day he sought the elders. He said: "You did not tell me that the Book of Mormon was a history of the American Indians. Now I know it is. I know it is a record of God's dealings with those people, because he revealed it to me in my dreams last night."

These experiences, the testimony of President Ivins and of the many other brethren who have spoken during this conference, have encouraged me in this work, and my knowledge of this truth that we are promulgating; and my desire and my ambition is to do more in the future, if God will give me strength, to further his purposes in the earth.

We are working hard in the Northwestern States mission. We have a wonderful group of young men and young women. Only two weeks ago, Sister Powell, one of our girls twenty years old, and her companion were compelled to move their place of residence, and they secured a little home not far from where they had been living. When they went into the little home they found that the stove and the lights had to be connected with the gas. Sister Powell telephoned to the gas company office for them to send a man up to connect the gas. When the man received the call on the other end of the phone he said: "Who is talking, please?" She gave her name. "Your house number, please?" She gave her number. He said: "Will you tell me the business you are engaged in?" She said, "We are 'Mormon' missionaries working in the city of Portland." "'Mormon' missionaries! This is quite peculiar," he said. "Only yesterday, as I have been investigating and studying and praying for light, and that God would bless me and lead me to the truth, a voice whispered to me and said, the 'Mormons' are going to call you up. And here you are calling me up as a member of the 'Mormon' Church. I am not going to send a man to connect the gas, but I am coming myself."

My brethren and sisters, my time is up. I am happy to bring you the love and greetings of the missionaries of the Northwestern States mission, and in the words of the wonderful vision of the Prophet, recorded in the seventy-sixth section of the Doctrine and Covenants,

"Hear, O ye heavens, and give ear, O earth, and rejoice ye inhabitants thereof, for the Lord is God, and beside him there is no Savior."

I bear you this witness, that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith is and was a prophet of God, and that the Book of Mormon is God's revealed truth, and I believe a man can get nearer the Lord by reading that book than any other book in the world. I believe the missionaries today in the Northwestern States mission are nearer God than they possibly have been for some time, because they are reading that book today. They are praying about it, and God is answering their prayers. I pray that he shall continue to bless us, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER DON B. COLTON

Former President of the Uintah Stake of Zion

My brethren and sisters: While I am greatly surprised now, I appreciate that President Grant has allowed me to enjoy in peace the meetings thus far. I have listened and have been thrilled with the messages of this conference.

Not long ago in the city of Washington I was invited to speak in one of the large churches of that city on the question of "What is 'Mormonism?'" At the close of the talk opportunity was given for the asking of questions. One gentleman prefaced his question with remarks about as follows: "At the time of the organization of the Church there were many Christian denominations in the world, hundreds of them, each trying as best it could to teach the message of Christ. Your Church came as a discordant note, so to speak. You have been the cause of much trouble. Peace has been taken from some homes because of your message. Those who have joined your Church and lived their religion have suffered much persecution. Much dissension and discussion have come as a result of it, and your own people have sufferred much in being driven from the east to the west, and have become more or less an isolated people. Query: Why 'Mormonism'? Why all of this turmoil and strife? Has it been worth while?"

I shall not have time this morning to answer in full that question, but I would like to call your attention to two or three of the points that I made in answering that gentleman. In the city of Washington, a year ago this last winter, the leading daily paper published for many weeks articles by the leading authors of the country under the heading, "What my religion means to me." I invited this man's attention to the fact that in every case except one these authors had said they had been compelled, during the course of their lives, to revise their ideas of religion; that they had been taught in the days of their youth that the God whom they worshipped was a personal being with a body and with limitations. As they went out into the world and began their study in the colleges, they discovered that if there is a God he could not be circumscribed with limitations. They saw the evidence upon every hand of his power and of his everywhere-ness and they were compelled, so they said, to change their ideas of the being whom they had worshipped, and were forced to accept God as a force or as an omnipresent power in all the universe. In many cases these authors for a time wandered without any religion, but came back to the conviction that there is some force, some power, some influence, and that power and influence they had learned to call God. But they rejected entirely the idea of a personal God. This gentleman recalled reading all of these articles. Then I said to him, we are told in the scripture, that to know God and Jesus Christ whom he has sent is life eternal.

It is, then, of vital importance, is it not, to know him? The question carries its own answer. To know him is the greatest blessing that can come to a human soul. But the question is, how does "Mormon" philosophy solve the problem and reconcile the omnipresence of God and yet proclaim him a personal being?

"Mormon" philosophy, I say, has given an answer to that question. It has said, and does say, that God is a personal being, but that emanating from him is a light which fills the immensity of space. The light of the sun, the light of the moon, the light of the stars—the light of all the heavenly bodies. Radio proves the presence of at least something that permeates every known object, no matter how opaque the substance. There is found in all the universe a substance, which for lack of a better term we call ether. In the 131st section of the Doctrine and Covenants it is revealed to us that there is no such thing as immaterial matter. But all the forces and everything that is in existence (and we know that the ether is in existence) is but a 'finer matter. I am not saying what it is. I do not know. It only proves, however, that there is a force, a something everywhere, and whether that be the instrument by which the Spirit of God, the light that emanates from him, operates and fills the immensity of space, perhaps is yet to be discovered. Suffice it to say that there is such an instrumentality. This is in accordance with David's description of God, for he said, "If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there; if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.

If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea; even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me."

So "Mormon" philosophy answers the question that has puzzled the thinkers of the day, in revealing how God can be a personal God and yet be omnipotent. Emanating from him is the light which proceedeth forth from the presence of the Father to fill the immensity of space. Ancient scriptures abundantly attest the fact that God is a personal being, and this is supplemented by the revelations of this day which at once answer the question that God may be and is a personal being, and at the same time his power and presence and influence are felt throughout all the length and breadth of the universe. So that "Mormonism" has answered one of the great perplexing questions of the day, and that alone would justify its existence.

Another question, and I must be brief: Next to the great and important question of finding God is to find out who is man, and to that question "Mormon" philosophy has given a definite and reasonable answer. No man who thinks can believe anything else than that man is a dual being. As we stand by the bier of a loved one, we know that something has departed. Evolution, if it were accepted as truth, explains only the body. That which we love, that which reasons, that which thinks, that which has ambition, that which distinguishes man and makes him a little lower than the angels, but much higher than the animals of the earth; that which is really man must be explained. So far as I have found, after extensive reading and earnest research, "Mormon" philosophy alone gives a reason and answer to the question, Who and what is man? He is composed of spirit and body which make up the soul, or the completed man, and that spirit did not have its origin by accident. It was and is the creation of our Father in heaven, and the material of which it is made is only finer matter, as explained in the 131st section of the Doctrine and Covenants. If it exists it is something and is, therefore, matter.

I could give you the explanations of Christian thinkers everywhere. I am sure if you were to compare them with our answer and explanation as to the origin of man you would admit at once that "Mormon" philosophy has given an answer, not only consistent with logic, but consistent with the revealed word of God. We do not believe as Lyman Abbott, for instance, said, that it is possible when that first monkey-man stood up in the primeval forest, that God breathed into that body the soul that we inherit. We do not believe that. Every man has a spirit, is himself a child of God, created just as naturally and just as much in accordance with the laws of nature as is the body itself. We are all God's children.

And so, in further answer to the question, Why "Mormonism?" Not only to reveal God, whom to know its eternal life, but to reveal man, his origin, his relationship to Deity, his wonderful mission here and hereafter.

Another answer, and an answer that is worth while, given in no other philosophy, is the doctrine concerning home. Sometimes it has been said by ill-advised people that "Mormonism" is not conducive to good homes. O, how utterly foreign to the truth is such a thought! "Mormon" philosophy has revealed to the earth that home is the only unit, when properly commenced and fully appreciated, that shall endure forever, and reveals to man the wonderful relationship that does and shall forever exist between man and wife, between father and mother, and children, and gives us a picture of what it really is to become one in God's great family. No more ennobling truth was ever taught to the children of men.

Now we see why Elijah the prophet should be sent to turn the hearts of the fathers to the children and the hearts of the children to the fathers, lest the earth be smitten with a curse, for it comprehends the binding in one of all the children of our Father into his great family. That alone justifies the existence of "Mormonism." I want to say to you that with all due respect to every other religion of the world, I do not believe there is any other people who look upon the sacred relationship of home as we do. We believe that the binding together of man and wife, the sealing of the children to their parents for eternity, will ultimately bring into one fold all the children of God.

In brief, then, Why "Mormonism?" To reveal God, whom to know is eternal life. To reveal man—who he is, and what his relationship to Deity is,—and to proclaim to him how to organize the one unit—home—that shall endure forever. These are some of the reasons, in brief, for the establishment of the "Mormon" religion in the midst of the other religions of the world. This gospel is the power of God unto salvation, the means for salvation, endless joy, endless increase, happiness and progress forever, worlds without end.

God help us fully to appreciate the biggest and best thing in all the universe, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER HENRY N. MICKELSEN

President of the Lost River Stake of Zion

I feel, my brethren and sisters, somewhat like Paul of old said, probably one of the weakest or the least of you. I appreciate more than words can express my fellowship and membership in this great work.

I have not had the privilege as some have had of being born under the covenant, but I have had the privilege of studying for myself. Therefore, in my mature age, I became a convert to this Church, and I can say, as the scriptures say, that the little seed which was sown within me has developed and grown. Wherefore we know, if that be the case, that we are not in error but are continuing in the light. I, too, with the rest of you, in another sense, make the same statement as did Paul: "But I certify you, brethren, that the gospel which was preached of me is not after man, neither did I receive it of men, but by and through the revelations of Jesus Christ."

That is why we are all here. We have not received this gospel of man, but through the revelations of Jesus Christ. Not perhaps through a direct message, but by the influence that he has left us.

I always appreciate hearing someone speak concerning the Book of Mormon. That book is the reason for my standing before you today. I believed it to be the word of the Lord, and in reading it, said to my wife: "If the Bible is the word of the Lord, there is no question in this world that this book is also the word of the Lord." As the Bible is the history of the hand-dealings of the Lord with the people on the eastern hemisphere, so the Book of Mormon is a history of his dealings with the people on the western hemisphere. One substantiates the other, and together they give us a strong testimony.

I bear you my testimony that the Doctrine and Covenants and the Pearl of Great Price are true and from the Lord. No wonder we gather here as a host. No wonder men live and want to live worthy lives that they may continue to grow in this great work, that when we have finished our mission here we may take with us the intelligence which we have gained here. We should, therefore, be thankful to each other and continue to work in the Lord's cause, spending our means and living in such a way that our brethren who are not of our faith may see our good works and join with us.

A young woman from New York City made the statement that it was foolish for the people in this intermountain country to build such a house as we are gathered in, that as far as religious worshipers are concerned it would be impossible for those who are residing in this city to fill it. And yet here it is filled to overflowing every conference. Why is it? It is because we all grow together in this Church. One is not greater than the other, only we respect, of course, our brethren who are over us in authority. But we grow together, we grow in intelligence, and we all take part. That is the reason that we are here today enjoying the Spirit of the Lord and the great testimonies that have been borne.

It is my testimony that this is the work of the Lord, and that it will grow, and that we will be exalted in our Father's kingdom if we continue faithful and do our bit by taking part in this great organization. May the Lord bless us in our righteous undertakings, is my prayer in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER COLEN H. SWEETEN

President of the Curlew Stake of Zion

My testimony has been greatly strengthened during this conference. In listening to the calls of our mission presidents for more missionaries, I feel very proud of the little stake that I have been asked to preside over, for we sense the responsibility of preaching the gospel not only to the world, but to the people who live in our stake who may not understand the gospel. The small stake that I preside over has but 1,250 people. A year ago we had eleven long-term missionaries in the field. When the call came from President Grant for short-term missionaries ten of our brethren volunteered. This is very pleasing to us who preside over that stake of Zion. During the last winter we have had fourteen long-term missionaries in the field and three short-term missionaries.

We quite often hear people, who are trying to criticise, say that our people are not sincere in their belief. I do not see how any person, with a sane mind, can say that, after listening to the report that Elder David O. McKay read to us yesterday of the time and money that have been spent by the members of this Church, and after knowing, as I know, of the effort our people are putting forth in our little stake to preach the gospel to people who do not understand it. I know that we are sincere, and I know that the gospel is true. I know that people who do not think we are sincere have never been humble enough themselves to ask their Father in heaven that they might understand the gospel. There is one truth that we cannot get away from, and it is this: We cannot understand the gospel without the assistance of our Father in heaven. We find in our organizations that wherever those in charge attempt to accomplish the work themselves, with their own power, without asking for the assistance of their Father in heaven, they fail. But wherever they are humble and pray for the assistance of our Father in heaven, he will always come to their rescue and help finish the work they are called to perform. If the people of the world who do not understand the gospel, and are always criticising, would get down on their knees with a prayerful heart and ask their Father in heaven to help them to understand the truth and the beauties of the gospel, I am sure that our heavenly Father would come to their rescue. I know he has done this for me, and that he will do it for others. I know that the gospel is true, and that by trying to help others in this life we help ourselves. We always get more out of the effort of doing our duty than we put into it. May the Lord help us to perform our obligations here on the earth, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER ALFRED H. BELLISTON

President of the Juab Stake of Zion

President Heber J. Grant recently complimented a gentleman for having splendid terminal facilities. That part is not bothering me at present. I would like to have a self-starter. Elder Geo. F. Richards, in one of the meetings of this conference, said that it required greater intelligence to create an idea than it did to find words with which to express it. I have an idea that there is truth in that statement.

I rejoice this morning in being numbered among this people, and in having the privilege of rendering service in this great organization, the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. It is a most wonderful organization. It has nurtured me from my infancy. It has provided for me all the facilities which I consider essential for my progress and development. I am not saying how well I have observed and taken advantage of the opportunities that have been afforded, but it has always provided a means for the exercise of my ambitions and for my development. I thank the Lord that in my teens I became interested in the Church and its doctrines and organizations, and received the benefits of its teachings; that early in my young manhood the Lord blessed me with wholesome surroundings and gave me the privilege and opportunity of associating with men and women of greater wisdom than I had, who were interested in my life and directed my footsteps in the ways of truth; that it became my privilege to perform a mission to the world, and that even before my return from that mission, several months, in fact, I was chosen a member of the bishopric of my ward. I have not been out of the harness since. As a representative of the third generation in the Church, I am happy today to say that the faith is still with the family and has not waned in the least from the days of my grandfather who embraced the gospel in his native land, England.

A wonderful organization, I said. It has been an inspiration during this conference, as it has during many others that I have been privileged to attend, to witness the great body of men of intelligence, busy men, who give their time and their talents for the furtherance of this work, and to look into the faces of thousands who have been called to positions in this Church to minister for the people and teach them the doctrines of Christ, that they may grow in the fear of the Lord. I say that it is an inspiration at this moment to see such men as I see before me. We do not seek positions in this Church, but they come to us as a rule through faithfulness, and I doubt not that the majority of these brethren who are before us, received their appointments with reluctance, feeling their incapacity and inability to discharge the duties and responsibilities that would rest upon them in serving the people and administering in the various offices to which they have been called.

As a parent I feel grateful to the Lord that provision has been made in the organizations of the Church to supplement the home and give proper teachings unto our children in the Sunday schools, in the Religion class and other organizations; that means are provided whereby they can be taught the ways of the Lord and be led to fear him and keep his commandments. It is wonderful when we contemplate these things how kind the Lord has been to us, how merciful he is to us.

I feel that this work is growing. I wish I could report, as the brother before me did, with respect to the missionary work. I think it is a wonderful report that he has just given. I felt that we were one of the smallest stakes in the Church, but we have nearly three times the number of people that the brother who has just spoken has in his stake. It is something to be proud of for a stake with so few members to furnish as many missionaries as he reports has been furnished by his stake. I can see how, in the future, that can strengthen the wards in his stake. These missionaries coming back to the stake with their experience and the zeal that they acquire in the work of the Lord, in their missionary efforts, will repay ten-fold for all the sacrifices that are made now in sending them abroad. I think that this is one thing in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints that the world is jealous of, this missionary system, the strength it brings to the people. It was said recently in a convention by a certain man who had heard many from Utah express themselves that he wondered how it was that the men from Utah when assembled in conventions could express themselves so clearly. This gave the opportunity to explain to this gentleman our missionary system, for practically all of the male members of the Church have the privilege in their early manhood of going out and proclaiming the gospel, thus developing themselves to become useful and efficient in expressing their ideas and views on different questions pertaining to civil life. I am proud today to be numbered among this people, and to have the pleasure of serving them in our stake. I trust that we may grow and be united in our effort to serve the Lord and accomplish his purposes.

May God add his blessings unto all of us, that we may do our duty faithfully, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER STEPHEN L. CHIPMAN

President of the Alpine Stake, Recently Returned from a Short-Term Mission in California

In the fall of 1925, when President Grant announced that he desired men of experience to proclaim the gospel to the world, I was sitting by my counselor, President Clark, and I suggested to him: "There is an opportunity for you." He answered: "You have my consent." I thought that if I had his consent and could get the consent of the President, I should be delighted to go into the world and proclaim the gospel to the best of my ability. The President told me that if I could arrange my affairs he would be delighted to have me go, and I responded to the call. I landed in San Francisco on the 4th day of January. I did not go in the fall, on account of the business interests that needed to be adjusted before I left. I labored in San Francisco but a very short time, and then was called to labor in Oakland. From Oakland I was called to labor in San Jose, and at the first conference we held there, President Joseph W. McMurrin being present, I asked him if he had any objections to my asking the bishops in our stake to recommend missionaries to come down there and assist me in the work. He said he had none whatever; if the bishops would recommend them, he thought it could be arranged. I am delighted to announce to the brethren and sisters present that we had twenty missionaries from the Alpine stake, laboring in the San Jose conference, while I was there. I was somewhat selfish in the matter, because I realized, being president of the stake, that when those missionaries returned they would strengthen us very materially, and besides it would do them good and it would do good to the people of the world.

After I had labored in the mission field six months I was not satisfied. I liked the work so well that I asked permission to remain longer, and I did so with consent. I enjoyed my labors immensely. It was the joy of my life. Most of you are aware that later on we were overtaken in an accident, where eight of our missionaries were hit by an automobile, seven of whom were knocked down and five had to be taken to the hospital. I want to say that at the hospital we received very fine treatment from the doctors, the nurses and the attendants. They were all good to us, and during our stay with them the missionaries taught the gospel to the people in the hospital. While we were sick we spoke of the Book of Mormon to them, and succeeded in placing twenty-five copies of that book among the nurses, the doctors, and the chief nurse of the hospital. We talked of the gospel to every nurse that waited upon us, and I think that some good will come out of this serious accident. I cannot understand why such an accident should have happened to a group of missionaries, choice, pure-minded, industrious young people, who were willing to labor in the service of the Lord. I do not suppose that the Saints in early days in Missouri understood why it was that persecutions were heaped upon them. I suppose that the relatives of John the Baptist could not understand why he had to go to prison and was finally beheaded. I do not suppose that the Saints in ancient days understood why Paul and Silas should be imprisoned, and why Paul should be shipwrecked and beaten with many stripes a number of times. I do not understand these things, but I do know that the Lord is at the helm, and is able to sanctify all these conditions to the good of his people. When I regained consciousness at the hospital (I was unconscious for two or three hours), and found the doctors sewing up my head, and discovered what had happened to me, it seemed to me that I was hurt everywhere from head to foot. I had two gashes in my head, my face was all skinned up, my lips were skinned, my hands and my side also, and there was a gash in one leg, and the other leg was broken. Well, it hit every place about me but the most prominent part, and that was my stomach.

I revisited the hospital to find out how the nurses were getting along with the Book of Mormon. We found them interested and reading the Book. Among the nurses was a Chinese girl who could speak English, and who claimed that she was a Christian. I induced her to take the Book of Mormon and read it. She said she had a brother who was a Ph. D. at the Lick Observatory, at Mount Hamilton. I made a trip up to Mount Hamilton and had the opportunity of talking to him and getting acquainted with him. I told him I knew his sister. I left him my card and the Articles of Faith, and told him who I was.

I appreciated the opportunity of laboring in the mission field and am glad to return. California has good roads, and many flowers, although they are not so fragrant as Utah flowers. They have good fruit, but I do not think the flavor is quite so good as is the flavor of our fruit at home. I think the people at home are as beautiful as the people of California, but we find some fine people in California, splendid, sincere people. As a result of the accident we had many friends raised up to us, Catholic and Protestant, who entertained us and welcomed us into their homes, and had radio programs and receptions for us, and this gave us the opportunity of preaching the gospel to them.

I do not feel to regret the accident very much. I am hardly well yet, but I believe that I will get better, and all of the others who were hurt in the accident are better. The young lady who had to be in the hospital so long with her head crushed is well again. The doctors in California said to me: "There is no hope for her." I said: "Now doctor, I have not felt that way, I believe she will get better." I had not seen the girl, and when they wanted to take me in to show her to me before she left there, I told them I did not want to see her on account of the condition of her face. She weighs twenty-four pounds more now than she did when she went into the mission field, and she looks more beautiful. She is restored, and you cannot see a scar or anything upon her face. It is wonderful. When the doctor was waiting upon me for my foot upon one occasion, he remarked to my good wife who was present: "That is one time when the guardian angels did not have charge of you." My wife said: "Doctor, you are mistaken, that is the very time when they did have charge of us, and they saved every one of us." It would have been an easy matter for every one of the party to have been killed, but the Lord preserved our lives, and I hope that those who are injured, and their parents and friends, will appreciate the kindness of the Lord in the preservation of our lives.

I pray the Lord to bless us here at home, that we may set an example to the world that will help us, and help them.

The only criticism I received while I was away was upon one occasion when speaking on the street corner. A man stepped up to me, after the meeting, and said: "Your talk was fine, but your people do not live according to what you are teaching here, tonight." I was speaking on the fruits of "Mormonism." I said to him: "Well, in what way?" He said that he had lived in Idaho, and that our people did not live up to their professions. I said: "I suppose there are some members of the Church who do not live up to all they should," but, I said, "the Savior himself got one bad one out of twelve, and it is just possible that the gospel net may gather in some, in these days, who are not as they should be." That seemed to satisfy him.

I want to say that we met hundreds of people who had been on the Temple Block, and who have visited the Bureau of Information, and I have yet the first individual to meet who has been heard to criticize or be unkind to us in our visits among them. In every instance they commended the splendid treatment they received here on the Temple Block and at the Bureau of Information. It is a wonderful missionary arrangement for the preaching of the gospel to the people of the world and preparing them to receive the elders. May God bless them, each and every one. Bless these brethren who preside that we may uphold their hands and stand by them in this glorious work of the Lord, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

We have received telegrams from different sections announcing that people in Idaho and other places are listening in by radio to the proceedings of the conference.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn, "How firm a foundation, ye Saints of the Lord."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Heber Austin.

Conference adjourned until Wednesday, 10 o'clock a. m., April 6, 1927.

FOURTH DAY

MORNING MEETING

On Wednesday morning, April 6, 1927, at 10 o'clock, the conference reconvened, with President Heber J. Grant presiding.

The choir and congregation sang, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Heber Q. Hale, president of the Boise stake of Zion.

A mixed quartette sang, "An angel from on high."

ELDER SYLVESTER Q. CANNON

Presiding Bishop of the Church

I sense the responsibility, my brethren and sisters and friends, of occupying this position. I desire that I may have your faith, that I may be inspired to say those things that shall be profitable to all of us. I rejoice greatly in the testimonies and the instructions that have been given to us during this conference. I am sure they are calculated for the welfare, growth and development of the Latter-day Saints.

When the Lord Jesus Christ was upon the earth, and was teaching men the principles of life and truth, there were some who followed him, as we have heard, from among whom he selected his Twelve Apostles. But a time came when the question was asked whether or not they would continue to follow him, and Peter responded: "Whither shall we go, Lord, if we leave thee?" Where could they go to find anything to compare with that which he had presented unto them? I am reminded of the remark made by the Savior to some other followers of his. I would like to read a few words:

"Then said Jesus to those Jews which believed on him, If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed:

"And ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free.

"They answered him, We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man: how sayest thou, Ye shall be made free?

"Jesus answered them, Verily, verily, I say unto you, Whosoever committeth sin is the servant of sin."

At a later time, when Jesus was about to be crucified, he was before Pilate, the Roman Governor, and Pilate asked him some questions, and, besides others, if he were a king. Jesus said:

"Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end was I born, and for this cause came I into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth. Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice."

Pilate said to him, "What is truth?"

In the year 1837, when Heber C. Kimball and others of the apostles and elders were sent to England for the opening of the door of the gospel in that land, after arriving in Liverpool they traveled on to Preston, as I remember it, and as they alighted from the coach, or the stage, at that place, they saw a banner before them, erected as a part of the celebration in honor of Queen Victoria, and on that banner the words, "Truth Will Prevail." These brethren were encouraged by the words on that banner. They proceeded diligently and faithfully in the prosecution of the work that they were called to perform; and the harvest which was reaped through the power and influence of the holy Spirit as a result of their labors was wonderful.

What is truth? We are told that it is the knowledge of things that have been, that are, and that are to be. The Latter-day Saints have accepted this gospel which we understand to be the truth. When the missionaries go out into the world to preach the gospel, they present these things which they declare have come from the Lord; and those to whom the message comes are invited to investigate carefully, to compare these things with those which were declared by Jesus and by his apostles, and with those things that are contained in the scriptures from the very beginning.

In every instance those who have accepted this message, after careful comparison and investigation, have become convinced that these principles are true, that the ordinances of the gospel conform exactly to those which were taught by the Savior and his apostles in the previous dispensations, and that the restoration of the gospel, as declared by the Latter-day Saints, is true. So we have come to accept these principles as being the truth, the everlasting truth. In other words, the gospel is "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth." The Latter-day Saints have been taught and have appreciated the fact that wherever truth is to be found it is a part of the gospel. It is for our welfare, our blessing, and our development.

In the world today there are many things that are in the nature of theories. The scientific method of investigation is to experiment, to establish a hypothesis or a theory and then to endeavor to prove whether or not that theory is correct. There are many theories in the world that some people accept as truth, and yet they are in a status of uncertainty. But things that are definitely and positively proved to be true are and should be accepted and lived up to. There are divine truths which are for the eternal welfare of men, and those divine truths are included and comprehended in the gospel of Jesus Christ. If men and women accept the truth, that is, the true gospel of Jesus Christ, then they shall be made free,—free from sin, from transgression, from superstition, and from all of those things that hinder men's progress.

I believe that the gospel of Jesus Christ as restored in this latter day, in its purity and fulness, could not have been established and carried forward as it has been done in any other land than in this land of liberty. I am sure that the Lord had in his purposes the establishment of this land of liberty that the gospel might be restored here and go forth to all other lands, that men might hear it and, so far as they love truth, accept it. But even in this land there has been, and is to some extent today—fortunately not nearly so much as there was formerly—a spirit of prejudice, of superstition and sometimes even of persecution against those who have accepted the truth.

When the Latter-day Saints received the message which came through the Prophet Joseph Smith, and undertook to live it, they were persecuted in those early days. I was recently reading a report of the Rochester Historical Society of New York, telling of the beginnings of “Mormonism;” and in that story, even today, they rehash old fables and falsehoods that were told against the Prophet Joseph Smith and other leaders of the Church in those early days. Even now they are continuing to spread misrepresentation by repeating those things which were used in a prejudicial way against the early Church leaders. Well, the Church, organized in New York state, moved westward, because the destiny of this work was westward. They established themselves at Kirtland, and they had difficulty there because of persecution and objection to the truth.

The Latter-day Saints have always undertaken to maintain a spirit of kindness and patience, endeavoring to promulgate the truth because they love it, and because they recognize it as a pearl of great price. Yet many people who ought to be willing to accept the gospel and receive the benefits and blessings which come from it, have opposed it and have undertaken to persecute those who have accepted it. The result was that in Kirtland there came a time when there were very dark days for the Church. There were those who, because of persecution, could not stand, nor retain their love of the truth. They were affected more by the persecution of men, and they fell away from the truth. This did not change or alter the truth itself, but it did affect their standing and blessings which they would have been entitled to receive if they had retained their courage and faith in the gospel.

So the people moved again westward to Missouri—the place that the Lord had designated as the center stake—and there they undertook to live the gospel. It is true that they had some failings and weaknesses, but nothing to compare with the men who persecuted them. It was because they were a strange people—a peculiar people—who undertook to carry the gospel of Jesus Christ, the truth, into their every-day lives that they were persecuted and driven. There came a time when conditions in the Church apparently were in a very desperate status, because of the terrible persecutions. Joseph Smith and other leaders of the Church were imprisoned, and their very lives were in danger. The people were driven and persecuted in every way and some were massacred. Brigham Young and others who were not imprisoned were doing everything in their power to remove the Saints from Missouri, and to find a resting place for them. There were those among them who could not retain the truth, whereby they could be free, and endure persecution and trial and trouble.

Finally the Saints were established in Illinois, and there they built a beautiful city—the finest city in the state of Illinois. They established a wonderful community. Then again persecution followed, and those who ought to have been able to acknowledge and understand the truth of the gospel were the ones who were bitterly persecuting and opposing this work. So, after all that effort, the leaders of the Church, Joseph and Hyrum Smith, were cruelly martyred, and others of the authorities of the Church were in danger of their lives, and the people themselves were finally driven out again and had to find another resting place.

So they came westward to this land. There were those, even then, who could not retain the truth, who could not continue in faith, who could not appreciate the fact that this gospel is the means whereby they could be free and overcome the bondage of sin, transgression, superstition and those other things which are the result of the error that is abroad in the world. The Latter-day Saints who still retained and lived the truth came to this land, established themselves and began anew to build a community, where they could live in faith, unity and love, and promulgate the gospel abroad. Notwithstanding these different crises that have occurred, the work has gone steadily forward. After they had become established here those opposed to the truth were not satisfied. Because of the fact that they were growing, that the truth was becoming established and was prevailing, persecution began again later on and continued for a time.

There have been, therefore, at various periods in the history of this people the various tests that have come to the Latter-day Saints to prove their devotion to the truth, and their willingness to maintain it. The gospel of Jesus Christ remains the truth. It is, as stated, the whole truth, it is divine truth, it is the will of the Lord. When the Lord speaks to man, through his prophets, as he has done, as recorded in the scripture, it becomes his word and his will; it becomes scripture; it becomes the truth to mankind. While social and political conditions may vary at different periods of the world's history, the fundamental truths of the gospel remain. Those precepts that are essential to man's salvation endure. So these necessary principles of the gospel, restored in these days, remain as fundamental truths. They are unchangeable and invariable.

The Latter-day Saints who have been loyal have accepted and retained these principles, and they will always retain them, for they are true. There may be those who will fall away from the truth, whether it be as a result of persecution or whether it be because of the pleasures of the world. Whether it be the luxuries or the wealth that comes to men, there are those who cannot endure the conditions necessary to observe the plain, simple, divine truths which make for salvation and for the blessing of mankind. But their failure does not alter the truth, nor stay its progress.

Fortunately, at the present time, there is very little persecution of the Latter-day Saints anywhere; but there are influences of the world among us in this community, and, in fact, influences in the world everywhere, that tend to draw men and women away from the truths of the gospel of Christ. We recognize the fact that while the Latter-day Saints claim to possess the gospel of Jesus Christ in its fulness, and are endeavoring to live in accordance therewith, there are many other people in the world who are living in accordance with principles of truth that form a part of the gospel. These are essential for the welfare, growth and development of mankind, in the promotion of ideals and the practices that shall enable them to accomplish the greatest good in life, and at the same time prepare themselves for eternity.

There are, however, efforts and influences abroad in the world which tend to draw people away from the truth, and from these principles which make for growth and development. Such influences are at work among us here. There is a growing tendency toward a spirit of vulgarity, of profanity, and of obscenity, that is most disgusting in its nature. If we go, for instance, to the theatres today, we find the use of profanity,—the taking of the name of the Lord in vain—a most common and offensive practice. It is also noticeable in many of the magazines that are widely circulated. Also, the jokes, stories and actions on the stage, and in magazines, are, in too many instances, so vulgar and even obscene as to be revolting, to say the least. They are having their influence upon many people, particularly the young people. So, these deceptive efforts are abroad, and their purpose undeniably is to draw boys and girls, and men and women, away from the truth.

My brethren and sisters, and especially my brethren who bear the Priesthood, who carry responsibility as presidencies of stakes, as bishoprics of wards, and all who have received this Priesthood, our responsibility and our opportunity—and also primarily the responsibility of fathers and mothers—is to endeavor to teach our children to restrain themselves in those thoughts, practices or habits that will tend to degenerate them, or tend to reduce their will-power, or their mastery of themselves. It is our business to train them, and forewarn them that if such habits are cultivated, or if they are allowed to grow in their minds, or any other habits of like character, they will tend to lead them away from this everlasting truth.

I pray that the Lord may bless every one of us, that we may recognize these signs and these dangers. We realize that there are influences abroad that are just as insidious, just as dangerous for the maintenance of the standing and the faith of the Latter-day Saints as there were in the days when persecution prevailed. At the same time, we as a people should recognize the great heritage that has come to us from our fathers through their stability, of faith, devotion, and love of the truth; and measure up to that responsibility by training our children and those under our care, through example and good counsel, to resist these habits and tendencies that will lead them away from the truth and into error, and cause them sadness and sorrow. The gospel is a great ideal, a great set of principles, that makes for growth and development, for happiness and peace. It will prevail and triumph, whether or not any of us, individually, shall be able to endure in faith.

May the Lord help and bless us that we may measure up to these opportunities and responsibilities, that we may be able to stem this tide and these influences that are abroad, to maintain those plain and simple standards of truth and of righteousness that shall make for happiness, peace, joy, and finally for salvation, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER CHARLES H. HART

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Canadian Mission

As announced in this conference, I have been called to preside over the Canadian mission. The call came to me at the close of a busy day on February 3, and on February 14 I was on my journey to that historic field, opened nearly ninety-five years ago by Joseph Young, the father of our late and beloved Seymour B. Young. I thought it was an appropriate thing to have a Seventy called to that field, opened by the man who was the first Seventy and the first president of Seventy in this dispensation. He was accompanied by Phinehas H. Young, Elial Strong and Eleazer Miller. In six weeks' time they had raised up a branch of the Church at Ernesttown, Ontario.

The Reverend Harry Emerson Fosdick, who has been referred to in this conference, has just issued a book bearing date August, 1926, called Adventurous Religion. By that he means the same spirit and zeal and adventurous living that characterized the introduction of the gospel in the days of the Savior. He characterizes the incidents connected with Paul's ministry as "the most influential uprush of spiritual power in human history;" that "Christianity began in a great adventure" and that "the life to which Jesus summoned men required insight and bravery to undertake, and fortitude to continue." If the Reverend Fosdick would know of adventurous religion in this age, he need only consult the history of the Canadian mission.

Elder Brigham Young made his way to Canada, in December, 1832, wading through deep snow and crossing the lake when the ice was so thin that it bent under the weight of him and his companion, who could not walk together, the water above the ice wetting their shoes. He and his brother Joseph Young raised up a branch in West Loughborough, after baptizing forty-five souls. Elder Brigham Young, in July, 1833, returned to Kirtland, Ohio, accompanied by some twenty or thirty new converts. That was followed by the labors of Elder Orson Pratt. In fact, Elder Pratt thought he was the first in this dispensation to preach the gospel in Canada. He was followed by Elder Parley P. Pratt, in 1836, and what wonderful fruits these men had in the ministry. John Taylor was providentially found in the city of Toronto, and afterwards, as you know, he became president of the Church. I am a little ahead of my story, chronologically. I should record the fact that Presidents Joseph Smith and Sidney Rigdon preached in this historic field. Old father Nickerson and his wife, of Mount Pleasant, Ontario, drove to Kirtland and brought the Prophet Joseph and Sidney Rigdon to Mount Pleasant. There is a graphic account of this visit, by Lydia Knight (whose maiden name was Lydia Bailey) in her History, on pages 14 to 23. Lawyers abbreviate by using exhibits. May we refer to these pages as an exhibit to be read as an example of "adventurous religion."

Someone has suggested that Canada is really entitled to much credit in opening up the British mission, because four of the converts in Canada accompanied Elders Heber C. Kimball, Willard Richards and Orson Hyde to the British mission, referred to today. One of those persons was Joseph Fielding, the brother of Mary and Mercy Fielding.

From this early work we can get some insight into what the Lord no doubt meant in telling Joseph Smith to "be not weary in well doing;" that "from things that are small proceedeth that which is great;" that souls are precious in the sight of God, and if it be that "one spends all his days in bringing save it be one soul into the fold, how great shall be his joy with him in the kingdom of my Father." Mary Fielding now stands at the head of a posterity numbering several hundred, representing, as it were, a great cone of righteous humanity with the apex pointing to Mary Fielding Smith, the wife of the Patriarch, and with a base ever widening as the years come and go.

I had a glorious experience in this mission, in "swinging around the circuit," touching the great cities of Hamilton, London, Toronto, headquarters of the mission; Ottawa, where the Dominion Parliament was in session, the great city of Montreal; Halifax, in Nova Scotia; the old city of St. John, New Brunswick; and the cities of Bangor and Portland, Maine, and back again to headquarters.

While at Toronto a friend entertaining us for dinner, with evident pride, showed me a copy of the new Catholic Encyclopedia. He himself had studied for the Catholic ministry, but was still connected with a protestant church. He explained to me that this edition of the Catholic Encyclopedia had been sponsored by the Knights of Columbus. He called my attention to an article under the heading of "Mormons." Hastily glancing through it, I was agreeably surprised at the fair treatment of the subject throughout, with the exception of two or three sentences. One sentence is very closely connected with the important event of the erection and dedication the other day of a monument to the Three Witnesses to the Book of Mormon. In the edition of the Encyclopedia mentioned there is a statement that the Three Witnesses, whom we honor now by a beautiful little monument upon these grounds, had denied their testimony. I did not take a copy of the exact words of the later edition, but the earlier edition, the one copyrighted in 1911, uses this language:

"In renouncing 'Mormonism' subsequently, Cowdery, Whitmer and Harris, the three principal witnesses, declared this testimony false."

I am sure that the Knights of Columbus, if responsible for this error, will be pleased to correct it when their attention is called to it, because the statement is contrary to the facts. My father, James H. Hart, interviewed David Whitmer, in 1883. The interview was reduced to the form of verse, afterwards read and approved by David Whitmer. It was published in the October, 1883, number of the Contributor, vol. 5, pages 9 and 10, to which I again make a reference for the sake of brevity.

David Whitmer said:

"My written statement I have ne'er denied.
I saw the angel, and I heard his voice
And wondrous things, that made my heart rejoice."

After giving an account of the visitation to him of the angel, he said:

"If this be not the truth, there is no truth,
And I have been mistaken from my youth;
If I'm mistaken, you may know from thence,
That there's no God, no law, no life, no sense.

"I know there is a God—I've heard his voice,
And in his power and truth do still rejoice;
Though fools may ridicule and laugh today,
They shall know the truth of what I say."

"I've suffered persecution at the hands
Of hireling preachers, and their Christian bands;
I've braved their hatred, and have them withstood
While thirsting for the youthful Prophet's blood.

"They came, four hundred strong, with visage bold
And said, 'Deny this story you have told;
And by our sacred honor, we'll engage
To save you from the mob's infuriate rage.'

"A mighty power came on me, and I spake
In words that made the guilty mobbers quake;
And trembling seized the surging crowd, and fear;
But left unharmed, I felt that God was near."

Had he been disposed to deny his testimony, a good time would have been when the mob came.

I would also like to refer to an affidavit dictated by Charles M. Nielsen, formerly a city judge of this city, of a court room testimony of Oliver Cowdery. Again, I shall refer to this as an exhibit, to be read by you later when the same may be published. It is a court scene in Michigan, with Oliver Cowdery prosecuting a murder case. The attorney for the defense said in a very sarcastic manner:

"I hope, Mr. Cowdery, that when you are going to reply to my argument to the jury that you will tell us something about the angel who came down in his night clothes while you and Joe Smith were digging golden plates out of the Cumorah hill, by which you have deluded so many thousands of our countrymen, by deceiving them in regard to the coming forth of a certain book called the Book of Mormon."

The narrative continues:

"Finally Oliver Cowdery's turn came to reply. I shall never forget how his face looked, no matter how long I shall live. He was as calm as a summer morning. There was no anger in his face or in his words. In addressing the court and the jury he said:

"Oh, I do wish that I could escape replying to the challenge of my brother attorney representing the defendant in this case, but I can not. I dare not. The angel that appeared to us was not a dream. It was not in the night time. It was in the day time while the sun was shining brightly on a clear beautiful day. We were praying in turn as we were kneeling on the ground and while in the attitude of prayer, a brilliant light surrounded us, the glory of which I can not describe. It even surpassed the brilliancy of the sun. A beautiful personage stood before us, about two feet from the ground, and he told us that his name was Moroni, and he declared to us that the Book of Mormon had been translated by the gift and power of God, and he commanded us to bear witness of the fact, and he said, 'If you ever deny what you have seen and heard here from me to-day, there is no forgiveness for you in this life nor in the life to come.'"

There are other interesting matters contained in this affidavit that you may read at your leisure; also, another affidavit now being prepared at my suggestion by Elder William H. Homer, who interviewed Martin Harris in the Kirtland Temple and heard his dying declaration, and that is the point that I am coming to—the force of a dying declaration.

As President Joseph Quinney, Jr., and I passed through the town of Bellville, Ontario, there was on trial before Judge Logie a murder case in which the prosecuting attorney presented an ante-mortem statement, a dying declaration, by one Charles St. Charles, a court bailiff who had been shot down. The principal testimony for the Crown was a dying declaration of Mr. St. Charles. The jury, after hearing the evidence, and being instructed by the court as to the weight that should be attached to a dying declaration, brought in a verdict of not guilty, and then a very unusual thing occurred. The judge evidently thought that the jury had disregarded the instructions of the court or the argument of counsel for the Crown as to the weight of a dying declaration, and rebuked the jury by telling the defendant that he might as easily have been convicted as acquitted upon the testimony taken, and that the court was not satisfied with the verdict and would report the case further. The English press in its conservative way criticized the judge for his invasion of the rights of the jury, but it indicated the weight he thought was attached very properly to a dying declaration under British law, a rule so strong in the law that judges in the states follow this rule, notwithstanding the sixth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which guarantees to every man the right to be confronted by the witnesses against him. The force of a dying statement was understood in the time of Shakespeare, as indicated in his play of "King John," where one Melum, on his death bed, gives evidence of the contemplated treachery of Louis, a French lord. When not believed Melum exclaims:

"Have I not hideous death before my view,
Retaining but a quantity of life,
Which bleeds away even as a form of wax Resolveth from the figure 'gainst the fire?
What in the world should make me now deceive,
Since I must lose the use of all deceit?
Why should I then be false,
Since it is true that I must die here,
And live hence by truth?"

The underlying strength of a dying declaration is given by jurists of the Supreme Court of one of our American states as follows:

"When dissolution is approaching and the dying man has lost all hope of life, and the shadows of the grave are gathering in around him and his mind is impressed with the full sense of his condition, the solemnity of the season and hour gives to his statement a sanctity of truth more impressive and potential than the formalities of an oath," etc.

I might say that the testimony of each of these three men had the weight of a dying declaration, as you may plainly know from the documents outstanding on that question. David Whitmer, in a dying declaration, as well as these other men, affirmed the truth of those statements; so that it is not true that they denied the testimony that is attributed to them in the Book of Mormon, and which is now perpetuated, not only in the hearts of the people, but in bronze upon this monument. I rejoice that our brethren were led to erect a monument to that very important fact in the history of the Church.

While at Toronto, I had an opportunity of going forward with a little commission that President Joseph F. Smith laid upon me, sometime before his death, of following up a discovery in that neighborhood—the discovery of what is called a “Stone Cist,” somewhat like the one in which the sacred plates were found by Joseph Smith. The following is from the Records of the Past, the March and April numbers, 1909, pp. 75 and 76.

Discovery of stone Cist in Ontario: On the farm of T. M. Edmundson, near Streetsville, in Peel county, (about 22 miles west of Toronto) in the fall of 1906. It had slabs of stone for sides and ends, a clay floor and no cap stones, but these may have been removed in cultivation years ago, without discovering the side slabs which were on level with the ground: 7 feet x 1 ft. x 4½ feet deep. Stone cists have been found in Tennessee, Illinois, at points on the Delaware river and in northern New Mexico.”

I found some people by that name but have not yet found Mr. T. M. Edmundson, but I hope to do so.

We had a joyful time in meeting with the seventy-five fine young brethren and sisters who are missionaries in that field. I did not put in my application, as there are some points connected with a mission presidency that I am not versed in to begin with, but I would like to put in my application now for at least one stake president in each one of the eight districts, so that they may be inclined to follow the example of President Chipman of Alpine stake in having a score of their stake workers join them, and then we will be pretty well equipped. We would also like to have a powerful broadcasting station somewhere within the radius of our mission field, and also a moving picture equipment. It is really a slow process to hunt for men in the mission where you have to persuade them to come to our meetings and then have so few of them there. We had good meetings throughout, but light attendance.

I rejoice in this labor, my brethren and sisters. These young men and young women are going forward with zeal in this work of an “adventurous religion.” If time permitted we might tell of examples from the experiences formerly and today in this mission, matching those in the ministry in the days of Paul. The Canadian missionaries have all pledged their loyalty and support to this cause. They are going forward in response to the commission given, as recorded in the 1st section of the Doctrine and Covenants:

“Hearken, O ye people of my church, saith the voice of him who dwells on high, and whose eyes are upon all men; yea, verily I say: Hearken, ye people from afar; and ye that are upon the islands of the sea, listen together.

"For verily the voice of the Lord is unto all men, and there is none to escape; and there is no eye that shall not see, neither ear that shall not hear, neither heart that shall not be penetrated. * * *

"And the voice of warning shall be unto all people, by the mouths of my disciples, whom I have chosen in these last days.

"And they shall go forth and none shall stay them."

And in that same section is a dignified presentation of the view of the Lord in reference to this Church, and it may well be read in contrast with the indictment published in the Atlantic Monthly for March, 1927, and referred to in the Literary Digest heretofore mentioned in this conference. Read that scathing indictment, which probably cannot be maintained upon all counts in connection with the dignified statement of the Lord through the Prophet Joseph, in section one, verse 30 upon which we can, and do, and must stand:

"And also those to whom these commandments were given, might have power to lay the foundation of this Church, and to bring it forth out of obscurity and out of darkness, the only true and living Church upon the face of the whole earth, with which I, the Lord, am well pleased, speaking unto the Church collectively and not individually"—a distinction which should always be observed upon our part and the part of others.

Now if I may conclude in the language of that same section:

"For behold, and lo, the Lord is God, and the Spirit beareth record, and the record is true, and the truth abideth forever and ever;" and that is my testimony in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER HENRY H. ROLAPP

President of the Eastern States Mission

My brethren and sisters: I believe this is the third time in my life that I have occupied a position of this kind in the Tabernacle in Salt Lake City. I have been on the General Board of the Sunday school for nearly twenty years, and twice I have spoken in the Tabernacle on behalf of that organization. This is the first time that I have been called upon to speak in general conference. I know, of course, that it is because I have been called to preside over the Eastern States mission that the President has been kind enough to give me this privilege.

I rejoice in the opportunity of preaching the gospel of Christ. I was converted in the old country, fifty years ago, next December. As a young man I felt very enthusiastic about the gospel of Christ. I can't remember the time, since then, when I have not had a testimony of the gospel of Jesus Christ. I have been called into many different positions, civil, political, and otherwise, but I have always been blessed by the Lord with a knowledge that the gospel of Christ, as it was restored through the Prophet Joseph Smith, is true, and is that which ought to be preached to the world.

To the extent of my small ability, I shall go into the world and tell the story of "Mormonism." I shall keep on telling it until someone will believe it and join the Church.

As I think of the Church that Christ himself established, at the age that we have attained, ninety-seven years, and remember that the apostles were not even permitted to preach the gospel as we have the right to preach it, I am glad of the change in conditions. When a person in those days opened his mouth about the gospel that the Master had proclaimed, he took his life into his hands. As I have sat here and listened to all these men, these leaders of the Church, telling us of the principles of the gospel, and giving us encouragement in going on with the work, I have recognized how much greater is our opportunity for securing salvation, for securing a knowledge of the principles of the gospel, than was given unto those who lived in the days of the Master. Rome was the big city when that privilege finally came, three hundred or more years after the birth of Christ. It was Rome, a city that was amongst the Gentiles; it was Rome that was regarded as the big Christian center. Today the Church of Christ, the big center of the Church of Christ, is here in Salt Lake City, among those who have builded this community.

It is true, as Brother Charles H. Hart has just been telling us, that people are beginning more patiently to listen to the gospel. There isn't the same opposition to the elders that there was twenty or twenty-five years ago. We can go out and proclaim the fact that we belong to the "Mormon" Church. Twenty or twenty-five years ago that was a challenge for a discussion. Today it is accepted; it is taken for granted. The other fellow may not believe it, but he will stand and listen to you. I have experienced it in my little life. I have been acquainted with more non-"Mormons" probably than I have with persons among the Latter-day Saints. Everyone knows that I am a Latter-day Saint, that I am a "Mormon," and they accept it, pay no particular attention to it, but they accept it as a fact. That is going to be a great help. I trust that we in the Eastern States mission will take advantage of that situation; that we will go forward; that we will preach the gospel by day and we will preach it by night. We will keep on going. After all, that is the great thing—to get the knowledge or the belief into the hearts of men, and to get them into the Church, and get them so that we can lift them up. When you and I first entered we did not have much of an understanding of the gospel. It came to us by inspiration from God above, but as we came along and you helped and everybody helped to give us more instruction, we began to see the grandeur of it and we appreciated it.

I feel glad that I am going on a mission. Though it is late in life, probably, I shall do my best. I know that I have to follow a great man, a great orator, but I shall do my best, so long as the Lord shall keep me in that country, to convert the people to the fact that here in Utah and surrounding states are the Saints of God, those whom he has selected, as a small number, to bring out the truth in the world. I pray God that he will bless us all in doing that which we can do, at home or abroad, preaching the gospel of Christ, so that we may bring men into this communion, all of which I ask, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER FRED J. TADJE

Former President of the Swiss-German Mission

My brethren and sisters: I am very grateful to my heavenly Father for the opportunity that I have had of fulfilling a mission among the German-speaking people. I am also very happy to have this privilege of being home again and enjoying the association of my brethren and sisters here in Zion. My spirit has responded to the treatment received during this conference. I feel that we have had a spiritual feast, for which I have longed, a number of years. I mean by that, I have longed for the opportunity of meeting again with the brethren and sisters in general conference assembled.

I should like to state, briefly this morning, just what we have been doing in the mission field during the last four years. It is now just a little over four years since I left, with my family, on this mission. Elder Charles S. Hyde, who was called to preside over the Netherlands mission, and a group of elders, went with us. We left Salt Lake City on March 16, 1923. On the evening of our departure from this city it was raining, and by morning we were in the midst of a very cold and violent snow storm, which made our train eighteen hours late by the time we arrived in Chicago. I became ill with gripe the first night out of Salt Lake City, and I believe because of the cold train and lack of hospital accommodations, this cold brought on a very severe case of inflammatory rheumatism with which I suffered very severely on the whole trip, and a month after my arrival in the mission field. By the time we reached Liverpool I could hardly walk. Only with the greatest of difficulty was I able to move about, and when we arrived in Cologne, which is about two-thirds of the way from Liverpool to Basel, I was rendered so weak that it was impossible for me to go on. We remained there five days. During all that time I was confined to a bed which was furnished by a family of Saints. In fact, they gave us the best accommodations possible. They turned over to us several rooms, which we appreciated very much. When I arrived in Basel I was almost a physical wreck, but I soon found a place to rest and expected to be well again in a few days. In this, however, I was very much disappointed, as I was bedridden for nearly a month. I did not have the privilege when I arrived in the mission field of visiting in all the branches and conferences with elder Serge Ballif, who was presiding over that mission, and whom I was to succeed, for within an hour of my arrival in the mission field, in Basel, I was confined to my bed. When I had recovered sufficiently to leave my bedroom, conferences were arranged for all of the sixteen districts in the mission. About two weeks before I was to start on my trip I suffered a relapse and was forced to return to bed. My condition became almost hopeless, and I began to wonder how long it was going to last. Discouragement had not set in yet, for I knew positively that the Lord's purpose in calling me on this mission was not that I should spend my days in bed sick. That faith and assurance had been given me before I left this city, thanks to the Lord, but I became very anxious to meet the elders and the Saints. I began pleading with my heavenly Father to render me physically fit, and to enable me to accomplish the desires of my heart. While I lay there so helpless, the second time, I gave every consideration to the advisability of calling off these conferences. I consulted with our mission secretary, Elder Kasteler, and we both were agreed that I would not be able to fill these conference appointments. So he was asked to give the conference presidents notice of the postponement. As he was leaving my bedroom—he was not entirely out of my sight—the Spirit of the Lord enlightened me, my brethren and sisters, and reminded me of an experience which I had had two or three days before. I asked Brother Kasteler to return, and I said to him: "It will not be necessary for you to write the conference presidents, for I am going to be well in time to attend those conferences."

What do you think happened? The Spirit of the Lord gave me to understand that if I really wanted to I should be able to fill those appointments. Elder Kasteler marvelled about it, and in spite of my pains, I felt like shouting hosannas to the Lord for his goodness unto me. Did I really want to be out in the field? Yes, in very deed. I knew positively that I was going to be well, for I wanted to be among those elders and Saints; and so it came true! The Lord heard my prayers and granted me the desire of my heart. I hope I shall never be found ungrateful to the Lord by forgetting this incident and a number of others of a similar character which I experienced during this last mission.

The physician warned me not to leave on this trip. It was the rainy season. It had rained almost incessantly. He felt I was going out too soon after such a siege of illness. He turned to me and said: "Mr. Tadge, if I had complete control over you, you would not go away, but you would remain right here and take baths and other treatments; because a recurrence of that rheumatism through the same cause might incapacitate you for life." He was in earnest, but I smiled and assured him that nothing like that was going to take place, and it did not, for I never had another sick day on my mission. My health improved from day to day, and it appeared that traveling during the inclement season did me good instead of harm. When I returned from my first trip, which lasted approximately three months, I had completely recovered.

The mission made progress by leaps and bounds. The Spirit of the Lord touched the hearts of the honest seekers for the truth. No man living can rightfully claim credit for the success the mission enjoyed. During the last four years over five thousand souls were baptized in the Church in those countries. It was a joy to hold conferences because of the host of people who would attend. Frequently there were a thousand and more people in attendance, at which four hundred, five hundred, or six hundred, were friends eager to hear our message. It was a common occurrence during the years of 1923 and 1924 to have a good-sized baptism after each conference. We baptized possibly from twenty or thirty to forty within a week or two weeks after this conference. We held these conferences every Sunday.

It might interest you to know that we have splendidly organized Sunday schools in the mission, also Relief Societies, Mutual Improvement associations of the Young Men and Young Ladies, and before we were released the Primary organizations were already functioning in a few of the larger branches, but they were not known by that name. This work was done in connection with the Sunday schools. Also a very remarkable work is done in the mission by our choirs. Organizations of one hundred voices, or more, would furnish the music at our special meetings and conferences. Our local members in the mission are very diligent in spreading the gospel. I have in mind a widow in the city of Chemnitz, who used to bring over twenty children to Sunday school each Sunday morning. These were children of her neighbors. Several rows of chairs were reserved for her each Sunday morning by the superintendency, and a similar work was done by these brethren and sisters throughout the whole mission.

Due to the phenomenal success in the mission, as to making converts, it became apparent that more efficient work could be done and many new members could be taught the principles of the gospel more efficiently, and the priesthood and auxiliary organizations could be looked after better, if the mission were divided. The presiding brethren saw fit to do this, so the division was effected in 1925. President Hugh J. Cannon was appointed to preside over the western part of the former Swiss and German mission, and I was transferred to preside over the eastern part of the mission with headquarters at Dresden.

Many new fields have been opened up during the last year, and I am sure that thousands will yet accept the gospel in that country, provided the conditions remain as favorable as they are at the present time. Germany is in very deed a fruitful field. Our missionaries are enjoying perfect freedom; and let me assure you they are doing a good work. Some of them will even do a better work if no opportunity is given them by our good parents here at home to spend money lavishly, comparatively speaking. Some elders get along with less than fifteen dollars a month in the mission, others spend twenty-five and a number of them, possibly the average, thirty dollars a month. I think the parents should not send more than about thirty dollars a month unless these elders are assigned to labor in new fields. Remember high expenditures lessen the spirituality of the elders. The German people are very hospitable, and the members of the Church even more so. They give food, shelter, clothes and money to the Lord's servants. You have read what the revelation says about such people. We read in Section 84 of the Doctrine and Covenants as follows:

"And whoso receiveth you, there I will be also, for I will go before your face. I will be on your right hand and on your left, and my Spirit shall be in your hearts, and mine angels round about you, to bear you up.

"Whoso receiveth you receiveth me; and the same will feed you, and clothe you, and give you money.

"And he who feeds you, or clothes you, or gives you money, shall in nowise lose his reward.

"And he that doeth not these things is not my disciple; by this you may know my disciples."

I feel that there are many disciples in the Swiss and German and the German-Austrian missions, for they do feed the elders of the Church, they give our elders money, and they look upon them, as real servants of the Almighty. The Saints do more than this; they observe the law of tithing in a most remarkable manner, and they fail not to donate liberally to the fast offering account. The mission ranks very high in these activities. I should like to show you just by one or two incidents, for I haven't time for more, how the attitude of the people toward the Church and its members has changed in Germany. Professor Thomas A. Beal, of the University of Utah, was invited to deliver a lecture on Utah and the "Mormons," at the University of Berlin, on the night of December 15, 1925. There were from three hundred to four hundred people in attendance, and the address was well received. Before 1914 this would have been an impossibility. Also Elders David O. McKay and James E. Talmage, myself and many other elders have had the opportunity of preaching the gospel in the school halls of Prussia and in the City Hall of Berlin. This would have been simply impossible prior to the time of the Great War.

I could relate other incidents to show you how the local members are respected now in the mission, whereas formerly they were despised by city officials. I may possibly be permitted to relate an incident that took place at the unveiling of the memorial tablet in honor of Karl G. Maeser, so that it will go into the record. The present owner of the property where Karl G. Maeser was born did not object to our erecting a tablet in his honor. I made a number of visits to the place, and each visit resulted in a religious conversation. He was always glad to see me and welcomed me in his home, but of all things in the world religion interested him the least. He said: "Mr. Tadge, I simply cannot believe in the existence of a God. I have heard and seen too much of ministers who are insincere; therefore, the churches do not interest me. I cannot and will not trouble my mind about God and religion." I would hear that story every time that I conversed with him. At the close of the dedicatorial services I noticed that his little garden, in front of the house, had been trampled on by our people, and it did not look very good. I told him how sorry I was that we had ruined his little garden, but he said to me in all sincerity: "Mr. Tadge, our kind, heavenly Father will let it grow again, I am sure." He added: "You may be surprised at hearing me talk that way, but, Mr. Tadge, I tell you my heart is full, my feelings almost overwhelm me; because, what I have seen and heard, today, convinces me that there is a just God in heaven." So impressive, my brethren and sisters, were the services incident to the unveiling of this memorial tablet.

In conclusion, I wish to bear my testimony that I know positively that the gospel is true: I know positively that the supernatural elements, to which our esteemed President referred in his opening remarks, exist in the Church today. The Lord has been with us, and may he continue to bless us; may we abide in the faith continually by observing his commandments, I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER LEVI EDGAR YOUNG

Of the First Council of Seventy

I noticed, by an editorial in the paper this morning, that a monument is to be erected in honor of the pioneer mothers of this great country of ours. I was thrilled when I read the account, and happy when I was informed a few weeks ago that the monument designed in sculpture, by a Utah son, Mahonri Young, would possibly be accepted by the judges in the contest. As I see before me a number of pioneer mothers, I wish to say, on this occasion, that I am very grateful to God that the wonderful work of the pioneer mothers, who blazed the trails into the wilds of America, is to be recognized. For, if there ever lived fine womanhood, women who loved God and gave to the work of God all that was best, it was the pioneer mothers of this country and this great state.

Ten years ago, this morning, President Woodrow Wilson, before the Congress of the United States, proclaimed war against Germany, and the United States entered that great contest. You pioneer mothers sent forth your sons and your grandsons. They fought in the war, they fell in battle, but they honored you in maintaining the finer ideals of civilization. The war was ended a few years ago, but there are some things greatly needed by all peoples of the world. The world today needs a higher morality, and to attain such it must recognize the existence of a divine Will and Personality, more than ever before. The idea that good can be disassociated from the idea of God is wrong. The world since the war needs a finer system, not only of religion, but of effort for a larger righteousness. This will be the greatest preventive of war. Nations must have a deeper consciousness of the personal relationship between God and the individual, and a broader philosophy of history which attempts to unfold the divine purpose in the rise and progress of nations. What the world needs, therefore, is character, the kind of character that you pioneer mothers taught your sons and your daughters; and it is the gospel of Jesus Christ which brings out the idea of a belief in God, a God who is righteous and loving—a person. This must lie at the root of character, and today the Latter-day Saints realize more than ever that it is revelation that gives a new impulse to the spiritual advance of humanity.

My brethren and sisters, life is a spiritual gift and a spiritual opportunity. Salvation means the recovery of life. It was the Apostle Peter who wrote and said: "His divine purpose has granted to us all things that pertain to life and to godliness, through the knowledge of him who called us by his own glory and virtue."

There has been ushered into the world a new force in history, and this was accomplished a hundred years ago by a barefoot boy, a child, who hardly had enough to eat, but who had linked his life with God's. His name was Joseph Smith. He was the "Mormon" prophet, the prophet of this new dispensation, and was born at the beginning of the nineteenth century. It was a new age of the world's history. The government of the United States had been organized. The common man had come into his own. The government under which we live had acclaimed for the first time in all history that man is endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. The constitution of the United States had written large: "We, the people"! It was the common man who was speaking, the man upon whose shoulders rested the great work of the new age. So this new prophet came at an opportune time, for a new age had come; a new age for the extending of the message of Christ Jesus our Lord was to be ushered in. To the world this Joseph Smith announced the word of God direct from heaven. The Priesthood of God was restored with all its rights, powers and blessings. The Church of Christ was reestablished and the knowledge of man's divine relationship to God was reaffirmed. The world was given a new faith. Michelet, the French historian, said at the beginning of that century: "If there is anything in the world that is needed, it is a new faith in Christ our Lord." This, the religion of Jesus Christ, asserted with a clearer vision, a deeper knowledge, the kingdom of God and its establishment upon the earth. It teaches the truth of God the Father and the infinite value of the human soul. It restores the higher righteousness and the commandment of love. It summons all men to Christ and says to them: "Rise up and be God's children." All must labor and put their hands, hearts and minds to the work of progress. Eternal progression and the immortality of the soul give us the key to the higher life beyond. So through the work of this prophet a new day has dawned with a new sky over our heads. For in religion as in other things men are not owned any more but are guided. This religion of Christ, our Lord, claims today that men of truth are living more than ever in all history. This man Joseph Smith, therefore, was not a Calvin nor a Luther nor a Zwingli. He was far more than they were; he was a prophet of fire, with a moral intensity, believing and teaching that the Kingdom of Heaven is near at hand. He believed and taught that wrong and injustice, unrighteousness and sin, could not stand before the oncoming of the kingdom of righteousness. The hearts of men are to be turned to usher in the kingdom and the glory of God. Prophet and seer, he was the great interpreter of the Spirit of Christ to the new thought of the new world. He did not arrive at truth by a logical process. He perceived it. Truth was spiritually discerned. So today, for a nation to enter into this great program of peace that we are dreaming and thinking about, that nation must discern truth and light direct from God.

Christ today is acclaimed anew. There is a superb explanation of mind and thought and peace. Men of God are entering on the scene of action as never before. So lift up your eyes, O people of the world! The supreme drama is enacting. My brethren and sisters, may we go forth from this conference with a greater testimony burning in our hearts; may our love for humanity increase; may our faith in God deepen. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

President Charles H. Hart's remarks about the Catholic Encyclopedia have brought the following memorandum from Brother Orson F. Whitney:

"President Grant: 'I wrote the article on 'Mormons' for the new Catholic Encyclopedia, by request of President Joseph F. Smith, and at the solicitation of Dean Harris. He signed it, and sent it to New York, where it was changed, things being written into it that the article, as it left my hands, did not contain. The assertion that the Three Witnesses denied their Testimony was one of these interpolations. I protested to the Dean, and he invited me to correct the misstatement, which I did. Whether they published my second article in the Encyclopedia (as promised) I know not. (Signed) ORSON F. WHITNEY."

Apparently they did not.

The congregation sang, "Do what is right."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Joseph E. Cordon.

Conference adjourned until 2 p. m.

CONCLUDING MEETING

The closing meeting of the 97th Annual Conference session was held on Wednesday, April 6, 1927, at 2 o'clock, in the tabernacle, a large congregation being in attendance.

President Heber J. Grant presided, and announced that the congregation would sing the hymn, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation."

After singing, prayer was offered by Elder George H. Brimhall.

The congregation sang, "Zion stands with hills surrounded."

ELDER STEPHEN L. RICHARDS

During the noon hour, I called upon Brother Richard R. Lyman. He is detained at home by sickness. He asked me to convey to the conference his love and blessing. I do so cheerfully, because I know of the depth of his feeling and regard for you, my brethren and sisters, and for the work of the Church.

I know that the few moments which remain, the short time in which to conclude this conference, are very precious, and I shall be grateful indeed if I may leave just a thought, prompted by the proper spirit, as a contribution to the great work of the Church. I have been thrilled and inspired, as I am sure you have all been, by the testimonies which have been given and the splendid remarks which have been made.

INTELLIGENT RESPONSE TO THE SPIRIT OF THE SPEAKERS

I have studied with some care the various congregations which have assembled during the conference. I have looked into the faces of these men who sit near the stand, many of whom I have the honor to know. I have seen in their countenances the impressions which have been made by the inspiring discourses, and I have noted that throughout the building on all the occasions when meetings have been held, great interest has been given to the proceedings. It is apparent that those who have gathered have responded to the spirit of the speakers and to the great truths to which utterance has been given.

THERE ARE THE WAYWARD, THE CARELESS, THE INDIFFERENT

As I have observed these congregations I have continually thought of an imaginary congregation which, perchance, might be assembled in this great building. I have thought, and I regret that my belief is that it is true, that this building could be filled with another congregation of members of the Church made up of those who are indifferent, who are wayward, who are careless and negligent, and whose hearts and spirits do not respond to the message of truth as do yours. I have thought of these men and women who have come from good families, whose fathers and mothers have in some instances been the very pillars of the Church, and I have wondered, if such a congregation were assembled, just what we would say to them and just how we would endeavor to reach them with these great truths which are embraced within the gospel of Christ.

OUR OBLIGATION TO INTERPRET THE GOSPEL TO THE NEGLIGENT

These who are wayward and indifferent are scattered all through the stakes of Zion and the wards of the Church. Unfortunately there is scarcely a single family where there is not some problem, in which there is not someone who does not think and feel quite as the faithful think and feel, and to whom it is difficult to give interpretations of the gospel that may appeal. I would like to say that while I regard our greatest work to be the proclamation of the gospel abroad to the peoples of the earth, that men may know of the truth and be persuaded to come to the fold of Christ, nevertheless, I fully believe that our obligation to take and interpret the gospel to those who have in some measure at least departed from the faith, is of almost equal importance, and I appeal to the men who preside over the stakes and the missions and the wards, and who administer in the various organizations of the Church, to do all that lies within their power to make the organizations of the Church reach this great multitude of good people who are worth reclaiming, in whose blood courses that tendency to faith that comes from good ancestry. I sometimes think that it is infinitely more important to retain for the Church fine, intelligent men and women, whose fathers and mothers have been associated with the Church, than it is to secure others from distant lands. I believe that the message of the gospel will touch these people if we can but interpret it in terms that they can understand, and if we can induce them to open up their hearts to a reception of its great truths.

CHANGES IN THE PHYSICAL WORLD AND THE WAYS OF THOUGHT

Great changes have come to us in comparatively few years. Only a short time ago, within my own lifetime, changes of so tremendous a character and import have come as not only to have revolutionized the physical world, but in my judgment, to have very largely changed men's attitude and way of thinking. My grandfather came with the pioneers in 1847. He did not live seven years after coming here. I thought that if he were to return to this valley, and with nothing but mortal eyes and wisdom were to see the city and all that has here been made, it would be beyond his recognition. I wonder if changes comparable to that have not come about in the ways and thoughts of youth. Surely they are not able to escape the influence of their environment. Men today worship at the altar of success pretty much in a godless way. We have come out of the world, it is true, but the world have come in among us. And they have brought to us their practices and their ideals. We are subject to their influence. It is impossible to prevent men and women from responding in some degree to the influences which surround them. Science has revolutionized our lives. It affords us conveniences and utilities which we use, and we are not so dependent upon divine aid as once we were.

A PIONEER EXPERIENCE—SHE DEPENDED ON GOD

I recall a few years ago visiting with an old lady in the southern part of the state. She was then ninety-two years old. She had been a pioneer, and in my conversation with her she gave me some of her experiences. She said that during the early days she and her family were for weeks without food. "For one period of three weeks," she said, "we lived entirely on nettles." I said: "Nettles, what do you mean by nettles?" She said: "Just the common stinging nettles that grow by the ditchbanks." I said: "How could you do it?" "Well," she said, "some way or other we got along. We were so interested in the great work going forward, our faith was such that we managed." One day, however, she said her two little girls came to her and said: "Mama, can't we have a little bread? Right there I went upon my knees," she said, "and I prayed God that he would grant a little bread to those two children. No sooner had I arisen from my knees than a knock came at the door and there stood a neighbor. In her hands she held two slices of bread and a can of milk. She said: 'Sister, I thought perhaps your little ones might need this, and I brought it to them'." She believed that her prayer had been answered. I do! She depended upon God.

JUST AS NECESSARY TO APPEAL FOR DIVINE PROTECTION TODAY

But today we do not depend upon God for bread, at least we do not think we do, but we do depend upon him for the bread of life. We depend upon him for inspiration, and it is just as necessary, if we could only make our youth believe it, to appeal today for divine protection and guidance as it was in those early days to make appeal for the sustenance of life.

NEED OF INTERPRETING THE GOSPEL IN THE LANGUAGE OF YOUTH

Our boys and girls through their education have in many instances reached an independence of all these sacred things, the things which meant so much to their fathers and their mothers; and my observation is that one of the things most needed today is an interpretation of the gospel in the language of these boys and these girls, so that they may understand its vitality and its import to them. All the facilities of the Church, all the work that we can do, in my judgment, should be directed to the saving of these priceless assets of the Church and of the Nation, and of ourselves—our children. I want them to have a testimony which I know is the most valuable thing that can come to them. I wish they all could have heard the testimonies that have been uttered in this conference. I feel sure that the impression of the spirit would have been helpful to them.

TESTIMONY

I bear my testimony that I know that this is the work of God. I wish I could deliver it to every young man and every young woman, to every wayward man and wayward woman in the entire Church. I know it just as confidently, just as surely, as I know any other fact that has entered into my life. I know that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the living God. All of my feelings, every sensation that I can interpret, bears witness of that truth to me. I know that it is the Holy Ghost that makes that knowledge certain. I know, too, that that knowledge will come to every honest man and woman and to every young man and woman who strives for it and who lives for it, but I want us all to help in every way that we can to bring that knowledge to the youth of our Church, and to all those who have fallen by the wayside. I am grateful for that knowledge. It brings into my life more comfort, more satisfaction, more hope, more that is worth striving for, than all else, and I am very desirous that I may live to be worthy of a continuation of that testimony, that it may grow and ripen and strengthen within me.

My grandfather was with the Prophet Joseph in Carthage jail. He was his intimate friend; he was his confidential secretary. He knew his thoughts, I believe, as well as one man may know the thoughts of another. He loved him. He was perfectly willing to give his life for the prophet. My grandfather has left his testimony that Joseph Smith was divinely chosen, that he was indeed a prophet of God, and I know that he did not lie, and I know that hundreds of other good men who knew this prophet have not falsified when they have given their testimony of his divine work.

God grant that the testimony of this latter-day work may come not only to the great hosts of faithful Saints who, from season to season, gather here to hear the word of the Lord, but to these hosts of worthy men and women who should be saved, who have strayed from the path of truth. I feel for one to consecrate my efforts to their reclamation and retention in the fold of Christ, and I know that could you speak here you would join in such a dedication. God bless you, my brethren and sisters, that you may carry forward this great and wonderful work to its glorious destiny, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER MELVIN J. BALLARD

I am happy, my brethren and sisters, to find myself in full accord with all that has been said in this important conference, and earnestly do I desire to add my testimony to those which have been borne, and to speak of one or two items, that have already been referred to, which have been weighing very heavily upon my own mind for more than a year past. I believe that this representative gathering of Latter-day Saints is an opportunity for the messages that have been delivered by the President of the Church and his associates to be carried, in the spirit of these instructions, to the various stakes of Zion.

MEETING THE TESTING TIME

I wish to read a few verses from the 115th section of the Doctrine and Covenants. The Lord said to his Church, in 1838:

"Verily I say unto you all: Arise and shine forth, that thy light may be a standard for the nations;

"And that the gathering together upon the land of Zion, and upon her stakes, may be for a defense, and for a refuge from the storm, and from wrath when it shall be poured out without mixture upon the whole earth."

I have felt that the Lord had in mind the very perils that are threatening the world and are endangering the faith of some neglectful Latter-day Saints, when he spoke of finding a place of defense for us, a place where we may escape not only the physical dangers that will be in the world, but those storms of a moral character that are far more disastrous to people than physical destruction or physical injury. It has been said during the conference that as a Church we are enjoying a period of peace. I rejoice that after nearly a century of struggle and effort, contending against all kind of opposition, we have at last won the right to exist, a right conceded now by men and women generally in the world. Reference has also been made to a condition of prosperity that is with us. I rejoice in that. I would not change the prosperity of the people, nor would I stir up strife. I welcome peace, it gives us a better opportunity to deliver our message to the children of men. But the thing I am concerned about is not so much what the world thinks about us just now as it is our own status with reference to keeping the commandments of God and how to meet the perils that are before us. I am not a pessimist, and yet seeing and feeling things most clearly, I want to be one of those watchmen upon the towers of Zion, with my brethren, who detect the storm that is coming and give a fair warning, and point out not only the danger, but the way to avert that danger. Therefore, I feel that we have probably reached, in the Church, in this period of our peace and prosperity, a testing time for us. If you will read the history of the past, no dispensation of the gospel has ever had so hard a time to maintain itself as during the period of its own peace and prosperity. Indeed, there is no gospel dispensation that has yet survived its peace and prosperity. In the time of its trouble, people were united, and stood shoulder to shoulder and endured all things and kept the faith and died for the faith. I say, I am not a pessimist, nor do I believe that we will lose the faith, nor do I believe that the dangers which threaten us are going to overwhelm us, and yet I am conscious of the fact that mere membership in this Church will not save a man or a woman. It will require something else. I cling tenaciously to the promise made through the Prophet Daniel, as the Lord inspired him, looking down to our own period of time and predicting the rise of this Church, insignificant as it was, like a stone cut out of the mountain without hands, yet it shall roll forth until it will fill the whole earth, and it shall not be left to another people, nor shall it fail. I have a comfort in that; I have an abiding confidence that no matter what the difficulties are, the majority of this people shall survive even this peril, and that we shall demonstrate the thing that never has yet been done; namely, maintain the truth and defend it in peace as well as in times of trouble, and that the work shall go on victoriously until Christ shall come to receive it, and that it shall roll forth until it fills the whole earth, for it is the last dispensation and it shall not fail. But many of us may fail. That is my fear, that is my anxiety.

THE TEMPTATIONS OF PEACE AND PROSPERITY

In the time of our peace and prosperity, we may be tempted to be indulgent with ourselves. All over the world, I believe there is a growing spirit, even in the hearts of many leaders, to become careless, to become more or less accustomed to the new order of things that obtain. This, after all, is most threatening to the life, to the peace of the people and to the stability of even governments themselves. The statement of a poet is still true, that :

“Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.”

We came out of the world to escape the evils of the world, but, as has just been observed, these world conditions have come to us. We are part of the world and the influences of the world and the practices of the world will naturally have their effect upon the lives of the Latter-day Saints. Is it possible that we ourselves are seeing so much of these things which a hundred years ago when this Church was brought into existence would have shocked us; the present moral status, the frequency of divorce, and many common practices that are heralded abroad throughout our own country that would have been revolting then—is it possible that these vices have been seen so much by us that even some of us begin to feel a little bit calloused and almost wink at them? I hope not. I believe that this body of people here assembled have no such feeling as to compromise or tolerate evil. We are tolerant of the sinner, but we cannot look upon sin with the least degree of allowance; and woe be to the man or woman, the leader in the wards or stakes or elsewhere, among the young people, who can wink at sin and compromise with it!

THE TENDENCY TO INDULGENCE AND RELAXATION

Woe be to him who contributes to the establishment or the perpetuation of a state or condition that contributes to the delinquency, to the sin, to the transgression, of boys or girls or men or women. So far as we are concerned we stand solidly against immorality; and let me say to you, my brethren and sisters, the culminating thing that shall come out of this tendency towards indulgence, towards relaxation, is immorality, and immorality is the plague of the world today, and that plague is threatening all about us, if it is not indeed creeping into the midst of Latter-day Saints. Therefore to our standards, men of Israel, which teach us to look upon virtue as precious as life itself, and that we would as soon die as to lose our virtue. There is no cessation on the part of the enemy against this work. Though he may not be conspiring to move mobs against us, nor to induce men to annihilate us, he is among the people with new means and ways, lulling them off to sin a little, to lie a little and to steal a little, and do other things with the promise: You will be beaten with a few stripes, but you will be all right. It is the doctrine of the devil which is intended to lead men gently down to hell, and we cannot be ignorant of it nor indifferent toward it.

A WARNING AND A FOREWARNING

When the Lord gave the Word of Wisdom he used this language in the 4th verse of the 89th section of the Doctrine and Covenants:

"Behold, verily, thus saith the Lord unto you: In consequence of evils and designs which do and will exist in the hearts of conspiring men in the last days, I have warned you, and forewarn you, by giving unto you this word of wisdom by revelation."

The Lord knew what was coming. He knew back in Daniel's time. He could tell the nations what would arise. He knew the times of men's coming. He knew their habitations and their limitations and he could foretell them. God knew when he spoke to the Prophet Joseph Smith that which would come: "Knowing," said he, "the calamity that would come upon the earth." He spoke to Joseph Smith and through him sent a warning to all the world of the danger that was threatening and offered the means of escape. But the Lord is very much like an earthly father. What can an earthly father do to his grown sons and daughters more than to teach them of the danger. He cannot rescue them against their will, if they are determined to sin and transgress the law of God and man. They presently shall come into bonds and imprisonment and be subject to the execution of the law, and when the judge renders his decision it may be years or a life of imprisonment or even the execution of the man himself. The father would be willing to give his life to save his son, but he cannot do it, neither can he cancel the judgment of the court nor set aside the majesty of the law. So it is with our heavenly Father. All he can do is to warn us, point out the danger, show us the way of escape, and when we resist it all we bind God. We speak of binding the devil, and the devil will be bound and have no power over us when we resist him, but we may resist the Lord in the same manner and thus bind his hands so that he can do nothing for us, for he himself is ruled by law, he cannot set aside the majesty of eternal law, nor save men in their sins. In the 88th section of the Book of Doctrine and Covenants we read:

"And again, verily I say unto you, that which is governed by law is also preserved by law and perfected and sanctified by the same.

"That which breaketh a law, and abideth not by law, but seeketh to become a law unto itself, and willeth to abide in sin, and altogether abideth in sin, cannot be sanctified by law, neither by mercy, justice, nor judgment. Therefore, they must remain filthy still."

So that God is rendered helpless in the case of a man or woman in this Church or out of this Church who resists him and who will not abide the law.

THE WORD OF WISDOM GIVEN TO FORTIFY US

Now the Lord gave us the Word of Wisdom to fortify us against the temptations of the day, giving us the power to resist, knowing that the man or woman who breaks the Word of Wisdom and uses tobacco, tea and coffee, will weaken his or her moral stability. So that in this other period that now has come, of other temptation that leads to graver sin and immorality, the individual has broken down his morale, his will and his power to resist, notwithstanding the thing that he does is contrary to the will of God, has lost the power to stand when greater temptations come. God was steeling us and arming us and fortifying us against the plague that is presently threatening us.

ON MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE

An article recently appearing in one of our magazines stated that the divorce rate is growing so rapidly that if it continues in the same increase in proportion to marriages, by the year 1936, there will be as many divorces each year as marriages in the United States. What will that do for the world or for the United States? It will destroy the family life, and when the family life is broken up and destroyed the government will be in peril. God's work can go forward only by men and women in the Church and in the state observing the sanctity of the marriage relationship. Side by side with us, in this and other states of the union we find forces tending to the destruction of family life. In Russia and elsewhere there is a great rebellion, inspired by Bolshevism, which teaches the doctrine of companionship in marriage that may be changed and altered at will, and that the children are the property of the state. When these doctrines are spread abroad what is the antidote for them? It is the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. The Latter-day Saints have that which teaches them to prepare themselves to come into holy places, and, over holy altars, receive each other by the authority that binds on earth and it is bound in heaven, in companionship as husband and wife, parent and children, for time and all eternity. No planning for divorce here in our own ranks. The evidence of the safety in God's plan is manifested, for there are twice as many divorces among our own people who are married outside of the temple as among those who enter into this holy place and receive each other in this bond of union that begins to plan and to build forever and forever, and our divorce rate is $\frac{1}{5}$ that of this country. If we want to escape the plague of divorce, if we want to escape the destruction of family life—and when this is gone faith is gone, and there shall come quickly other perils in the wake of it, until we shall be threatened with the destruction of our civilization—we must preserve the foundation upon which family life rests, eternal unions. We may be found fault with as being narrow and intolerant by some of our outside friends, but we stand for those things that are fundamental. We always shall stand for them, and we refuse to be absorbed by present world standards; we expect to be victorious in defending our own. And presently, showing by the lives of the Latter-day Saints the fruits of these things, it will awaken surely in the hearts of righteous men a consciousness that here in "Mormonism" is stability, a stability that will save men, save the family, save the home, save the nation.

OUR GREATEST ASSET IS OUR BOYS AND GIRLS

When Brother Pratt and I were in South America we presented pictures of the achievements of the Church, and I said to Brother Pratt, and have said many times since, that the greatest product we have is not our material prosperity. What I wanted was a picture of tens of thousands of "Mormon" boys and girls, and we have them, who keep the Word of Wisdom, who never have used tea, coffee or tobacco, who are as pure, as clean and undefiled as the angels of God. I would never have discovered the match of these boys and girls elsewhere in all the world, although I would have observed individual instances, but not in community groups like they may be found here, the product of this Church. So that my soul turns towards them in a sympathy today, confronted with conditions that are strange and new. They need us. There is now a warfare which will require the closest cooperation on the part of the leaders with their people, on the part of fathers and mothers towards their sons and daughters. No wonder the Lord said that without this principle, which joins parents and children to each other for time and all eternity, the turning not only of the hearts of the living to the dead, but of the living children to their earthly parents, in a union that will preserve the family,—the whole earth would be utterly wasted. The great saving thing in the world today is this principle upon which family life is established in this Church.

TESTIMONY

Now the Lord bless us, brethren, that we shall go home with an awakened interest in the new problems that have arisen, with a consciousness that the people, to whom Brother Stephen L. Richards, has just referred, who are in danger and in peril because they keep not the commandments of God, that we shall reawaken their interest in these simple and yet all-important saving principles. They are the only hope of the world and the only hope of this Church. I know that God is with us. We are not in the dark. The light is in the ship; the captain is inspired. He knows where he is going. God is at the helm and the storms may blow, they may become furious, but I declare to you, as the Lord lives, that if the Latter-day Saints will only keep his commandments and accept of the plan he has offered, God is bound; his promise will be fulfilled, we shall come out victorious and shall be far more distinguished than we are today, if we can only weather the storm that is threatening. God help us to do so, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER DAVID A. SMITH

Of the Presiding Bishopric

Early Sunday morning, two weeks ago, I stood in the grove where Joseph Smith first saw the Father and the Son. I recalled my first visit to that place. Then I was filled with the spirit of happiness, peace and love. At that time I thought it was perhaps because I had pictured in my mind the beginning of that farm when my great-grandfather and his boys (one of them my grandfather) were clearing the land and building their house, using the crude methods of the year 1820. Since my first visit I have been there with members of the Church, and they have expressed the same feeling I had then, which feeling has possessed me on each visit to that place. I have been there with those not of our faith and they have mentioned an unusual feeling of peace. Last Summer a group of Protestant ministers visited the grove, and on leaving, one of them said, speaking of Joseph Smith: "He certainly chose an ideal setting for his vision, if such a thing could be." Another answered, "Yes, there is certainly a peaceful influence here. One could almost imagine such a thing to be possible."

I thank my heavenly Father that in my soul I believe in the testimony of Joseph Smith. I would like to dwell upon that thought, if time would permit, but I am limited and have another thought I wish to leave with you, God being my helper, and I sincerely pray that he will bless me that I may give advice that will have his approval.

I am a son of the soil. I love the farm. I love to dig and plow and plant. I continued in that occupation until called from it by the Church into the position I now occupy. Where in any line of work or endeavor may we find such an opportunity to commune with the living God? Let me call your attention to the fact that from the very beginning there has been a relationship among God, man and the soil, making man dependent upon the soil for his very existence, and upon God for peace and happiness. When God placed man on the earth, he planted a garden eastward in Eden and placed man in it. Through transgression he was driven from that garden and was compelled to eat his bread by the sweat of his face. Father Abraham was led to a land of promise and Israel, his chosen people, established in this land of plenty. Through transgression, they were taken into bondage and finally because of their sufferings and pleadings, God took mercy upon them and led them out of bondage through Moses, unto the promised land, which he said had been prepared for them—a promised land for his chosen people. But when they chose to rely upon the words of men rather than the promise of God, they were required to wander in the wilderness forty years. With the exception of two, all those over twenty years of age were deprived of enjoying the blessings faith would have brought them.

We find in the history of this continent that when the word came to Lehi to preach to the people at Jerusalem and warn them of the destruction of that city, they believed him not and he was driven from their midst. Nephi, through his faith, was promised by the Lord that they should be led to a land of promise, a choice land, yea, a land choice above all other lands. And in this day, a promise has been given to this people that they should be led to a promised land, a land that should be their inheritance forever, provided they were faithful in keeping his commandments, and showed by their works that they were worthy to continue in that inheritance.

The other day we had a statement made to us, giving figures showing the amount it has cost to keep missionaries in the field. I wonder how many have stopped to realize that most of this vast amount of money has been taken from the soil. God has given it to us, for he has given us a choice land, "a land choice above all other lands," for where in all the world can you find a land more productive than that which has been given to us? I sometimes wonder if we fully appreciate this blessing which has come to us. I stood the other day and looked at those great trees around the home erected by Joseph Smith and his sons before 1820, on that farm where the Father and the Son appeared to Joseph Smith and where the angel Moroni appeared on several occasions. They stand there today, as ornaments, as a comfort, for they bring shade and peace around that home, giving the impression that the builders had looked to the future. I wonder how many of us are looking to the future? How many of us are planting trees around our homes, are beautifying our homes? Are we farming, looking into the future, or just farming, impoverishing the soil, feeling that our inheritance is only temporary? There is in the world today a spirit of strife and selfishness and contention, and I am wondering if we are permitting this spirit to come into our midst. We should be living for the future and the hereafter. As a people, we believe in co-operation, not that supposed co-operation that breeds hatred, strife, contention and ill-will, but that co-operation, that brotherly love and good-will, which leads men to reach the outstretched hand to those in need, to those who suffer, to those who hunger, to those who are ill. That is the proper co-operation, and we as Latter-day Saints believe in it and are expected to practice it. As I travel through the land, these thoughts come to my mind. We are establishing in some districts, dairy industries, creameries or cheese factories. Are we producing in abundance in order that we might have funds to continue our missionary work? Or, are we contending with one another? Are we feeling that the other fellow is getting more gain out of our product than he is entitled to? Are we leaving it for a few to carry the burden, increasing the overhead, or have we stopped to consider that the more we produce, the more we get, the more the manufacturer gets, the more the community gets? It is through co-operation and through producing in abundance that we are blessed and not through individual effort, which often breeds a spirit of contention and strife. In many of our sections we have been blessed with canning factories and packing plants, in which the products of our farms may be put into a condition to find market elsewhere. They are a blessing to us, and also a curse, for I am afraid many who have garden plots are depending upon the can for their food, forgetting the home garden. Many fail to plant in the Spring that they may harvest during the Summer to provide their families and those depending upon them with good wholesome food, fresh from the soil.

Let us support the canning factories, let us produce that they may prosper, for when they prosper we are bound to prosper; but let us not forget that there is a means of prospering in our own household and through the opportunities God has given unto us. We find the spirit of contention, not with the majority, but with the few, and unfortunately sometimes we let the disturbing element be the dominating factor. Let us co-operate in our labors, and keep in mind the community interests. We have sugar factories which have been a greater blessing to the farmers of this community than anything else that has come among us. All of these industries come to us to take the products of the farm and turn them into cash, and return that cash to us from an outside source, to provide means for our welfare and for the beautifying of our homes and to aid in the preaching of the gospel. All these are for our benefit and blessing, provided we acknowledge the hand of God and co-operate and work for the good of the community and forget our selfish interests. Selfishness has no place in this Church. We as individuals must, if we hope to succeed, if we hope to prosper, if we hope to have the blessings of God continue with us, look to the welfare of our brethren.

When the pioneers came here, they could see nothing but wilderness, but that wonderful man, President Brigham Young, saw into the future, viewed the choice valleys and their possibilities, saw where water could be stored in the mountains until required and used as needed. God has provided for us abundantly and now we have discovered that he has provided something else for us, for we have the wonders of the world at our very door. People are coming in great numbers to rest in our scenic play grounds. Their impressions of us will be formed through the appearance of our premises and by personal contact with us. Are we prepared to receive them? Are our homes and surroundings inviting and attractive? Are our lives such that when they come into our midst they can see our good works and go away with a feeling of praise and good-will toward us as a people? My brethren and sisters, what a wonderful opportunity has been given to us, what a wonderfully blessed people we are in having been gathered together in the valleys of the mountains, with all these wonders about us, and preserved and protected to this day. And now God is opening the way through which we may preach the gospel to those who are in darkness, without expending our means for that purpose, just by living as he would have us live, by precept and example, and by the appearance of our homes and our farms. Let us realize that God has blessed us abundantly. Let us turn to him in faith. Let us co-operate with one another that his kingdom may be built up in the earth and his people blessed as he has promised they would be blessed in the latter days.

Let me call your attention to two passages of scripture:

"Verily I say unto you who have assembled yourselves together that you may learn my will concerning the redemption of mine afflicted people: Behold, I say unto you, were it not for the transgressions of my people—speaking concerning the Church and not individuals, they might have been redeemed now. But behold, they have not learned to be obedient to the things which I required at their hands, but are full of all manner of evil, and do not impart of their substance, as becometh Saints, to the poor and afflicted among them." (D. & C. 105:1-3.)

"Prepare thy work without, and make it fit for thyself in the field." * * *

"I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding;

"And lo, it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall thereof was broken down.

"Then I saw, and considered it well: I looked upon it and received instructions.

"Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep;

"So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth; and thy want as an armed man." (Prov. 24:27-34.)

God grant that we may receive and appreciate his blessings,
I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN WELLS

Of the Presiding Bishopric

I have enjoyed beyond measure the faith-promoting stories and testimonies concerning this great latter-day work, the manifestations of the power of God, and the testimonies concerning the Book of Mormon.

Eighteen hundred and ninety-four years ago—probably during the first week of April—our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ passed the last week of his mortal life. He had returned from a brief stay in Perca, and at the close of the Sabbath arrived in Bethany with his disciples. The following day, the first day of the week and known to us as Sunday, he entered the city of Jerusalem on an ass's colt.

There were great numbers who had heard of his coming and he was hailed: "Hosanna: Blessed is the King of Israel that cometh in the name of the Lord." That day he returned to the little village of Bethany and the next morning—known to us as Monday—he evidently again walked to Jerusalem. Entering the temple, he found the Court of the Gentiles crowded with those who sold animals, merchandise and who exchanged money. In the majesty of his power, he drove out all the people doing business, and said unto them, "My house shall be called the house of prayer; but ye have made it a den of thieves."

Again he returned to the little village of Bethany, and on the following day—according to those who have given deep thought and study to the life of the Master—he entered the temple once more for the last time, and here he delivered that remarkable series of reproofs to the scribes and Pharisees.

In the evening, in the quiet little home of Simon and his family—Lazarus, Martha, and Mary—Mary anointed his feet, and it was then that he said that as long as his gospel shall be known the act of Mary will be remembered.

The following day, Wednesday, he spent quietly with his disciples on the Mount of Olives, gave them his last personal instructions, explained to them some things he had said in the temple concerning the great events that would occur in the future and others that would occur before his second coming.

On Thursday he asked his disciples to prepare for the Passover. Following the custom of the Galilean Jews, he met in an upper room with his disciples, where he comforted their souls, administered to them what is known as the Last Supper, prayed to his Father to preserve and protect his disciples, and departed to the Garden of Gethsemane, where he was arrested.

One of the outstanding features connected with the Church of Jesus Christ is that each person who has faith in God and who has sincerely repented of his sins and has been baptized for the remission of his sins, having had hands laid upon his head for the gift of the Holy Ghost, may know the doctrine, whether it is of God, or not. Thousands and tens of thousands of Latter-day Saints can testify that this is the truth, that by obedience to this gospel they have received an inward witness that Jesus is the Christ, that the gospel has been restored, and that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God. This promise of a testimony is accorded to all people, even as many as the Lord our God shall call.

Jesus had finished about two years of his ministry and was again laboring in his own province of Galilee, having been rejected in his own home of Nazareth. With his disciples he toured Galilee; then, calling the disciples together, he sent them out to preach the gospel, giving them special instructions to go not to the Gentiles nor to the Samaritans, but rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. While they were away, the messengers came from John who was in prison, asking, "Art thou he that should come? or look we for another?" That day the Master healed the sick, gave sight to the blind, made the lame to walk, and when the day was over, he said to John's delegates, "Go your way, and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how that the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear, the dead are raised, to the poor the gospel is preached." They, no doubt, returned to John, and John was satisfied. A short time after, the Master heard that his forerunner had been beheaded, and he exclaimed, "Among those that are born of women there is not a greater prophet than John the Baptist: but he that is least in the kingdom of God is greater than he."

His apostles returned and accompanied him to the east side of the lake of Galilee. He there labored and taught the people for three days, and his disciples suggested to him that the people would better be dismissed to get food in the neighboring villages. The Master said that he could not send them away for fear some would faint, and asked how much bread and food they had. The disciples answered that they had a few loaves and fishes. Jesus told the disciples to seat the people in fifties and hundreds. Then he broke the bread and blessed it and passed it to his disciples, who distributed it. Five thousand men, as well as women and children, were fed. One can imagine the excitement that followed. Here was a man who could give not only spiritual food, but could also feed their bodies. Well might they want to make him a temporal king.

He sent the disciples across the lake and dismissed the multitude. In the night he walked across the water before his disciples had been able to land on the opposite side. They saw him but faintly in the early morning light and were sore afraid, but Jesus said unto them, "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." Peter, impetuous, bold, and a leader, asked the Lord if he could come, and was told that he could. He started to walk on the water, but the waves were rough and he called to the Lord to save him.

Landing at Capernaum, he was met by people who had hurried around the end of the lake. There he tried to impress upon them that his kingdom was not of this world, that he had given them bread to feed their hunger, saying, "Labor not for the meat which perisheth, but for that meat which endureth unto everlasting life, which the Son of man shall give unto thee," and the multitude said unto him, "Lord, evermore give us this bread."

The Master spoke so plainly that many of his disciples and followers discontinued following him. He then turned to his apostles and, addressing Peter, said: "Will ye also go away?" and that good man responded, "Lord, to whom shall we go? thou hast the words of eternal life. And we believe and are sure that thou art the Christ the Son of the living God."

Jesus then moved away from Capernaum. The next we hear of him, he was on his way with his chosen disciples and probably a few of his close friends, in the direction of Caesarea Philippi. Perhaps he was dejected because of his inability to convince the people concerning his mission, and one of the gospel writers says that he went away to pray. No doubt the disciples stayed at a respectful distance. Then he returned and, addressing his disciples, said, "Whom do men say that I the Son of man am?" No doubt, each one answered the question in turn, "Some say that thou art John the Baptist: some, Elias; and others, Jeremiah, or one of the prophets." It was a common idea that Elijah would come before the great and dreadful day of the Lord, and they were looking for him to come before the Messiah. It was also understood among the Jews that Jeremiah had in his possession the Ark of the Covenant, that it was hidden in Mount Nebo, and would be placed back in the temple before the coming of the Messiah.

Then Jesus turned to his disciples and said, "But whom say ye that I am?" and then Peter, to whom the role of leadership had fallen, spoke—doubtless with the approval and concurring voice of his brethren—"Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." I can imagine what a comfort that would be to his Master to know that his disciples at least knew that he was the Christ, the Son of the living God. No doubt this testimony had been given by the Father to those twelve chosen men who were to be Christ's special witnesses and who were destined to carry his work and the message of the gospel to what was then known as the civilized world.

Addressing Peter, the Master answered, "Blessed art thou, Simon Barjona: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven. And I say also unto thee, That thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of hell shall not prevail against it. And I will give unto thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt bind on earth shall be bound in heaven: and whatsoever thou shalt loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven."

It is the desire and intent of our Master, Jesus Christ, that all those who accept his doctrines and live according to his precepts, shall know his doctrine. At one time he declared, "My doctrine is not mine but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself."

In Capernaum he said: "No man cometh unto me, except the father which hath sent me draw him; and I will raise him up at the last day." To all who sincerely desire to find the truth and understand and accept it this is a promise, for they will know the truth, and he will draw them as he promised, and they will receive the testimony that is the outstanding feature of the gospel of Jesus Christ.

It is our duty to pray to the Father for this testimony. It is our privilege to receive it, and no Latter-day Saint of years of discretion need be without this testimony. In view of the great problems that are arising in the world, I appeal to my brethren and sisters to see that there is taught to their children in the homes the story of the life and mission of Jesus Christ; also the story of the Prophet Joseph, and the restoration of the gospel through his instrumentality, that there may grow into their hearts faith in the living God and a love for their fellow-men, that our young people will grow mighty in testimony and power to carry on this great work.

I am thankful indeed for the gospel of Jesus Christ, for that testimony which has come to me. I am thankful for the privilege of laboring in the ministry, for the association I have with my brethren and sisters. May the Lord bless and sanctify this great gathering of Latter-day Saints that the influence felt here may go into all the homes of Zion, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER REY L. PRATT

President of the Mexican Mission

"Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book!

"That they were graven with an iron pen and lead in the rock forever!

"For I know that my Redeemer liveth, and that he shall stand at the latter day upon the earth:

"And though after my skin worms destroy this body, yet in my flesh shall I see God:

"Whom I shall see for myself, and mine eyes shall behold, and not another; though my reins be consumed within me."

Many times in my life, my brethren and sisters, I have read this wonderful prediction of Job's and have marveled at it, and have been very greatly impressed by it. I think that in my study of the Scriptures nothing else has so much impressed me as has testimony. Nothing else in the history of the Church to which we belong has so impressed me as have the testimonies given by the Prophet Joseph Smith. In reading his brief account of his life as given in the Pearl of Great Price, I turn back repeatedly and read over and over again, with added inspiration, the wonderful testimony given in so simple a way concerning his vision. This good man, of whom I have read today, had been persecuted, he had been singled out and had suffered, and still he was able to testify, in an outburst, not of reason why, but to leave his testimony for the world, that notwithstanding all that had come, or that might come unto him, he knew that his Redeemer did in very deed live. And the Prophet Joseph Smith, strange as it might seem, inoffensive towards any human being, never having harmed his fellow-man, yet simply because of the fact that he recounted that he had seen a vision, that he knew that God lived, that he had been visited by him and by his Son, he was singled out for persecution. He was invited to retract, and was assured that should he do so persecution would cease. But he testified in the simple words that he knew that he had seen a light, and that in the light he had seen two personages whom he knew to be God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ; and furthermore, he knew that God knew these things, and he dared not other than to continue to testify of this truth. And so he did testify, my brethren and sisters, to the day of his death, and sealed his testimony with his blood.

In regard to the matter of testimony, I have concluded that those testimonies which have impressed me most have not been accompanied by reason why. They seem to carry with them their own conviction, and I verily believe, my brethren and sisters, that they were given by the power of the Holy Ghost, and that same Spirit has witnessed to my spirit that they are true.

It is a remarkable thing, when you review the life of Joseph Smith and the great work he brought forth and the wonderful things that he testified of. We heard in priesthood meeting a review of the coming forth of the Book of Mormon, given by President Anthony W. Ivins, and of the wonderful things to which Joseph Smith attached his name—a document which set forth that there were once mighty cities upon this land, and those cities had not been discovered at that time, not even the ruins of them. He attached his name to the assertion that there had been a wonderful civilization upon this land, schooled in the arts and sciences, and he was even bold enough to affirm that the people worked in metal, of iron and steel. And he told of books written upon gold leaf, and that verily the book he translated was from engravings upon a book of gold leaf. And still Joseph Smith is not supposed to have known of the existence of anything in the world that would corroborate his statement at that time. We now find that those simple testimonies and statements are corroborated all the time by the findings of scientific men who are delving into the ruins of the country to the south of us, particularly. At last, steel instruments have been discovered on this continent, and they are attributed to the ancients who manufactured them and used them.

The truth of these statements of the Prophet Joseph Smith has been borne in upon me, my brethren and sisters, as I have stood among these majestic ruins of Mexico and Central and South America. I have stood there and tried to imagine that the Book of Mormon was not true, but I have prayed that I might know of a surety for myself whether it be true or not. I want to tell you that in those solemn places, in those beautiful ruins, among majestic stones, larger than any I have ever seen in any other architecture of this modern day, I have had borne in upon my soul this truth that the Book of Mormon is true; that it is a new witness for God upon the earth, and that Joseph Smith was and is a Prophet of God.

I have been impressed during this conference by the spirit of testimony. Tears have come to my eyes more than once during this procedure because of the spirit of testimony that has come from the speakers to me. And I stand as a witness, my brethren and sisters, that these testimonies are true.

We have spoken of the testimonies of great men in this Church. Now, the thought is, are they alone entitled to a testimony? Are they alone entitled to know whether there has been a restoration of the gospel or not? Are they alone entitled to know that God lives and that Jesus is the Christ? I think not. I think that the Savior has given us ample reasons to assume, by reason of his teachings, that all men, if they will comply with the conditions upon which a knowledge might come to them, may know of the truth of the doctrines that he taught, which are none other than the doctrines that Joseph Smith was an instrument, in the hands of God, in restoring to the people in this present day. They may know whether they be of God or whether they be of man. There are many people in the world—I know by contact with them—who would give a very great deal to be able to say that they know that the gospel is true; that they surely know, without shadow of a doubt, that God lives and that Jesus is the Christ. In the face of all the confusion and conflicting ideas that there are in the world, today, I know there are many honest-hearted people who would give a very great deal to be able to say what has been said in this conference by those who have spoken in regard to these things. But they do not know. How may they know? "If any man will do his will," says the Savior, "he may know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." Are there any Latter-day Saints who are not in possession of a testimony in regard to these things? If there be such, I say unto them, as I have said to these men in the world, If you will put your lives in harmony with the principles of the gospel, as they have been restored in this age, and if you will humbly ask the Lord for a testimony concerning these things, he will bear witness unto you through the Holy Ghost, which you are entitled to have as a companion when you comply with the requirements of the gospel, in unmistakable terms, that the gospel is true, that Joseph Smith is a prophet of God, that God lives, and that Jesus is the Christ, the Redeemer of the world.

I admonish you, therefore, my brethren and sisters, to live humbly, to put your lives in harmony with the truth. We, as teachers, should possess this wonderful testimony, and we bear a wonderful responsibility in teaching it to our children, to our brethren and sisters, and to our friends in the world; for all of those people, way out there, are our Father's children and heirs unto salvation, if they will but comply with the requirements of the law. We have a knowledge of the law and the conditions thereof, and we should teach them. There is a wonderful responsibility resting upon a teacher, my brethren and sisters. To those who assume to teach, in such a way as to destroy the faith of the youth of Zion, I tell you there is a terrible responsibility resting upon them. There is nothing that I would rather my children have than an implicit faith in God. Learning, riches, an influence in the world, or in the affairs of the world, do not compare with the great blessings of an abiding faith, and I wish to instill that, so far as God gives me power, in the minds of my own children. And so far as he gives me power, I shall testify, before the world, with an endeavor to instil that witness into the hearts of my fellow-men.

I realize that the time is past. I am thankful unto the Lord for the privilege to participate in his work. I am thankful for the opportunity of bearing my testimony to you. Of a surety I know that God lives, and I know that Jesus is the Christ, the Redeemer of the world. Of a surety I know that Joseph Smith was raised up to be an instrument in the hands of the Lord to restore to the world for the last time the great gospel of salvation. I know that the gospel is true, and, in the words of our beloved prophet, I know that God knows that I know these things, and I dare not other than testify of them.

May the Lord add his blessings to us, and help us to live so that we may merit them and do good continuously upon the earth, that we may eventually be saved in his presence, I humbly pray in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

The time has passed when we are supposed to dismiss, but there are a few things that I would like to say and I crave your indulgence while I do so.

GROWTH OF THE CHURCH IN POWER AND TESTIMONY

When I was made one of the apostles of the Church we did not have twenty stakes of Zion. We now have ninety-six, and we have voted to divide the Jordan stake, which will make ninety-seven, and to divide the Los Angeles stake, which will make ninety-eight, and to organize a new stake to embrace Oakland and San Francisco and vicinity, making ninety-nine stakes of Zion, or a little more than five times as many as there were when I was chosen to be one of the apostles.

Anybody who thinks the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is not growing, is ignorant, to say the least. Zion is growing in power, strength and testimony.

REGRET NO TIME TO HEAR FROM MORE STAKE PRESIDENTS

I regret that we did not have the opportunity of hearing from at least a dozen more of our stake presidents. There are a dozen men who were ordained as far back as 1924, who have not yet had the opportunity of speaking in General Conference. But it seems that we can never quite get through, although we have had an extra meeting of two hours in this conference. In addition, Brother McMurrin, Brother Smoot, Brother Talmage and Brother Hyrum G. Smith are away. Somehow or other we never quite have time enough to hear from these presidents of stakes. Occasionally we hear from a few of them, but I would like to hear all of the ninety-six men, whom God has seen fit thus to honor, bear their testimony for a few moments before this congregation. I hope that we may hear from more of them next time.

NEW STAKE TABERNACLE IN LOS ANGELES

Speaking of the division of the Los Angeles stake, I have a telegram from Leo J. Muir, the chairman of the tabernacle finance committee, it having been decided to erect a tabernacle, to be utilized by both stakes after the new one is organized:

"Reports received this morning from the ward chairmen indicate tonight's total will reach $125,000 pledged for the Los Angeles stake tabernacle."

I can remember when there were not a half dozen Saints in Los Angeles. The Church will match this $125,000 which has been pledged locally, so that there will be in southern California quite a fine building, as a further evidence of the "decaying of the Church."

OURS AN AMERICAN CHURCH

There is one thing that I desire to emphasize, and that is that we are engaged in an American Church, born in the land of freedom, born in fulfilment of prophecy. We believe and teach, and have taught from my earliest recollection that God has protected and fought on the side of America in all of the struggles we have had for liberty; that he was with Washington and his armies. We sustain and uphold the president of the United States and the officers of this great country. We rejoice in the wonderful response that has been made upon all occasions by the Latter-day Saints to calls for money and for men to fight the battles of our country, and in all things to sustain and uphold this country.

TESTIMONIES AND WARNINGS ENDORSED

I want to say that I endorse with all my heart the many splendid remarks that have been made here. I rejoice in the virtue of the Latter-day Saints as a people. I endorse with all my heart, however, the warnings that have been given here. I have the most supreme and absolute contempt for men who are guilty of proclaiming that virtue should not be maintained; that there is no sin in sexual intercourse. It is the doctrine of devils. It is an inspiration from the devil himself, and the men who defend things of this kind are instruments in his hands to try to destroy virtue and to wipe from the earth liberty and right, and all that is of real genuine worth to humanity.

CALL TO REPENTANCE OUR SUPREME OBLIGATION

I want to emphasize that we as a people have one supreme thing to do, and that is to call upon the world to repent of sin, to come to God. And it is our duty above all others to go forth and proclaim the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, the restoration again to the earth of the plan of life and salvation. Appeals are coming from all over the world for more missionaries. The Latter-day Saints should so organize their affairs, and so shape their finances, that more will be ready and willing, especially those of age and experience, with a testimony and knowledge of the divinity of this work, to go forth, not only on short, but on long missions. Too many of us are gradually setting our hearts upon the things of this world. We have so much to look after, so many business interests, so many important things, so far as dollars and cents are concerned, that we are neglecting the one great thing of all; namely, the proclaiming of the gospel, and making what people call sacrifices but what actually are the exact opposite. We have in very deed the pearl of great price. We have that which is of more value than all the wealth and the scientific information which the world possesses. We have the plan of life and salvation. The first great commandment was to love the Lord our God with all our hearts, might, mind and strength; and the second was like unto it, to love our neighbor as ourselves. And the best way in the world to show our love for our neighbor is to go forth and proclaim the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, of which he has given us an absolute knowledge concerning its divinity.

God bless all of the Saints. God bless the president of the United States of America and his cabinet, and the governors of our states and the mayors of our great cities. And bless every honest-hearted man and woman upon the face of the earth, and give to those who seek for it (and he will) a testimony of the divinity of the work in which you and I are engaged.

God bless and multiply the substance of the Latter-day Saints. May we cooperate for the advancement of the Church and for the advancement of this magnificent country that God has given to the people who are located in it, is my prayer, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer and Savior. Amen.

The congregation sang, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

The benediction was pronounced by President Anthony W. Ivins. The conference adjourned for six months.

Professor Anthony C. Lund conducted the singing, assisted by B. Cecil Gates. Accompaniments and interludes were played on the great organ by Edward P. Kimball, Tracy Y. Cannon, Alexander Schreiner and Frank W. Asper. Stenographic notes were taken in the Tabernacle by Frank W. Otterstrom and Joseph Anderson, and in the Assembly Hall by Frederick G. Barker.

EDWARD H. ANDERSON,
Clerk of the Conference.

By OSBORNE J. P. WIDTSOE

“This book prepared by Elder Osborne J. P. Widtsøe, dealing with the important subject of the Restoration of the everlasting Gospel, should be read and its contents carefully considered by those who are seeking after truth. It treats the Restoration clearly, and places before the people many things that have not been generally considered heretofore. It will be a means of strengthening the faith of the youth of Israel and will impart information that is invaluable. May the spirit of truth accompany the work and rest upon all those who diligently read it with a desire to learn and profit by the Restoration of the Gospel!”

Ninety-Eighth Semi-Annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints

FIRST DAY

MORNING MEETING

The Ninety-eighth semi-annual Conference of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints opened in the Tabernacle, Salt Lake City, Utah, on Friday morning at 10 o'clock, October 7, 1927.

President Heber. J. Grant presided.

A large representative audience was in attendance from all parts of the Church.

GENERAL AUTHORITIES OF THE CHURCH PRESENT

Of the First Presidency: Heber J. Grant, Anthony W. Ivins, and Charles W. Nibley.

Of the Council of the Twelve: Rudger Clawson, Reed Smoot, George Albert Smith, George F. Richards, Orson F. Whitney, David O. McKay, Joseph Fielding Smith,* Stephen L. Richards, Richard R. Lyman, Melvin J. Ballard, John A. Widtsoe.

Presiding Patriarch: Hyrum G. Smith.

Of the First Council of Seventy: B. H. Roberts, J. Golden Kimball, Rulon S. Wells, Joseph W. McMurrin, Charles H. Hart, Levi Edgar Young, Rey L. Pratt.

Of the Presiding Bishopric: Sylvester Q. Cannon, David A. Smith, John Wells.

OFFICERS AND OTHER AUTHORITIES PRESENT

Church Historian and Recorder: Joseph Fielding Smith and the following assistants: Andrew Jenson, Brigham H. Roberts, A. William Lund.

Presidents of stakes with their counselors were well represented from the ninety-nine stakes of Zion, three new stakes having been organized in the past six months.

The Priesthood Quorums, including high priests, seventies and elders, and bishops and their counselors, from all parts of the Church were in attendance. There were officers also, men and women, of the

*James E. Talmage absent, presiding over the European Mission.

Junius F. Wells absent in the East.

auxiliary organizations present, and members of the Church Board of Education.

Mission Presidents were present as follows: , Henry H. Rolapp, Eastern States; John H. Taylor, Northern States; Samuel O. Bennion, Central States; John M. Knight, Western States; Wm. R. Sloan, Northwestern States; Chas. H. Hart, Canada; John G. Allred, Northcentral States; Charles A. Callis, Southern States; Rey L. Pratt, Mexico; Benjamin Goddard, Bureau of Information, Temple Block, Salt Lake City, Utah.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn, "O say, what is truth."

Elder John M. Holt, president of the West Jordan stake, offered the opening prayer.

The choir and congregation sang the hymn, "High on the mountain top."

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

It is a source of satisfaction and pleasure to greet so many of you here this morning at our semi-annual conference.

VISITS TO STAKES, WARDS AND MISSIONS

It has fallen to my lot since our last conference to visit a number of the stakes of Zion, to be present at the dedication of a number of meeting houses in the various wards, and to dedicate four chapels and recreation halls in the missions of the Church.

I have also had the pleasure of being present at a meeting on the Hill Cumorah, which was held in commemoration of the one hundredth anniversary of the delivery to Joseph Smith of the golden plates from which the Book of Mormon was translated by the inspiration of the living God, and also to attend a meeting in the Sacred Grove at Palmyra, where God, our heavenly Father, and Jesus Christ appeared to the boy Joseph Smith—the most remarkable and wonderful vision that we have any record of in the Holy Scriptures.

I rejoice in the growth of the Church and in the general prosperity of the people. There have been quite a number of changes in the various stakes and wards since our last conference.

STAKE PRESIDENTS APPOINTED

East Jordan stake, Heber J. Burgon.

West Jordan stake, Joseph M. Holt.

Los Angeles stake, Leo J. Muir.

San Francisco stake, W. Aird Macdonald.

Hollywood stake, George W. McCune.

The former president of the Los Angeles stake, George W. McCune, is now the president of the new Hollywood stake.

MISSION PRESIDENT RELEASED

Brother Martin Christopherson was released as the president of the Norwegian mission, and since his return home he has passed to the great beyond. Brother Lorenzo W. Anderson was appointed to succeed Brother Christopherson.

NEW WARDS ORGANIZED

Osgood ward, Idaho Falls stake.
 Soldier Summit ward, Kolob stake.
 Wiltshire ward, Hollywood stake.
 Winslow ward, Snowflake stake.
 Riverton ward, West Jordan stake, divided into Riverton first and Riverton second wards.
 Berkeley ward, San Francisco stake.
 Diamond ward, San Francisco stake.
 Elmhurst ward, San Francisco stake.
 Martinez ward, San Francisco stake.
 Mission ward, San Francisco stake.
 Oakland ward, San Francisco stake.
 San Francisco ward, San Francisco stake.
 Richmond ward, San Francisco stake.
 Sunset ward, San Francisco stake.
 Daly City ward, San Francisco stake.

NEW STAKES ORGANIZED

Los Angeles stake was divided into the Los Angeles and Hollywood stakes.

Jordan stake was divided into East Jordan and West Jordan stakes.
 San Francisco stake.

BISHOPS WHO HAVE DIED

Sylvester C. Williams of Glenwood ward, Alberta stake.
 Thomas J. McCann of Turner ward, Bannock stake.

NUMBER OF STAKES, NINETY-NINE—INCREASE IN SIX MONTHS, THREE

We now have 930 wards, an increase of 15 in the past six months. We have 75 independent branches, an increase of four in the past six months, making a total of wards and branches from Canada to Mexico of 1,005.

We have 27 missions, covering all parts of the world.

STATEMENT BY THE U. S. ATTORNEY GENERAL

I have decided this morning to make rather brief remarks personally, and to read from the revelations of God to the Latter-day Saints, but before doing so I want to call attention to a very remarkable statement made by the attorney general of the United States. This statement was made at Bedford Springs, Penn., June 22, 1927:

ON OBSERVANCE OF LAW

"When intelligent, educated men hold up to ridicule the rules for its conduct which society has made, intimate and by innuendo and suggestion advise that such rules ought to be violated; ridicule and revile as undesirable members of a community, men sworn to defend and enforce its rules; devote their intelligence, wit and resources to making crime and criminals interesting and attractive, why is it not expected that the thoughtless, the unfortunate, the ignorant, the vicious, will try to get rid of the oppressors of the criminal in any way, by any means, any violence that will be most effective?

"Because someone pays for the doing of it, and because the great body of law-abiding citizens is complaisant and says nothing to show its disapproval, flippant, jeering writers, publishers, soap-box orators, cabaret performers sow the wind; and society reaps it in whirlwinds which blast and destroy."

The attorney general, without mentioning prohibition, asserted that in buying any commodity, traffic in which is forbidden by law, the purchaser is directly sanctioning and rewarding a violation of the law in exactly the same manner as does the receiver of stolen goods, by making the transaction profitable.

"It will not do," he asserted, "to say in the same breath: 'I believe in and demand enforcement of the laws of the country, and I will pay well any man who will violate these laws.'"

I regret that his speech was not published in full in the dispatches, because it is the speech of a statesman, the speech of a man who loves his country and is desirous of maintaining and upholding the laws of that country.

THE DOCTRINE AND COVENANTS ON THE SUBJECT

In the very first revelation in the Doctrine and Covenants we find the following:

"Search these commandments, for they are true and faithful, and the prophecies and promises which are in them shall all be fulfilled.

"What I the Lord have spoken, I have spoken, and I excuse not myself; and though the heavens and the earth pass away, my word shall not pass away, but shall all be fulfilled, whether by mine own voice or by the voice of my servants, it is the same."

We read in one of the revelations:

"I, the Lord, am bound when ye do what I say; but when ye do not what I say, ye have no promise."

I wish that I had the ability to impress upon the Latter-day Saints the necessity of searching the commandments of God, the revelations from the Lord, the Creator of heaven and earth, as contained in the Doctrine and Covenants. If we as a people would live up to those wonderful revelations that have come to us, we would be a bright and shining light to all the wide world.

"Let no man break the laws of the land, for he that keepeth the laws of God hath no need to break the laws of the land.

"Wherefore, be subject to the powers that be, until he reigns whose right it is to reign, and subdues all enemies under his feet."

"According to the laws and constitution of the people, which I have suffered to be established, and should be maintained for the rights and protection of all flesh, according to just and holy principles;

"That every man may act in doctrine and principle pertaining to futurity, according to the moral agency which I have given unto him, that every man may be accountable for his own sins in the day of judgment. * * *

"And for this purpose I have established the Constitution of this land, by the hands of wise men whom I raised up unto this very purpose, and redeemed the land by the shedding of blood."

LOYALTY TO THE CONSTITUTION

All Latter-day Saints believe absolutely that the Constitution of our Country was inspired of God, and that he used wise men, noble men, as instruments in his hands for establishing that Constitution, and when any law is enacted and becomes a constitutional law, no man who spends his money to help men break that law can truthfully say that he is a loyal citizen.

"And now, verily I say unto you concerning the laws of the land, it is my will that my people should observe to do all things whatsoever I command them.

"And that law of the land which is constitutional, supporting that principle of freedom in maintaining rights and privileges, belongs to all mankind, and is justifiable before me.

"Therefore, I, the Lord, justify you, and your brethren of my church in befriending that law which is the constitutional law of the land.

"And as pertaining to law of man, whatsoever is more or less than this cometh of evil.

"I, the Lord God, make you free, therefore you are free indeed; and the law also maketh you free.

"Nevertheless, when the wicked rule the people mourn.

"Wherefore, honest men and wise men should be sought for diligently, and good men and wise men ye should observe to uphold; otherwise whatsoever is less than these cometh of evil.

"And I give unto you a commandment, that ye shall forsake all evil and cleave unto all good, that ye shall live by every word which proceedeth forth out of the mouth of God."

"For behold, it is not meet that I should command in all things; for he that is compelled in all things, the same is a slothful and not a wise servant; wherefore he receiveth no reward.

"Verily I say, men should be anxiously engaged in a good cause, and do many things of their own free will, and bring to pass much righteousness;

"For the power is in them, wherein they are agents unto themselves. And inasmuch as men do good they shall in nowise lose their reward.

"But he that doth not anything until he is commanded, and receiveth a commandment with doubtful heart, and keepeth it with slothfulness, the same is damned.

"Who am I that made man, saith the Lord, that will hold him guiltless that obeys not my commandments?

"Who am I, saith the Lord, that have promised and have not fulfilled?"

"I command and men obey not; I revoke and they receive not the blessing.

"Then they say in their hearts: This is not the work of the Lord, for his promises are not fulfilled. But woe unto such for their reward lurketh beneath, and not from above."

Another statement in this book is that "there is a law, irrevocably decreed in heaven before the foundations of this world, upon which all blessings are predicated:

"And when we obtain any blessing from God, it is by obedience to that law upon which it is predicated."

THE WORD OF WISDOM

"A Word of Wisdom for the benefit of the council of high priests, assembled in Kirtland, and the Church, and also the Saints in Zion.

"To be sent greeting; not by commandment or constraint, but by revelation and the word of wisdom, showing forth the order and will of God in the temporal salvation of all Saints in the last days.

"Given for a principle with promise, adapted to the capacity of the weak and the weakest of all Saints, who are or can be called Saints."

And every Latter-day Saint knows that tea, that coffee, that tobacco, that liquor, are the things that this Word of Wisdom says it is not pleasing unto God that we should partake of. There are many Saints who say: "Oh, that is not by way of commandment;" but it is "the order and the will of God." And what does the Lord promise to you and to me and to every Latter-day Saint who observes this Word of Wisdom?

"And all Saints who remember to keep and do these sayings, walking in obedience to the commandments, shall receive health in their navel and marrow to their bones;

"And shall find wisdom and great treasures of knowledge, even hidden treasures;

"And shall run and not be weary, and shall walk and not faint.

"And I, the Lord, give unto them a promise, that the destroying angel shall pass by them, as the children of Israel, and not slay them."

A CALL FOR HELP TO DO RIGHT

May God help you and me and every Latter-day Saint to observe the Word of Wisdom, that we may have health and hidden treasures of knowledge, and that God will allow us to live here upon the earth until we have filled out the measure of our creation; and may God help you and me to uphold the laws of our land in every way within our power, is my prayer, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ, our Redeemer, Amen.

PRESIDENT ANTHONY W. IVINS

I would be very happy, my brethren and sisters, if I were able to impress upon this congregation of Latter-day Saints and upon those who may be present who are not identified with the Church, the vital importance of that part of the remarks just made by the President of the Church which refers to our obligation to magnify, uphold and sustain the civil law by which we are governed in our temporal affairs.

UPHOLD AND SUSTAIN THE CIVIL LAW

I have made, while sitting here upon my seat and listening to the President, some notes which I desire very briefly to call to your attention. To me the establishment of the government of the United States, and the development of this nation of which we are citizens, did not come by chance, but was a thing of destiny, just one of the incidents connected with the development of the purposes of the Lord in the consummation of his great plan, looking to the redemption of his covenant people, coming in the time in which it was to come, developing, as he decreed it should develop, and accomplishing, notwithstanding all of the weaknesses and shortcomings of its people, the purposes for which it was intended.

WE OCCUPY SIMILAR POSITION TO ISRAEL OF OLD

It had its inception more than four thousand years ago, when the Lord called Abraham from his home in Chaldea, and entered into covenant with him, a covenant which was to be everlasting, that he would make of him and his descendants a great people, and that through them all of the nations of the earth should be blessed. It is a long time to go back four thousand years, and the time which is allotted to me would not justify an effort upon my part to do so. It is sufficient for me to state to you, and this can be definitely and fully demonstrated, that the history of the Israelitish people from that time until the present, brings us, step by step, to the condition which we occupy today. The way is clearly marked. The path in which they have traveled in the past, as well as the road which will lead to the consummation of this covenant which God entered into with them, are all plainly outlined in the scriptures which we have before us.

A GOVERNMENT DESIGNED FOR ALL MANKIND

The coming of Columbus to this continent was not a thing of chance. It had been foreseen and foretold by the prophets of God. The coming of the Pilgrim fathers to New England, of the Dutch to New York, and the cavaliers of the Old World to Virginia, was not a thing of chance, it was just the chosen combination of men and women who were calculated to make up the composite government which was established at the time of the adoption of the Constitution of the United States. They were prayerful people, they were people who had faith in God, they prayed to him and their prayers were answered; and, as stated in the scripture which the President has read, it was under the Lord's inspiration that these men were moved upon to give us this government under which we have so rapidly and wonderfully developed. It was not to be a government of Englishmen, nor of Dutchmen, nor of royalty represented in the cavaliers, nor of French people who were in Louisiana, and to the north of us, in Canada, but a government designed for the benefit of all mankind, a government which was to make all people equal under the law.

CIVIL AND RELIGIOUS LAWS ARE SEPARATE

The beginnings of it in this dispensation were had when Martin Luther struck from the people of the Old World the shackles which bound them to a policy by which the church sought to dominate the state and government in civil, as well as religious affairs—a thing which the Lord has told us is not his will, that we are responsible to him for our faith, for the morality and the righteousness of our lives. He has told us just as definitely that we are responsible to the civil law, so far as the control of our temporal affairs is concerned. What could be accomplished without the proper administration of civil law? There would be no protection for society, the weak would be subject to the power of the strong, to prevent all of which fundamental laws of our country have been enacted by wise men. How wisely the Constitutional law of our country has been framed! It provides for a legislative body to carefully study and enact the laws of our country. These men are not to execute the laws that they themselves make—it would be a dangerous thing—but an administrative department of government is provided, which is to execute and administer the law enacted by the legislative body. They are just laws. It may be that laws have been enacted which were in a sense undesirable. A way is provided by which they may be abrogated or amended, and that is the proper mode of procedure.

GLADSTONE ON THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

I desire to quote what William Gladstone, one of the greatest of our modern statesmen, says in regard to the Constitution of the United States:

"The Constitution of the United States is the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of men." And he speaks truly. It was the work of God, his wisdom manifested in the men who created it and brought it forth. Gladstone is right.

THE NEED OF EMPHASIZING LAW OBSERVANCE

Now what is the necessity of calling attention to this matter at this particular time? I believe that we who are present know that the necessity does exist. You only need to read the reports that come to us from the various parts of the United States, and from our own state and county. There is sufficient evidence to demonstrate that lawlessness is running riot. Men go, boldly and unmasked, and shoot their way into the treasure-houses of this country, killing, if law-abiding men stand in the way, in order that they may carry away that which does not belong to them. Men violate, unblushingly, the laws of chastity and virtue, which are the very foundations upon which all good governments may stand. Men holding public office violate that trust which has been reposed in them by the people, and themselves stand out violators of the very law that they are appointed to magnify and uphold. Only this morning you who read the papers saw an account of one of the most atrocious crimes that could be named, said to have been perpetrated by an official who has been appointed to administer the law, not to violate it, in which at a threat of life he takes a woman into an automobile, carries her away to a secluded place, and there keeps her during the entire night. I have passed a good part of my life among uncivilized people. I have been with Indian tribes from the Canadian border to the interior of Mexico, and I have never in my experience encountered a tribe of Indians who would tolerate lawlessness of this character in the indifferent manner that we do. Men are arrested, prosecution is sought, the best legal talent available is called in for their defense, and there is scarcely one chance in ten that they will be convicted. Witnesses unblushingly perjure themselves, while attorneys who pose as respectable members of society, with full knowledge of the fact, encourage them in it.

OFFICIALS BESET WITH VEXATIOUS LAW SUITS

Officials who conscientiously endeavor to execute the law are beset with vexatious law suits, the money for which is furnished by lawless people, until they are driven from office.

I do not refer to local conditions alone. Is there need to call the attention of the people of the United States, of our own state, of this entire inter-mountain country, to the necessity of following the admonition of the Lord, in the scripture which has been read to us, that in the selection of the men who are to administer the law, we should choose men of integrity? and there are plenty of such men, many of whom are now in public service. Do not understand me to infer that there is not integrity in the administration of our public affairs, but by some means rogues slip in, under the shadow of good men, before their character becomes known.

CALLING OF THE CHURCH TO UPHOLD RIGHT AND OPPOSE CRIME

I speak plainly upon this subject, my brethren and sisters, because it appears to me to be vital to our welfare. I do not direct my remarks to Latter-day Saints alone, but to the people of all creeds, professions of faith, or of no faith at all. I know that politics has been held up to us as a thing so sacred that the Church has nothing to do with it, and should not refer to it. I ask you, in heaven's name, what is the calling of the Church, if it is not to oppose lawlessness and crime, and seek to establish righteousness; if it is not to stand firmly for the proper administration of the law, and to oppose violation of it that peace and prosperity may abide with the people of our country, which can be had under no other conditions?

DESTINY OF NATION FORETOLD

I wish that the people of the world could be made familiar with the contents of the Book of Mormon, this American scripture which has been before the world during a century of time. It outlines the destiny of this nation, tells it as plainly as history will tell it after its destiny is accomplished. It makes very plain this fact: That if the government is to be perpetuated, as it may, if it is to endure as God has decreed that it may, it can only be by service to the God of the land, who is Jesus Christ, our Lord and Master. That is definitely decreed.

AN APPEAL TO CITIZENS TO UPHOLD THE LAW

I appeal to good people everywhere, not to any political party, not to any particular church, but to all people, to use their influence to bring to pass righteousness in the administration of the civil affairs of our country, and I make this appeal to both the church and the state, for both need it. Do men preach righteousness who themselves violate the civil law? Ask the preachers of today for the answer. Do men standing in high places in governmental affairs violate the law? Go back to Washington and investigate. How can we expect, as this statesman from whom the president has quoted, asks, that the common people, one of whom I am, who look to their leaders for example, shall honor and obey the law when they see it constantly violated in higher callings of life? Violation of the law is an evil under any circumstance, but when the law is violated by people who are chosen to maintain and administer it, it becomes a double offense in the sight of God and man, because a man not only becomes a violator of the law, but he breaks the trust placed in him, the trust which his fellow citizens have reposed in him and which he has sworn to discharge. He thus becomes doubly guilty.

NATION'S SALVATION RESTS WITH ITS CITIZENS

My brethren and sisters, I shall not prolong my remarks. We leave this question with you. We want you to understand that the salvation of this nation rests in the hands of its citizens, not in the hands of those who control its civil affairs at present, but those who hold the franchise, and are to exercise it in the future. It appears to me that if the importance of this were understood, greater care would be exercised in the selection of men for public office.

There are enough of such men, and to spare, to administer our public affairs. There are good men, honest men, in all political parties, and associated with all churches, and many who are allied with neither party or church. I do not appeal to any particular group of people, but to Christian people the world over.

TEACH AND PRACTICE PURITY OF LIFE

I appeal to you to teach and practice righteousness and purity of life.

Do you know what those Indians to whom I have referred would do with a woman who violated the law of chastity? They would split her ears, and cut her hair in a manner that she would be recognized for what she is, wherever she went. They would never allow her to marry in the tribe again, and the man who would be guilty of offences such as are almost daily committed in our communities, would be put to death. It may have been a barbarous law, but it kept those people free from the sin of immorality, until they were corrupted by the white man who came among them and introduced his more civilized mode of life.

God bless you, my brethren and sisters. May his spirit be with us during the meetings of this conference.

PROGRESS OF THE CHURCH—WHAT IT STANDS FOR

The report made by the President indicates to you that the Church is developing; it is progressing. Word comes to us from one of the missions of the United States that more than fourteen thousand copies of the Book of Mormon have been distributed by the Elders of the Church in that mission during the present year. It is a wonderful thing. It is a wonderful achievement, indicating that the people of the United States are becoming interested. They are beginning to understand the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, what it stands for, what it lives for, and what it is willing to die for to the last man if necessary. The constitutional law which God has given us for our guidance, has made us, through observance of it, the dominant nation of the world today. I pray for God's blessings upon the government, its president, its legislators, upon the state government, its governor and its officers who have been chosen; those who seek to administer the law in righteousness. May God bless and give them success, I pray, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

A solo, "The Lord is mindful of his own," was sung by Mrs. Jesse Morley.

ELDER DAVID O. MCKAY

"And they were all young men, and they were exceedingly valiant for courage, and also for strength and activity; but behold, this was not all—they were men who were true at all times in whatsoever thing they were entrusted.

"Yea, they were men of truth and soberness, for they had been taught to keep the commandments of God and to walk uprightly before him."—Alma 53:20, 21.

THE MISSION OF THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS

The mission of the Latter-day Saints may be considered in two great aspects; one, the proclamation to the world of the restoration of the gospel of Jesus Christ—the declaration to all mankind that God the Father and his Son Jesus Christ appeared in this dispensation to the Prophet Joseph Smith. That in itself is a wonderful message.

There are in this audience sixty-two missionaries who are preparing to go abroad to give this proclamation. They are but representatives of two thousand others who, paying their own expenses, are abroad in the world declaring in all sincerity that God, as a loving Father, ever mindful of the children of men, has revealed the means whereby mankind can return to his presence. That is one important phase or mission of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

The other great purpose of the Church is to translate truth into a better social order, or in other words, to make our religion effective in the individual lives of men, and in improving social conditions. It is the second aspect to which I wish to call attention this morning.

I have read from the fifty-third chapter of Alma, which gives an account of young men who were exceedingly valiant for courage, for strength, and activity—men who were true at all times in whatsoever thing they were entrusted. Who were these young men? They were sons of parents who were equally true to every trust. Their parents were converted Lamanites who, when the Spirit of God came upon them, devoted their lives to the service of their fellow men, and in their ministry in the Church covenanted that they would never more take up arms against their brethren, never more go to war. Such was their oath; such was their covenant; and they were true to it even unto death.

One of the most beautiful pictures given in all literature is the picture of these parents going out to meet enemies who came against them with swords, and sacrificing their lives rather than to uncover the swords they had buried and given their word not to unearth. One thousand of these parents suffered death rather than violate their covenant. Meeting no resistance, the enemy, being conscience-stricken, stopped the massacre, after a thousand men had proved that they preferred death to the violation of a trust.

THE RESPONSIBILITY OF PARENTHOOD

I mention this because parenthood has much to do in inculcating courage and trustworthiness in children. The law of cause and effect is working in parenthood as it is in any other law of nature. There is a responsibility upon all, and especially upon fathers and mothers, to set examples to children and young people worthy of imitation. Parents must be sincere in upholding law and upholding the priesthood in their homes, that children may see a proper example. Respect for law and order, as charity, begins at home.

These young men were true to every trust. They were men of integrity. I cannot think of anything which will contribute more to the establishing of law and order than for each individual to cherish integrity and honesty in his or her heart. Integrity, honesty—the Latter-day Saints stand for these fundamental principles. They are generally noted for their integrity and honesty, and it is with sorrow we receive the word, whenever it comes through the press or by voice, that one of the Latter-day Saints has failed in his obligation to trust.

THE VALUE OF INTEGRITY

I remember with what pride I listened to a conversation over the telephone in one of our stakes. The president was called from the dining table to the telephone. His part of the conversation I heard, and I can give both. The gentleman at the other end, not a member of the Church, was a real estate man. He had in his office a man who was making a purchase but who could not pay the entire sum for the property. The purchaser claimed to be a member of this Church, and the real estate dealer called up the president of the stake to confirm this statement.

"Do you know," said the realtor, "Mr. Blank?"

"Yes," said the president.

"Is he a member of your Church?"

"He is."

"Is he in good standing?"

"Yes," replied the president.

"Thank you," said the real estate dealer. "He is here to make a loan. If he is a member of your Church in good standing I will trust him."

Integrity, the first principle of success. "Give us the man of integrity, on whom we know we can thoroughly depend, who will stand firm when others fail, the friend faithful and true, the adviser, honest and fearless, the adversary, just and chivalrous; such a one is a fragment of the rock of ages." Integrity is the first step to true greatness. Men love to praise, but are slow to practice, integrity. To maintain it in high places costs self-denial. In all places it is liable to opposition, but its end is glorious, and the universe will yet do it homage. "A man of integrity will never listen to any plea against conscience."

MR. BABSON'S COMMENT

Many of you are familiar with a comment on this fundamental principle by Mr. Roger W. Babson, the great statistician:

"The things which we look upon as of great value: the stocks, bonds, bank-books, deeds, mortgages, insurance policies, etc., are merely nothing. While 51 per cent of the people have their eyes on the goal of Integrity, our investments are secure; but with 51 per cent of them headed in the wrong direction, our investments are valueless. So the first fundamental of prosperity is integrity. Without it there is no civilization, there is no peace, there is no security, there is no safety. Mind you, also, that this applies just as much to the man who is working for wages as to the capitalist and every owner of property.

"Integrity, however, applies to many more things than money. Integrity requires the seeking after, as well as the dispensing of, the truth. It was this desire for truth which founded our educational institutions, our sciences and our arts. All the great professions, from medicine to engineering, rest upon this spirit of integrity. Only as they so rest, can they prosper or even survive.

"Integrity is the mother of knowledge. The desire for truth is the basis for all learning, the value of all experience and the reason for all study and investigation. Without integrity as a basis, our entire educational system would fall to the ground; all newspapers and magazines would become sources of great danger, and the publication of books would have to be suppressed. Our whole civilization rests upon the assumption that people are honest. With this confidence shaken, the structure falls. And it should fall, for unless the truth should be taught, the nation would be much better off without its schools, newspapers, books and professions. Better have no gun at all, than one aimed at yourself. The cornerstone of prosperity is the stone of Integrity."

George Washington, the father of our country, said:

"I hope I shall always possess firmness and virtue enough to maintain what I consider to be the most enviable of all titles, the character of an honest man."

THE APPLICATION

Now, the application of this thought. In addition to what we have heard this morning from the President, I would like to read this from the Doctrine and Covenants:

"We believe that governments were instituted of God for the benefit of man; and that he holds men accountable for their acts in relation to them, both in making laws and administering them, for the good and safety of society.

"We believe that all governments necessarily require civil officers and magistrates to enforce the laws of the same; and that such as will administer the law in equity and justice should be sought for and upheld by the voice of the people."

No Latter-day Saint can be true to his country, true to his Church, true to his God, who will violate these laws which relate to the moral welfare and the spiritual advancement of mankind.

LATTER-DAY SAINTS MUST UPHOLD THE LAW

There is much being said now about the law prohibiting the manufacture and sale of liquor. Latter-day Saints should uphold that law everywhere, at socials, at banquets. Civil officers, members of clubs, who are contributing to the formation of public opinion ought to be proud to uphold that law. It is a constitutional law, and it is time that the leaders of this country, the politicians, the statesmen, the leaders in civic affairs in the state and in the cities should so speak of this law, so act towards it, that public sentiment would be turned in favor of its enforcement. Latter-day Saints, we are expected to uphold it and to uphold every other law which contributes to the advancement and peace of mankind. And these laws against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors are such laws, and our conditions now in society, with millions of automobiles, the drivers of which must be at their very best, active mentally, quick to respond physically in emergency, make it necessary that we eliminate from society anything that will becloud the brain or leave the driver's hand unsteady. We are living in a condition in which we cannot with impunity foster traffic in intoxicating liquors. God said long ago that they were not good for man. Our boys and girls, from the standpoint of integrity and consistency, should take a stand against the use thereof.

TRANSLATE OUR RELIGION INTO PERFECT SOCIAL CONDITIONS

All should take pride in making "Mormonism" a synonym for trustworthiness, temperance, chastity, honesty, justice—these are fundamental principles of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and by exemplifying them in our lives we contribute to the transformation of society, we translate our religion into better social conditions and bring salvation and peace to men here and now.

May our Father in heaven guide and protect the missionaries who are out proclaiming the restoration of the gospel. May he bless Israel here at home, who, through faithfulness, will contribute to an improved social order. May it be recorded also of our young men: They are men of truth and soberness—men who are true at all times in whatsoever thing they are entrusted, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER SYLVESTER Q. CANNON

Presiding Bishop of the Church

I have been much impressed, my brethren and sisters, with the instructions given to us this morning. I realized while listening to the remarks and instructions that in what has been said there is inspiration for many sermons. I would like to discuss for a moment the statement contained in the Doctrine and Covenants to the effect that there is "a law irrevocably decreed, in heaven, before the foundations of this world, upon which all blessings are predicated, and when we obtain any blessing from God it is by obedience to that law upon which it is predicated." In effect, as I understand it, this means that obedience to principle and law brings blessings. Conversely, we may say that disobedience to principle and law will fail to produce desired results.

I am impressed with the statement made by Brother David O. McKay with regard to the matter of integrity. This great fundamental characteristic is too often lacking among mankind. Some years ago one of the great national engineering societies, composed of many thousands of members, sent out a questionnaire to these various men throughout the country, asking them to indicate the requisites to success in engineering work. The result of that questionnaire was in some respects rather surprising. Instead of specifying the first requisite as technical skill and knowledge, the statement generally made was that the first requisite is character and integrity, and that other things should follow. I am sure that that characteristic is recognized as being most important for the welfare and lasting success of men everywhere. There are conditions prevailing, as has been stated today, that require the development of integrity and stability among the people of the United States and of the world generally.

To produce the greatest results in this direction it will involve thorough training of young people. Theodore Roosevelt declared, in speaking of the development of boys, that "if you are going to do anything permanent for the average man, you have got to begin before he is a man. The chances of success lie in working with the boy and not the man." I think it was Henry VanDyke who stated that few men over twenty-five years of age change their habits of thought and action. I do not believe that to be entirely the case, although it is probably true in most instances.

In my own experience in the gospel of Jesus Christ, I know that the Lord has power to and does change men's hearts and their desires and determination when they are much older. This occurs when they are brought to a condition of repentance, through an understanding of the fact that the things they are doing are not in conformity with his laws. No matter what their age may be they can repent and change entirely their habits and course of action, and their desires and determination. If time would permit, experiences could be related indicating such changes which have entirely altered the course of life of men in the world who have come to a knowledge and acceptance of the principles of the gospel.

It being the case that character and integrity are recognized generally as a prime requisite to success and progress, I am sure that the principles of the gospel which we have espoused, if they were observed by the people of the world generally, would develop these very qualities in them. I appreciate the fact that obedience to the principles of the gospel requires will power, and will power is developed through integrity. So that, in a sense, the observance of these principles requires integrity, and also produces integrity. That is true with regard to every principle of the gospel.

So far as the Word of Wisdom is concerned we realize that, as the Lord has said, those who observe this principle and endeavor to live in accordance with the spirit of it will receive blessings—temporal and spiritual blessings. They develop physically, mentally and spiritually, and as they do so they develop their will power to resist the things that are contrary to the desires of the Lord and their own well-being.

If time permitted we could discuss at some length the benefits that come from observance of the Word of Wisdom, and the bad results that come from the lack of observance of that principle. Medical authorities are agreed that the use of cigarettes is harmful, that it tends to weaken the moral fiber of men and women, and that in addition thereto the use of cigarettes by women not only weakens their moral vitality, but also interferes with the functions of motherhood and the welfare of their children. Shall it be said that those who use cigarettes are morally unfit, or that they are not living in accordance with moral principles? I will not say that, but I do say that they are able to maintain their morals in spite of, rather than because of, the use of cigarettes and tobacco. I realize the fact, and I believe it is recognized, that those who do use tobacco are weakened thereby, and any success they enjoy is in spite of the fact that they use it. This is just as true of the use of liquor and narcotics, which injuriously affect the moral stamina as well as the physical body.

Some time ago the claim was made to me by a man who is giving his main efforts toward money-making, that the most successful men of today in the business world are using liquor notwithstanding it is contrary to law. At random I have noted the statements made by various men of prominence relative thereto. I would like to show the attitude of such men, some of whom did not use liquor even when it was not against the law.

Richard Washburn Child said of Theodore Roosevelt that in years of intimate acquaintance he never knew him to take any stimulant other than hot milk. Henry Ford is strongly against the use of liquor, and does not even allow smoking by his men. Tom Mix, the noted movie artist, does not smoke or drink. Calvin Coolidge is opposed to the use of liquor. Mussolini, the great Italian dictator, says, "I abstain rigidly from all kinds of alcoholic beverages, even from the lightest wines." Also, he says, "Coffee is never served me at any meal. It is a stimulant, compelling by its action a useless nervous effort, resulting in no concrete good." Charlie Chaplin, the noted movie comedian, says he does not use liquor. It is further stated that once in a while he uses a cigarette, but without enthusiasm.

The result of the observance of the Word of Wisdom is that it develops integrity and character in men and women. Whether they acknowledge that these principles have been given of the Lord, or whether they accept them as coming from medical science, the observance of the same makes for their welfare. From whatever source or idea they gain the conviction, it is for their benefit if they observe it; and, if they fail, it is for their injury. In like manner every principle of the gospel brings its own blessing.

Now, of course, as Latter-day Saints we realize that the thing the Lord desires of us is that we should observe his commandments because we love him and because we recognize in him the fulness of wisdom. Yet, while we accept these things as coming from the Lord, we also gain understanding of the reasons why they are for our blessing.

The principle of tithing is for many people a difficult one to observe. Yet there are many people outside of this Church who, while not recognizing any direct revelation from the Lord for the observance of the principle, read the Bible and find that in early times this principle was observed. Therefore, they are undertaking to live it. They call themselves tithers, and are faithful in the observance of that principle. Not long since there was a man in my office from the East—a Presbyterian—and we were discussing the principle of tithing. He stated that anyone who would observe the principle of tithes, would find that nine-tenths of his income would go as far as the ten would otherwise go. It seems from an economic standpoint a difficult thing to understand and appreciate, and yet that is the testimony of many people.

I would like to relate to you briefly an instance that occurred in a ward in one of the stakes in Canada. Some years ago the people were in a critical financial condition because of the failure of crops. At that time a special tithing campaign was inaugurated and the people were encouraged to fully obey this principle. From that time, about five years ago, up to the present they have continued to suffer at least partial losses of their crops. Some of the people moved away, mainly non-members of the Church. But the members of the ward undertook faithfully to live the principle of tithing, and as evidence of that it is shown that in the six months' report for this year, 90 per cent of those who should observe the principle of tithing had observed it.

What is the result? In spite of the fact that crop conditions and climatic conditions have not been entirely favorable; in spite of the fact that at the time they were financially embarrassed, the people have been blessed and prospered. They have practically gotten out of debt, they have become more united, their attendance at meetings is remarkable, and the activities of the ward are unusual. They are living the principles of the gospel. They have been relieved of their obligations. They have learned how to do things, they have brought in dairy cows, sheep and hogs, and have learned to manufacture the raw materials of the farm into products that will sell profitably. The result is that they are in a position to go forward, and they are now building a meeting-house which they expect will be paid for within a year. A little ward of that kind, under the most unfavorable conditions, through renewing their covenants and observing this principle, have gained financial blessings. More than that, they have gained spiritual blessings which come through the observance of it. And so the blessing comes to every one of us according to the way we live it.

I am convinced of the fact that the principle of tithing is a principle of blessing, spiritually first, financially second, and that it offers opportunity to relieve ourselves of obligations that may press upon us, and will increase our progress and growth in the gospel and in life. I know that it develops in every one that obeys it the qualities of integrity and determination to be worthy of the trust that is placed in us, so that our word shall be as good as our bond. I know that the observance of this principle will bring us up to that standard.

It is the same with regard to the principle of fasting and fast offerings. The Lord declared many years ago through his servants that the Latter-day Saints should observe fasting. The Savior in his day taught this principle. Those who observe that principle are physically stronger and better off, the digestive system has the opportunity to rest and to gain strength and vigor to be able to carry on its functions. Some of the worst diseases of the people of the United States today are due to digestive troubles through overeating. The principle of fasting, properly observed, will help us to enjoy greater vitality. It will also help us to develop increased will power and determination, to overcome and to resist the temptations which come to us in life, and it will develop in us the spirit of sympathy and consideration for our fellowmen. And so, the observance of this principle will bring the blessings which we desire to enjoy and which we need to enable us to become better men and women.

In like manner the observance of the principle of prayer yields remarkable blessings. It is a principle that is being neglected very seriously throughout the world today by many people who have gotten away from the love of God and faith in him. This principle, drawing one to the Lord in humility, and in faith, asking him for the things we desire, and giving him gratitude and praise for his blessings to us, is a source of strength and power that will enable us to overcome our weaknesses, and develop in us faith and determination to do right.

I do not feel that I ought to take more time, my brethren and sisters. I desire to testify to you that the observance of these principles will bring blessings to men that will develop in them integrity and uprightness, initiative, faith, and ability to stand against all the winds of contrary doctrine, or of temptation or trial. Observance of these principles will enable us to go forward and live in humility in accordance with the will of the Lord.

May the Lord bless us that we may train the young men and women especially, that they may be qualified and developed in the observance of these things, and thereby become men and women of integrity, in order that the next generation shall be able to carry on every phase of activity in the most effective way, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER B. H. ROBERTS

Senior President of the First Council of Seventy

I call your attention, my brethren and sisters, to what is designated as our Twelfth Article of Faith, which reads:

"We believe in being subject to kings, presidents, rulers and magistrates; in obeying, honoring and sustaining the law."

I think by reading this Article of Faith as a text I shall be able in my thinking to be in harmony with the spirit of this meeting by reason of what our president has said, and this meeting may be the dominating influence of the entire conference.

On my way home from the East recently, when passing through Scranton, Pennsylvania, I picked up the current paper of that day, and in it was a statement from the census returns of the United States, taken from the Census Bureau, Washington, that crime was increasing, in proportion, faster than the growth of our population, according to the increase of persons sent to prison. Complete returns from thirty-one states, covering fifty-eight of a total of ninety-nine state prisons and reformatories, listed 27,018 new prisoners received by these institutions in 1926, as compared with 21,054 in 1923, the first prison census year in this country, or an increase of 28.3 per cent. There were 34.1 prisoners for 100,000 population jailed last year, as against 27.9 in 1923.

Then as we came through Denver, I picked up the Rocky Mountain News, and in it found a column devoted to crime and its increase. I do not have time to read it, but it would be very enlightening to do so. It would, however, occupy too much time. Let it be sufficient to say that the writer of that special column traced the crime of our country from the highest stations in political life, from those who had been found guilty of crime in the President's cabinet, through governors of states and mayors of cities, down to the lowly stations in life. It constitutes a rather severe arraignment of the present status of the United States in the matter of law observance. One statement was to the effect that according to General Lincoln C. Andrews, former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, there are no less than 40,000,000 drinkers in this prohibition country, and "home-brew is becoming a nation-wide enterprise."

And so throughout in the column he discusses the question of violation of law and the increase of the volume of it.

Then, on the evening that I arrived home, I chanced to pick up a Salt Lake paper, and noticed that the Chief of Police in our city was calling attention to "special juvenile delinquencies" in the city, and giving special instructions to the police officers of the city to undertake the arrest of the development of this species of crime. In that article there is a list running through crimes of four days that makes the heart sick, crimes committed upon juveniles, and crimes by juveniles, that no man can read, I am sure, and not be moved by sorrow at the spectacle it represents.

You will see that coming in contact with these incidents, through the public press, on my way home, and just upon my arrival here, brought me in contact with, and reminded me of, the subject that has been under discussion for the last thirty years in this country by publicists, by statesmen, jurists, and various institutions that stand for law and order.

I have been interesting myself in this subject for some length of time. I happened to come upon some notes since arriving home wherein I found a discourse delivered by myself in this tabernacle, in 1924, in which I set forth, after elaborate statistical investigations, the supporting evidence for a statement which had been made by Chief Justice Taft, in 1908, before the Bar Association in New York, to the effect that "the administration of law in our country was a disgrace to civilization." There was much disputation that arose over that statement, which led me to an investigation with, to me, startling results, only to be convinced that our Chief Justice was within the truth in making that very strong statement.

We cannot go into statistics in relation to this subject now, but you will be interested in hearing this quotation from the words of Judge Alfred Talley, of the Court of General Sessions of New York, when introducing into office a new jurist a year or two ago. He said to him in giving him his charge:

"One of the things that you will come to learn is that you have come to the bench of the greatest criminal court in the world, and the oldest court of any kind in the United States, at a time when this country is suffering under an indictment which proclaims it to be the most lawless on earth. You will find that the United States must plead guilty to that indictment. Most of the desperate criminals are mere boys."

And that I think is one of the tragical things connected with the growth of crime, that its increase is chiefly among the youth of the land. Judge Talley continued:

"You will be heartbroken at discovering that the vast majority of defendants are under nineteen or twenty years old, and that is going to be your distressing problem."

Another statement I want to read to you is an excerpt from the report of the Commission of Law Enforcement, presented to a meeting of the American Bar Association in San Francisco, several years ago; and the conditions have not changed since then, only to grow worse. This is the statement:

"Crime and lawlessness in the United States have been steadily on the increase and out of proportion to our growth, and there has been a steady and growing disrespect for law in our nation. This is not a result of the war."

You know we are disposed to blame pretty much all of this spirit of lawlessness to the effect of the great World War. But this authority denies that and offers this in proof:

"We do not find the proportional increase in crime from 1916 to 1922 greater than from 1910 to 1916, (That is the year before we went into the War) and we have not been able to discover that crimes of violence have materially increased in France, in England or Canada during or since the War, although the effect of the War naturally must be more marked in those countries."

There is much more that might be said in evidence of this, but perhaps it is unprofitable, and impossible at least, for me now to discuss the obvious. The testimonials are so overwhelming, the crowd of witnesses is so great that as American citizens we are face to face with the fact that in our country we are living in an age of lawlessness; and therefore I deem it important that for ourselves and for the world, as far as we can reach them by proclamation, it should be known that in these mountains, in the Church of Jesus Christ, stands a people pledged to the support of law and of order, and I think Latter-day Saints no less than the world ought to have their attention called to that important truth.

Many reasons crowd in upon our attention that are interwoven with this great theme, the keynote of which President Grant has struck in his opening remarks this morning.

I shall only take time to note here one, but that one represents a great contributing cause of the growth and increase of lawlessness in our country. It arises from the uncertainty in the execution of the law. Perhaps in the foundation of our government, in establishing the constitution of our country and our state constitutions, the people of that generation had been under the iron heel of oppressive governments so long, that they became extremely anxious to protect the individual against encroachments of tyrannical administration of law, and therefore over-emphasized the rights of the individual and the protection of those rights, and had less concern for the larger rights and the protection of society from criminals. In this spirit the legislation has run in our states and in our nation, viz: to safeguard and to provide every possible means for the protection of the rights of those who are accused of crimes. And these laws, favoring so strongly the criminal, have been so used by skilful attorneys for the defense, that the administration of law has become a science for protecting the criminal from the just judgment and punishment of his crimes.

We have a very prominent case in mind now and of recent occurrence that illustrates this point. Six years ago two men were convicted under due process of law in the state of Massachusetts for shooting down and robbing in full daylight, and in a crowded thoroughfare of the city, two men who were entrusted with a payroll of a manufacturing company. Two men were arrested for the crime, tried under due process of law, and found guilty. I shall not attempt to undertake any analysis of that case, of course. But they were found guilty. By the skill and cunning of lawyers for the defense, however, delays and appeals, based on exceptions to procedure, and in devious ways, the execution of the sentence was postponed from year to year. The radical element of the community organized for withstanding the execution of the law. They went on from one scheme to another, growing, it seemed to me, more desperate in their determination to thwart the law, and the execution of the sentence in pursuance thereof, and this for seven years from the time the crime was committed. Millions in the United States, aided and abetted by some of the foremost newspapers of the land, begged and pleaded for a mitigation of the sentence pronounced by the court. Fortunately, as I view it—fortunately for the stability of the administration of the law—the state of Massachusetts withstood all these appeals, and at last the law was vindicated, notwithstanding its long delay. I was struck myself with the splendid answer that Governor Fuller made to the dramatic appeal of the wife and the sister respectively of these two condemned men. His answer was, and I believe it will become historic:

"I am sorry. My duties are outlined by the law."

Governor Fuller refused to interfere with the final execution of these sentenced men.

We have in this case an illustration of one of the great defects of administration of law in the United States, that is, "the law's delay," and the uncertainty of punishment. Let that thing continue, and criminals will mock the law.

A touch of divine wisdom comes into this question from the distant past. Solomon left on record this remarkable statement: "Because sentence against an evil work is not executed speedily, therefore the heart of the sons of men is fully set in them to do evil." Eccl. 8:11. The whole consensus of legal opinion upon this subject is to the effect that the uncertainty of the execution of the penalty encourages desperate men in crime.

If it were in harmony with the feelings of the brethren—and I know nothing of what their feelings are on this subject—it seems to me that we could with propriety voice the sentiments of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints in this conference by a proper resolution making known this our great principle, announcing our conviction of duty in the sustaining of the law, by publishing this Article of our faith in such a resolution. It would be a proper occasion, in the face of these increasing crime waves, to let our country know where the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints stands upon this question.

President Grant, I beg to venture one more thing, even if I trespass a little on your time. I cannot leave this subject without calling attention to an important declaration in the Book of Mormon, incidentally referred to by some of the brethren in their remarks this morning. They are the words of the Prophet Moroni. Hearken unto this, Latter-day Saints, and I would like to see this, too, coupled with the resolution to which I have referred, as the message of the American volume of scripture to the great Gentile nation that now is in control of this land, the U. S., and has great influence throughout the whole continent :

"And he [God] had sworn in his wrath unto the brother of Jared, that whoso should possess this land of promise, from that time henceforth and forever, should serve him, the true and only God, or they should be swept off when the fulness of his wrath should come upon them.

And now, we can behold the decrees of God concerning this land, that it is a land of promise; and whatsoever nation shall possess it shall serve God, or they shall be swept off when the fulness of his wrath shall come upon them. And the fulness of his wrath cometh upon them when they are ripened in iniquity.

For behold, this is a land which is choice above all other lands; wherefore he that doth possess it shall serve God or shall be swept off; for it is the everlasting decree of God. And it is not until the fulness of iniquity among the children of the land, that they are swept off."

Now, mark you :

"And this cometh unto you, O ye Gentiles, that ye may know the decrees of God—that ye may repent, and not continue in your iniquities until the fulness come, that ye may not bring down the fulness of the wrath of God upon you as the inhabitants of the land have hitherto done." (Ether 2:9-12).

Only three weeks ago, about now, I had the pleasure of standing upon the summit of the Hill Cumorah in company with President Grant. Being there upon that height of land, which so splendidly commands a view of the whole surrounding country, I could not refrain from recalling the time when Moroni stood upon the crown of that hill with the evidence of the ruins of the civilization of his people about him. And this warning, written in the Book of Ether, let me say, in closing, comes from the prophet of God who was also the historian of the great Jaredite nation, by abridging and translating their history into the Nephite language. This warning comes, then, from the historian of one civilization that had perished about the Hill Cumorah; it came also from the same man who was a witness of the destruction of the civilization of his own people at the same place. I hold that he was competent to speak upon this question, and it is most fitting, and is one of the evidences of inspiration in this Book, that one so competent to speak in warning should be chosen to be God's mouthpiece in warning this great Gentile nation, holding dominion over the land in our day, to beware of their course lest they, too, forfeit their rights to the pride of place they occupy among the nations of the earth. For great as our nation is, it is not above the powers of destruction if it observes not the conditions upon which it may hold its position upon this land.

May the blessing of God so come to the Gentiles that they shall not share the fate of the nations that have preceded them, is my earnest prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

The choir and congregation sang, "The Doxology."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Elmer E. Taylor, president of the Young stake of Zion.

The meeting adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON MEETING

Promptly at 2 o'clock p. m.; President Heber J. Grant opened the meeting by announcing that the choir and congregation would sing the hymn, "Do what is right."

After the singing the opening prayer was offered by Elder W. Aird McDonald, president of the San Francisco stake of Zion.

The choir and congregation sang, "For the strength of the hills we bless thee."

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

ELDER JAMES E. TALMAGE RELEASED AND ELDER JOHN A. WIDTSOE APPOINTED

In announcing the changes that have taken place during the last six months I overlooked a most important change; namely, Brother James E. Talmage, of the Council of the Twelve, has been honorably released, with his good wife, to return home, from presiding over the European mission, and Brother John A. Widtsoe and his wife will succeed them in presiding over the mission and the Relief Society in that great mission. We will now hear from Brother John A. Widtsoe.

ELDER JOHN A. WIDTSOE

My brethren and sisters: President Grant has announced the call which has come to me, and I wish to say that it always has been a great privilege to me to serve in the work of the Master. I am glad to obey the request that has been made of me and shall go forth, with mine, to do the best we can in behalf of this high and holy cause. Like every other elder in Israel, called to serve, I feel humble and incapable, of my own strength, to accomplish the work that lies before me; but I have faith, I may say absolute faith, in the inspiration that guides this Church and kingdom, and I know that, throughout the ages, the Lord has made use of the weak things of the earth to accomplish mighty purposes. With that faith I go forth gladly at the request and call, and under the authority, of those who preside in Zion, with the prayer in my heart that good may come of the action taken.

OUR OBLIGATION TO PREACH THE GOSPEL

I recognize, with Elder McKay, who spoke briefly on the subject this morning, that we are under obligation to preach the gospel to all the world. Every person must hear the truth; every honest heart must be warned. It is our bounden duty, from which we may not and cannot escape, to do this work. Throughout the world there are hosts of honest hearts who love and seek the truth, but who are so hedged about by the traditions of their fathers and by the conditions of their lives, that they find it difficult to recognize the truth when it is placed before them. It is not only a privilege to attempt to break down this barrier which stands between truth and untruth, but it is also a solemn obligation and a heavy responsibility. Many years ago in the days of my early boyhood I came out of the European countries, into this blessed land, blessed above all other lands, to live here. As my memory goes back to my mother country, and later to the days I spent in the European countries in my early manhood, as a student, I feel that there are in those countries a very great number, perhaps untold hosts of men and women, children of God, honest souls, whom we may reach if the Lord will but assist us in our labors.

GOD OVERRULES ALL THINGS FOR HIS PURPOSES

I was impressed this morning by the remarks made by President Ivins, that throughout all the ages of history the hand of God has overruled the actions of mankind, that nothing is done except as the Lord may use it for the accomplishment of his mighty purposes. No truth has become more living in my soul throughout my life than this. I have little belief in chance, little belief that things happen just because we, often stupid people, do certain work in our blindness. The things accomplished by humanity become in the end God's accomplishments, as he makes use of them in working out his infinite purposes. So, with respect to this great missionary activity to which we have devoted so much of our strength from the beginning of this dispensation, I cannot help but believe that the mighty changes that have come in this latest day of civilization, the vast physical, economic and social changes, have all been brought about through the goodness of the Lord for the accomplishment of his latter-day work. The printing press came into existence, and by it the Word of God has been brought to all people. Then in this day, when the Lord has restored the gifts and blessings of the gospel and the organization of the Church, have come other marvelous means by which we may speak the eternal truth in our keeping to all the world. The steamship came that we might carry the truth from continent to continent, across the great oceans; the railway that we might deliver the same everlasting truth to every part of every land; the telephone and the telegraph, and now the radio, that we might spread the truth of the gospel over all the world. In time we shall be able to utilize all these agencies to bear our witness to the peoples of the world, that we may stand free from blame before our Maker in the last great day.

THE SPIRIT OF GOD THE STRENGTH OF ZION

The spirit of God is upon the face of the earth; it enters the hearts of men. That spirit tempers human acts, and impels humanity to actions of righteousness. That same spirit serves as a powerful preparatory agent for us in our gospel labors. In fact, the most important thing for every person engaged in this great latter-day work is that we do rely upon the assistance of the Spirit of God. No man can safely stand in his own strength in the holy labor assigned to us, but we must stand before our daily duty with the knowledge that the Spirit of God is within our reach to assist us, to bless us and to carry us on in our labors,

OBEDIENCE TO THE GOSPEL WILL SOLVE ALL DIFFICULTIES

We were all deeply impressed this morning by the message of President Grant and of those who elaborated the thoughts in his opening address. This is indeed a day of wonderful blessings for humanity, but correspondingly great temptations. When much light is given, the contrasting darkness is also deep; where there are our present immeasurable opportunities for service, there are also temptations to do evil such as never before has been known. This condition has existed in all ages. The battle between righteousness and wickedness has always been waged actively. It is our duty, our business as a chosen people, to teach righteousness and truth forever and forever to the world until the end shall come. When we teach righteousness, the key to our conquest of evil will be the application of the few simple principles that constitute the Gospel of Jesus Christ. The gospel is not a complicated system, but is simple and easily understood. It may be brought into the hearts of men; it may be used in their daily lives; and if we use the simple principles of the gospel in fighting wickedness and in establishing righteousness, our course will be well set and our success will be fairly promised.

INTERNAL EVIDENCE OF THE TRUTH OF "MORMONISM" MOST CONVINCING

During the last few weeks I have been reading, with my brethren and sisters throughout the Church, the glorious book of doctrine known as the Book of Mormon, which came into the hands of the Prophet one hundred years ago. In that book we find over and over a repetition of the methods by which wickedness may be overcome; for throughout that whole book runs the great message that, in the words of Alma, wickedness or sin is never happiness. The beginning of our teaching to those who tend to depart from righteousness is that out of unrighteousness man may never win happiness, and happiness is the most fundamental and the choicest desire of humanity.

In my reading of the Book of Mormon I am always reminded that the witness of the truth of this work—restored through the instrumentality of the Prophet Joseph Smith—lies within the work itself. One does not have to go into external places for proof, since within the work itself, within its doctrines and organization lies the most convincing witness of the truth of the gospel of Jesus Christ, as restored by the Prophet Joseph Smith. The Book of Mormon itself, I have no doubt, within the next few years will be corroborated by all manner of discoveries. Men are digging in the earth; things are found that we did not dream of a few years ago. A man voiced the opinion a few days ago—a visiting Englishman—that every new discovery in American archaeology tends to confirm the truth of the Book of Mormon. We shall use such finds and discoveries for the establishment in the hearts of seekers after truth, of the correctness of the Book of Mormon. Yet, within that book itself there lies in the history it tells, in the doctrines it sets forth, and in the pictures that it paints, the most convincing evidence of its truth. I have always felt that the best approach to the gospel of Jesus Christ is through the study of the internal evidences, found within the Doctrine and Covenants and the Book of Mormon.

ETERNAL VALUE OF THE BOOK OF MORMON

There are only two kinds of books in the world. First, the kind that lasts for a day, published by the tens of thousands, but have only a momentary existence, then pass away. The other kind of books are few in number, written and produced under the inspiration of divine power; they live on throughout the ages. They are the books that contain principles of eternal truth; the doctrines that live and last, that satisfy the needs of humanity irrespective of time and age. They become the permanent possession of mankind and shape the destinies of mankind. In the Book of Mormon we have just such a book, one which contains those eternal, true principles, that may be read upon all occasions, in all emergencies and in all ages. It belongs with the Bible to the class of everlasting writings. The religious classics of the world have survived the centuries, and have influenced the destinies of mankind, because they contain perhaps a grain here and a grain there of such eternal truth. The Book of Mormon does not deal with trivial things,—the battles and contests, the conquests of the enemy and the treaties made, the many difficulties of history, form merely a background against which the principles that really make the book are illustrated. The teachings of the Book of Mormon appear against a narrative of historical events, but the events are of little consequence in comparison with the lessons that are taught for man's guidance in any day.

KEYS TO SOLVE OUR PRESENT PROBLEMS

Keys to the solution of the difficult problems that were discussed this morning—none more difficult in the course of history—are found in the Book of Mormon in a few simple teachings that are presented over and over again. First, there is constant teaching against atheism and all unbelief, and for belief in the existence of God and his son Jesus Christ, and that a definite plan has been proposed by God our heavenly Father, for the salvation of his children. I am not so certain but that today the most dangerous enemy to truth is the feeling on the part of some men that they must dedicate their strength to destroy faith in God. Within the last two years, one of the great states of the Union has authorized by law the formation of an association for the advancement of atheism, an organization apparently supplied with ample funds, formed for the purpose of proving to the American nation that there is no God. We cannot solve our social or economic problems except upon the basis of faith in the existence of God and man's relationship to his Father in heaven. Therefore, we do not hesitate, as a people, to teach all the world faith in God, which by this time should be so much a part of man as the blood and bone and marrow of his physical organism. Out of the pages of Nephite days comes also the lesson that men dwindle in unbelief and become wicked and practice evil if they allow themselves to become unequal in their social and economic relationships. This is a land of liberty, yet we are beginning, though we are founded upon the doctrine of equality, to have classes of the wealthy, the learned, the powerful, and of those who have neither power nor wealth nor station. This Church teaches the equality of humanity, that that Lord loves all his children equally, if they but do his will; that he reaches out for us all, and that the glorious destiny of a place near him is for all if we only make use of that which he has offered us. In this marvelous book there is a third warning, already discussed here. When men begin to defy the laws of the land and the laws of God—usually two aspects of the same inclination—when lawlessness grows and increases, then men and women begin to depart from the truth. Some will call themselves better than others in their own estimation; their faith in God diminishes; soon they are overwhelmed by the difficulties that of necessity come to the disobedient, and ultimately they will receive the terrible punishment quoted this morning by Brother Roberts from the Book of Mormon.

TESTIMONY

I bear testimony to you, my brethren and sisters, that I know the Gospel of Jesus Christ is true. It is dear to me. It has helped me in times of joy and in times of sorrow. It has been like a great beacon light to guide me in all the affairs of my life, not merely in the Church, but in those beyond the Church, in matters of State and of private concern. I have found it possible to use the simple principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ for my upbuilding and strengthening, for bringing me into closer communion with the great unseen universe which, after all, is the great concern of everlasting life. I am grateful for the gospel of Jesus Christ. I am always thankful that missionaries were sent into my native land; grateful that my mother, throbbing with faith, had courage to receive the gospel and go into the waters of baptism, to leave her home and friends and relatives, and all her loved ones. I am grateful for the thousands of Latter-day Saints who have done likewise, who, either in person or by their children, make up this vast congregation. We are children of faithful and courageous parents, who have opened the door to us, and made clear to us the joy of accepting and living the eternal truth of God. This Church is the bearer of truth. God bless us, and make us steadfast in the truth. May we walk always according to our best light before our Father in heaven, I pray, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

In calling upon the Presidents of our United States missions, we would be very pleased to have them speak briefly and give us a little account of the condition of their missions. Inasmuch as we have over two thousand of our people in the mission field I am sure the Saints would be deeply interested in knowing the condition of the missions. We will ask Brother Rey L. Pratt to be the first mission president to speak;

ELDER REY L. PRATT

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the Mexican Mission

I am happy, my brethren and sisters, to be in attendance at this conference, and to report the condition of the mission over which I have been called to preside. In the first place, I am happy to say to the fathers and mothers of the missionaries in the Mexican mission that they are all enjoying at the present time good health; they are in splendid spirits. They manifest a determination to fill their mission in honor and to reach with their testimonies and teachings as many of our Father's children as lie in their power.

You, my brethren and sisters, undoubtedly are acquainted with the fact that due to the present religious controversy in Mexico, and existing laws, it is impossible for our ministers or missionaries who are of foreign birth, that is, not Mexican citizens, to labor and officiate within the Republic of Mexico. Consequently we have been obliged to withdraw from that land all of our active missionaries from Zion. We are happy, however, in the fact that our local priesthood in some twenty odd branches in the Republic of Mexico are doing all that is possible to maintain the organizations of the branches, and to continue the holding of meetings and the administration of the gospel among that people. Notwithstanding the adverse circumstances existing in that country at this time, and the fact that so many missionaries, about 60 per cent of the force that we ordinarily have, have been withdrawn, the people are doing remarkably well. They are faithful in attendance at meetings, and in payment of tithing. We are in constant communication with them by letter, and their leaders manifest to us not only a belief in the principles of the gospel, but a knowledge that these principles are true. They pray for the return of the missionaries to that land, and a continuation of the preaching of the gospel among their people.

It may be a revelation to some of you to know that there are great communities of Lamanite people of Mexican nationality, residing in the large cities of the south and southwestern parts of our country. In the city of Los Angeles alone it is estimated that there are between fifty and seventy-five thousand Mexican people living in sections of the city pretty much by themselves. In that city we have a remarkable work started and are making great progress. Your boys and girls who are down there in that mission are happy to be engaged in that work and find no difficulty in confining their labors to a people who speak a foreign language. They have acquired the language with remarkable success, and success is attending their labors. The same might be said in relation to other cities along the border. We have missionaries in Mesa, Arizona, in Ray and other places around the great mining parts of Arizona. We have missionaries in Tucson; we have missionaries in Bisbee, and Douglas, also in Albuquerque and southern Colorado. They are doing a splendid work in El Paso, Texas. We have missionaries in Del Rio, San Antonio, Houston, Corpus Christi, Eagle Pass, Laredo, and Brownsville, all in Texas. At a recent conference held in the southeastern part of our mission at Laredo, at which Elder Joseph Fielding Smith, of the Council of Twelve, was present, we were able to preach to a congregation of some two hundred and twenty people at some of our sessions. I remember to have gone to the same city only a few years ago, at which time I surveyed the situation, and there was not so much as one who had any sympathy for us within the confines of that city or surrounding country. I am proud to be identified with the missionary work there. I am proud of the young men and the young women who comprise our missionary force. I love the work of the Lord. I bear you my testimony that the gospel is true.

And, my brethren and sisters, as I stand before you this afternoon, I make a plea for tolerance for the Lamanite people; they are our Father's covenant children. I have learned it more intimately than I ever knew it before, in the last twenty-one years of consecutive missionary service among them. I was acquainted with them years before that, and, notwithstanding all that is said to the contrary in the press and by people who might think very lightly before they speak, I have never been injured at their hands, nor have any of your boys or girls been injured at their hands. And although it may seem paradoxical to send a lady missionary among people who are so maligned, and expect her to get away unhurt, the chivalry of the Indians, spoken of by President Ivins this morning, is a safeguard even to your daughters, and you need not fear for them even among the people of Mexico or the Lamanite people. There are underlying reasons why they fight, and I want to tell you that if I were suffering as they have suffered for four hundred years, I would be ashamed if I did not fight as they fight. There is wrong, of course, in the country, and it would take a long time to explain it to the satisfaction of the people as I understand it. I pray God that he will right the wrongs of that oppressed people, and that freedom and liberty and right and justice may come to them. I bespeak for them your sympathy and your love. Brethren and sisters, in the name of consistency, let us give them credit for being what they are, because through their fathers we truly have this great volume of scripture, this New Witness for God, the Book of Mormon, and it is replete with promises to them of a redemption, and an uplift from the conditions under which they labor. I lament, perhaps as much as anyone, the existing conditions in the Republic of Mexico, and all I can do is to pray that right will triumph. I firmly believe that it will, and I wish that we could extend to them sympathy and the right kind of help which is not always condemnation.

May the Lord help us to see the right and to do it, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER CHAS. A. CALLIS

President of the Southern States Mission

Brethren and sisters: When Elder David O. McKay was speaking this morning of the two thousand young Lamanites and their splendid mothers, I was led to reflect that in the Southern States mission there are young men and women who have these same qualities, and their fathers and mothers have the same devotion, and give the same counsel as did those noble Lamanite mothers. Today our elders go forth to encounter dangers that are more fatal, in a way, than the sword. These mothers in Zion are giving their children wonderful and soul-saving counsel that enables them to battle, with faith and in the might of God, the evils in the world.

One day during the summer, while attending a conference in the most southerly part of the mission, I offered the elders a week's rest because of the intense heat. I was a little surprised at the unwelcome spirit in which my offer was received. The district president spoke up and said: "Brother Callis, we would rather keep on working. We have the spirit of our work, and are afraid that we would lose it if we took a vacation." That is the spirit of the missionaries in the South. Deeply imbedded in their hearts is the glorious truth contained in the Book of Mormon, that when ye are in the service of your fellow-men, ye are in the service of your God.

Through the kindness of the First Presidency an extensive building program is being carried on. We are going to build a new chapel for the Catawba Indians. Never among any people have I witnessed more faith than among these people. The president of the branch certainly does not believe in race suicide, because he is the father of twenty-one children. We have built a neat little chapel for the Choctaw Indians, and these people are receiving the gospel with joy. What a wonderful change is coming over the spirit of the people! I suppose you will be inclined to wonder at the statement that fully 10 per cent of the missionaries in the South—and this is a conservative estimate—are the descendants of men and women who obeyed the gospel in the Southern states and migrated to the West. This is one proof of the vitality of "Mormonism."

Only a few weeks ago we held a conference up in the mountains of East Tennessee. There were twenty-three members of the Church, including the elders, and from eight hundred to a thousand people, non-members, in attendance at our conference. There was not a note of discord—peace, good will, tolerance, prevailed. For this change I praise the Lord. I do not forget the labors of the elders in the early history of that mission, who suffered much tribulation to establish the foundation upon which we are now building.

Consider the sterling qualities of these young men. It has been my sad duty to go to more than one of them and say: "My brother, I have received the sad news that your mother, or your father, is dead." These young men have wept, they have sorrowed, but the noble resolution in them to continue in their mission was unshaken, and in the strength of God they have gone ahead with their missionary labors. Fathers and mothers have said: "Our crops are a partial failure, but we are willing to continue to sacrifice to keep our sons in the mission field." Where would you go to find nobler faith than this? And this faith comes from a belief in the Book of Mormon and the other standard Church works, and in the restored gospel. Surely such faith as that cannot be justly characterized as a base faith. I want to say to you parents that God will bless you for the sacrifice you are making to keep your sons and your daughters in the mission field. It is sacred in his sight, and you will share in the joy and the glory that comes to your sons and daughters through bringing souls unto God. I love the missionaries. It is an inspiration to be with them. I love their parents, the faith, and the Church which is the mother of men, for producing these fine characters and instilling in their hearts that unwavering faith that sends them into the mission field in the spirit of sacrifice and service, to proclaim the everlasting gospel to the world.

I bear you my testimony that this gospel is the power of God unto salvation, that this Church is built upon the foundation of apostles and prophets; that it is being led today by divine revelation, and that these young men and young women in the mission field enjoy the spirit of inspiration to help them in the districts where they labor, and God is with them. This is my testimony, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER SAMUEL O. BENNION

President of the Central States Mission

I take great pleasure, my brethren and sisters, in reporting to you the condition of the Central States, as far as our missionary work is concerned. I think no father or mother need have any fear concerning his or her sons or daughters who are engaged in this labor, for I doubt if there is any institution of learning in the country that will broaden and develop a young man or young woman more, or give them an experience that will compare with that obtained in the mission field.

Our missionaries are active; young men and young women, going out with scarcely any experience, get right into the work with as much faith as you could expect them to have. My testimony to you is that the work of the Lord is growing in the hearts of the children of men, that the youth of Zion are not weakening by any means, but that they are growing stronger. We have some missionaries in the field without money and some with money. They are splendid young people and are not afraid of work. They go from early in the morning until late at night. We do not have to urge them, but sometimes have to call a halt, especially among women missionaries who are so interested in their labors that they often work harder than their strength allows. But after all, they stand the test and seem to hold up their part of the work as favorably as the elders do, and frequently can go where an elder cannot go. They have many conversations among their own sex.

Latter-day Saints are found in every nook and corner, almost, of the Central States mission—from Brownsville, Texas, to the northern part of Missouri, and from Louisiana almost to El Paso, Texas—six states. Little organizations are found almost in every county, and in many of the great cities. We ask the elders to hold meetings once a day if they possibly can, and that no night shall pass without their being in a cottage meeting, if possible, or in a street meeting, or in some of the halls or churches of that mission. Let me say again that nothing finer than the spirit of those young people can be found anywhere in the world. They are faithful and true to their calling every day. They are not concerned with temporal matters, consequently they grow rich spiritually, and as a result of their time in the field, they become well acquainted with the gospel. I take great pleasure in saying to you, my brethren and sisters, that there has not come to me in my life any other joy or pleasure that has compared with this missionary labor.

I know that the Latter-day Saints at home are doing a great work. Our work could not be done without the parents who sustain us in the mission field; unless we are all united there cannot be success. I say to the missionaries frequently: Brethren and sisters, you ought to do well, every father and mother, brother and sister and little child is praying for you daily, that you may be successful in the mission field, that the Lord will preserve you and that you may be able to reach the hearts of the children of men.

We do not have enough missionaries. There are thousands of men and women who have not heard the gospel, and who will never hear it unless we are able to reach them in some other way than by the present method. I do not know how it can be done unless through the radio, but there are hundreds and thousands of young men and young women growing to manhood and womanhood in the Central states, who have never seen a "Mormon" missionary. A way to reach them the Lord undoubtedly will arrange; I know that he is at the helm. I am as sure as that I stand before you today that our Father who appeared to the Prophet Joseph Smith in the state of New York, in that Sacred Grove, and introduced his Son Jesus Christ, has never been very far away from the Church, and that Jesus Christ, the Son of the Living God, who appeared to the Prophet Joseph, has honored this Church and organized the destinies of it, and speaks through its leaders. I am just as sure of that as I am that I live. I want to go on record before the world in my testimony that the Lord lives, that Jesus is the Christ, that he is with the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and that his work is growing in the earth and will continue to grow until the time comes for him to call a halt and say enough. No one knows when that time will be, excepting him who governs and rules and guides the destinies of the children of men according to their works. We have friends as well as enemies, but the Church does have many friends in the mission field among those who are not members of it.

We have had the opportunity this year of building three churches. President Grant was in our mission a short time ago and dedicated three buildings in the state of Missouri.

We are celebrating at Independence, Missouri, this week, the centennial of that city. It has been one hundred years since Independence was made a village. This Church is taking its part in the pageant, in the parade, in the contributions, in the printing and everything that is being done. We have been accorded all that is due us, and I take great pleasure in saying to you that the Church has many friends in that section of the country, and the Spirit of the Lord is moving upon the hearts of the children of men, and his work will be accomplished in his own due time.

I pray the Lord to bless us that we may honor his name continually. I pray for those who are not of us, that they may listen to the elders who happen to come to their doors, and be led to glorify the Lord's name through baptism by his servants, and I do it in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER JOHN H. TAYLOR

President of the Northern States Mission

As I came onto the grounds to attend the meeting this afternoon, I met about a half dozen missionaries who had just returned from the Northern States mission. I observed them as they stood on the sidewalk, and thought, How splendidly these young fellows have developed in the mission field. They are a clean-looking set of fellows. They have done a remarkable work out in the world. Most of them have been district presidents; and, because of the summer work, they remained in the mission field longer than the usual time in order that they might take their missionaries out into the country and show them the advantages of traveling without purse or scrip, and placing their full reliance in God the eternal Father. I am grateful for the mission, because it results in wonderful progress with the missionaries; and while some of our boys and girls may come into the field in the spirit of adventure, may think that it is the usual thing for boys and girls to do, I am quite certain and can bear testimony that they are not very long in the mission field before they realize the necessity of getting close to God the eternal Father, and of giving service in the great cause to which they have been called. Our missionaries are faithful, and they are doing a good work in traveling among the people.

We have just finished our country campaign, and the missionaries have returned to their districts for the winter with the testimony that God has been with them and has blessed them wherever they have been. I sent a questionnaire to the missionaries to be answered and returned by them. One of the questions was: "How many times did you have to sleep out because of not receiving entertainment from the people?" It is remarkable how few times the missionaries have had to sleep out during the country campaign. Their testimony has been that God has been good to them, and they came back with joy and happiness in their hearts because of God's mercy to them.

The missionaries, on their return home, make the statement that the time spent on a mission was the best time of their lives, and often the younger people who had not had a similar experience might question the statement. But if they should have the same experience I am quite certain they would come back with the same testimony, that missionary life has been the best time of their lives. They do not mean good times, like we might have at parties; they do not mean the good times that they might have at school; they do not mean that it has been a happier time than the very happy life that they have had in the home, which is the most sacred place the boy and girl can be; but when they say that it has been the happiest time of their lives they mean that they have been closer to God the eternal Father than they have ever been before. It is because of service, it is because of doing things for God and his Son Jesus Christ that there comes into their souls that humility, that testimony, and that joy that is superior to all other joys that can come into one's life.

We are very grateful to have in the Northern states mission such a splendid group of students as are attending the various universities located in Chicago and the surrounding cities. They are keeping their faith. We are proud of them because they can still find time—the majority of them—to come to Church and partake of the sacrament and attend the Sabbath school, that they may have their spirits renewed for the studies of the week. They are a wonderful help to the Church wherever they are, because of the strength of their testimony and their desire to be of service in the mission field while they are attending school. Our boys and girls who are in the Universities have things brought to their attention that might make them wonder at times, or might make them think deeper and cause them to search deeper into the religion of God the eternal Father, and “Mormonism” as you search into it, gives an answer to most of the problems that come to the student or to the missionary. When they encounter a problem that cannot yet be solved to their satisfaction, they hold on to the faith of their fathers and their mothers, and are willing to serve God and wait until the time comes when the question can be answered by study and by the revelations of God.

We are happy because of the Saints of the Northern states mission, because of their faithfulness and devotion to God's work. They are willing to go out on the street corner and give service and proclaim the gospel. I am sure God will bless them because of their devotion and desire to be of service in his great work in the mission field.

May God bless this great work, and strengthen the missionaries as they go out into the field. May he bring them home, as these young fellows to whom I have referred have been brought home, clean and fine, and above all, with a testimony of the truthfulness of the restored gospel of Jesus Christ, in his prayer, in his name. Amen.

ELDER JOHN M. KNIGHT*President of the Western States Mission*

My brethren and sisters: It is a privilege to be present on this occasion and make a report of the work in the Western states mission. Conditions in all of the missions of the United States are quite similar, and all that has been said by the mission presidents who have spoken is equally true of the missionaries laboring in our mission. No finer group of young men and young woman can be found anywhere in the world. They are men and women of integrity and faith; loyal and true to the covenants that they have made with God, undaunted and unafraid they carry the gospel message to the people, manifesting in their lives the faith which has come to them through their obedience to the gospel and the call made of them to proclaim the message of salvation to the people of the world. The burden of their message is that God has spoken again to the world through a modern prophet. They have testified that God lives, that Jesus Christ is in reality the Son of the living God, the Redeemer of the world. They have borne witness to the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith and the re-estabishment of the gospel of Jesus Christ in the nineteenth century. We affirm that Joseph Smith came in the hour of the world's greatest need and was the instrument in the hands of God of restoring to the world the authority of the holy priesthood which gave to men the right to act in the name of God and reveals every principle and ordinance necessary to the complete salvation of the human soul.

We have laid down the gauntlet and declared that God is no respecter of persons, that all men who repent of their sins and yield obedience to the ordinance of baptism and the laying on of hands for the gift of the Holy Ghost shall know of the doctrine whether it is of God or man. Hundreds have accepted the challenge and bear witness that they know the gospel, as we teach it, is true and the very power of God unto salvation, that doubt has been removed from their souls and a peace and joy they have never known before have come into their lives. I am happy to report that all of the missionaries without exception are rendering meritorious service.

The attitude of the people in the Western states mission towards our work is very much changed since first I went into that district to labor as a missionary—we are received in many places with open arms where a few years ago we could not get a hearing. Elders have been accorded the privileges of preaching in many churches and invitations have been extended to present our message before some of the theological schools of our district. The press has been very friendly and accorded us much space in advertising our work. Many of the missionaries have traveled in the country districts without purse or scrip and have reported some wonderful and unusual experiences. I would relate just one circumstance: two of the elders laboring in the Denver district reported that while traveling without purse or scrip about one hundred miles east of the city, they sought entertainment for the night at quite a late hour. They were invited into a home. The man and his wife were the only members of the family and they had but one bed. These good people insisted that the elders should sleep in the bed while they slept upon the floor. The man who had thus entertained them was a protestant minister. He showed a real Christian spirit. Such entertainment is not usually accorded our missionaries. I am very grateful for the measure of success that is attending our efforts. The missionaries are imbued with the spirit of their work. They love it, and their greatest desire is that the people of the world might be impressed by their message.

It is true that some of our missionaries are illy prepared when they come into the missions, but it requires only a short time until they are able to present the gospel message to all with whom they come in contact.

I was impressed with the counsel given by the President this morning advising the Saints to search the scriptures, to read the Bible, The Book of Mormon, and become familiar with the revelations given to the Church through the Prophet Joseph Smith. If this is done in the homes, our missionaries will be better prepared to give a reason for the hope that is within them when they arrive in the mission.

We are making some progress in providing comfortable places for our members in which to worship. At the present time we are building two meetinghouses and one recreation hall. We have also purchased one chapel this year.

I feel that I need not say more. I am happy to be engaged in this work. I know that it is of God. I bear testimony to its truth, and the influence that it is having upon the lives of men and women in the world is for good. God grant unto us the spirit of this work, that we may go forward in the performance of every duty that he requires at our hands, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN G. ALLRED

President of the Northcentral States Mission

My brethren and sisters: I prize highly my standing among this people. I would rather have my standing in this Church than all the gold of Ophir. I would rather be where I am now, laboring in the ministry of our Lord, than in any other place that I know of. To labor with these young men and young women, to meet them in their weakness, when they arrive in the field, and then to watch them grow and increase in their power, is an inspiration that you cannot get anywhere else in the world. They undergo a wonderful transformation and a steady, constant growth. Some of the young men and young women who come into the field do not have a testimony of the gospel, but within a few short months they stand before the congregations of the world and bear witness, out of the abundance of their hearts, that they know the gospel of Jesus Christ is true.

Not so long ago at the close of one of our conferences, a young lady missionary only nineteen years of age who had just arrived in the field came back into the building as I left it. I found her weeping, and asked her what was the matter. She said: "Brother Allred, I do not believe that I can do this work. I just feel that I cannot do it." After talking with her a few moments, I laid my hands upon her head and blessed her and promised her that if she would put her attention to the work and trust in God, that God's power would come into her soul until her heart would be overflowing with a testimony of the work of God. Three weeks later I happened to be in that same district again, and I met this same girl standing on a street corner, bearing witness to the people that she knew the gospel as restored is true. In talking with her, she said: "Brother Allred, I have had more glory in the last three weeks than I have had before in all my life put together." What is the change which gives this joy? Where is the strength of this Church? Is it with these brethren on the stand? no. I will tell you, the strength of this Church lies in the testimony that God implants in the hearts of its members, and once that testimony is implanted in the heart of a boy or girl he or she will go through fire for the religion that they are preaching in the world.

Not long ago we sent two young elders, at the beginning of this summer's work, into a country district. One of them was from San Francisco and the other from Alberta, Canada. One was nineteen years old and the other twenty. They began their work in a certain county, and five preachers in that county, when they saw the activities of these elders, decided that they ought to hold some anti-"Mormon" meetings. So they called these meetings together, and five of them sat on the stand. They sent to Chicago for an anti-"Mormon" lecturer who had labored in Utah, and who knew all about the "Mormons." He came, and they held a meeting. They actually asked the sheriff of the county to come and sit close to the front where he could take care of these two "Mormon" boys, lest they do someone bodily harm. The preachers held three anti-"Mormon" meetings, and the boys followed after them. One man told me afterwards that the dignity of these young men, the spirit that accompanied their talks, the power that was behind them, convinced him that they were not what these preachers said they were. And afterwards that man and all his family joined the Church. When these two elders were asked to take this country trip they did not want to go, they said that they had made a lot of friends where they were, and they thought they ought to follow up what they had been doing. They said to the district President: "You are taking us away and putting two elders in our places, and we do not want to go. We would rather stay here." As they talked this matter over in their meeting, the president of the district arose and said: "I prophesy, in the name of the Lord, that if you will take this trip, as you have been called to do, you shall have more friends where you go than you have ever had here. You shall heal the sick in every direction in which you travel, and the very elements shall be' subject to you." These two boys went out and came back and testified that the Lord had healed the sick wherever they had gone, that the very elements had been subject to them, that they had commanded the elements to be still when they interfered with their meetings, and the elements had been stilled. I tell you people, there is a power in this Church which the world must yet recognize. I am wondering what the answer of the world would be if we were to ask them today, Whence comes this power? How can we get these young men and young women to go out into the world and devote their attention to this work, and how is it that they make such growth?

Not long ago we received a wire from Port William, Ontario, Canada. A family living there said that they had lost three of their children by drowning in the river, and for us to come at once. The preachers of the town said: "These 'Mormon' elders will never travel four hundred miles to attend a funeral service. You might just as well let us hold it." The Saints replied: "The elders will come if there is a possibility of their doing so." When we got to the place we found that they had arranged for the funeral service to be held in a little chapel. Twenty minutes before the time for the service to commence, we went to the chapel and found it crowded, and hundreds of people were there who could not obtain entrance. I said to Elder Jones, the presiding elder, "We will have to find a different place in which to meet." We went down the street a block where a funeral service was being held in a church, and we requested of the preacher the privilege of holding our services in his church. "Well," he said, "I will see the elders." He conferred with the elders and came back in a few minutes and said that he felt he could not allow us to meet in his building. We went back. Just across the road from the undertaker's parlor was the city hall, and in this hall was a large auditorium. We asked the mayor over the phone if we could not hold our service there. He said: "We have refused, four times in succession, to allow your elders the use of that hall." We said: "We know you have, but don't you think that under the conditions you ought to open the hall and let us hold a funeral service there?" Then he said: "I think possibly we could."

"How many people will your hall hold?"

"Six hundred."

We carried the caskets across the road into this hall and in ten minutes every seat was taken. As we had five preachers, the mayor, and the Salvation army captain, sitting on the stand with us, my soul went out in prayer to God that he would magnify us that we might be able to make these people, who were in mourning, wipe away their tears and look up and not down, forward and not back, and that we might also be able to let the people of that city who had been so prejudiced that they had never heard the voice of a "Mormon" elder, know what the doctrines and teachings of the Church of Jesus Christ and our conceptions of life and the world to come, really are. When it was all over we found that we had made, not one friend, not one family of friends, but that we had made scores of friends. One man said to his wife when he went home: "You are all the time asking me to go to church and hear the preacher. If you will get a preacher in our church like those elders I will go every Sunday." Another man said: "I do not know what it is in this 'Mormon' Church, but it is remarkable that these elders can come up here and make these people wipe away their tears and influence them in such a way that they can go to the cemetery and lay away three of their children at the same time and not weep. Our preachers cannot do it, but these elders of the 'Mormon' Church have done it."

I want to say to you today that the gospel of Jesus Christ will meet every human need, and it will meet it fully and completely, for this is God's work, it is not the work of man. I bear witness to this fact today, with all the earnestness of my soul, and I testify that he will carry it through successfully to the end.

We are grateful for those very splendid young men and young women who come to our mission who will face any kind of cold weather—and we have a lot of it up there—to preach the gospel. They are going into the homes of the people. The doors are being opened in such numerous instances that we are not able to take care of them all. We need more elders, and we need them to come out into the field like those who are there.

Let me say to you in closing, you fathers and mothers who have girls in the mission field: Do not fear for them while they are there. Let your fears begin when they return home to the body of the Church and throw off the harness of responsibility. Those boys and girls, while they are engaged in the ministry, are growing every hour, and the longer they stay the faster they grow.

May God bless this work at home and abroad, that men and women, holding responsibility in it, may be endowed with the spirit of their office and calling, that we may work day and night for the furtherance of the purposes of God, and that his purposes might be accomplished and his will prevail on earth as it does in heaven, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER HENRY H. ROLAPP

President of the Eastern States Mission

My brethren and sisters: As I stood before this conference six months ago, after having been called to preside over the Eastern states mission, I had very little conception of the influence which that mission would have upon my life. In the East we have some thirty-four million people to approach, or seventy or eighty times as many as there are in this state. We have only a comparatively few missionaries to do the work. I went through that mission with Brother Ballard, of the Twelve. He was there with me for twenty-three days. He spoke every day. He made thirty-six talks in the twenty-three days that he was with us, and the wonderful results that came from those meetings, each of which was attended by a great many investigators, are simply marvelous. He was with us in June, and possibly a few days in July. During the months of July and August ninety-nine new converts were baptized into the Church of Christ. We have not been able to keep it up in September. I have just received a telegram to the effect that we had only twenty-one baptisms during September, sixteen of whom were converts.

I feel thankful to the Lord that we had a member of the Twelve with us in that great mission. I am also certain that we do not understand the Eastern states. I know that I did not. I had been in New York not less than twice every year for twenty or twenty-five years, but I did not understand it. There is more distinct evidence of prejudice against the Latter-day Saints in the Eastern states than anywhere else that I can conceive of. We cannot get at them, comparatively speaking. It is difficult in a city of eight or nine millions of people to reach a great many, but we go from door to door and we are reaching some of them. If some of the authorities could stay in the larger cities and communities in the East, from Vermont and New Hampshire down to West Virginia—all of the states lying along the Atlantic coast belonging to the Eastern states mission—if they could stay there a little more and not just go there on a short trip, but do as Brother Ballard did (some of the other apostles no doubt have done the same), and realize the possibilities of that mission, I believe that a whole lot of good could be done.

So far as our missionaries are concerned, I must confess that I did not believe it possible that young men and women whom I knew who went into the Eastern states or any other mission, with the limited knowledge and experience they possessed, could obtain the strength of testimony that they do. But I say to you that 95 per cent of the missionaries who are in the Eastern states sincerely believe all that they tell about the Book of Mormon and about the "Mormon" religion. They have become thoroughly aroused to the fact that they are engaged in the service of God. So far as I know, not a single one of our missionaries is sick. They are all anxious to work, and it is their greatest desire to stay fully two years in the mission. A lady missionary whom I released a little before her time was up, telegraphed me the other day that she would like to find out what was the matter, she wanted to stay her full time. I wired back to her and explained why she should be released. But that is the spirit, and that is the good feeling that there is in the Eastern states mission.

I am very much more gratified today about being called as a missionary in the Church of Christ than I was six months ago. I was rather fearful that the many other things I had done in my lifetime were so different from going into the missionary field, that my attention would be distracted from the work that ought to be done; but the Lord has been with me and I feel that there is not any other thing that interests me in the least so long as I am in New York and doing this work. I have traveled all over the mission now. I have been over two-thirds of the mission the second time and expect to spend all of my time in getting around among the Saints. Let me say to you here that I am not trying to preach the gospel to the Saints. The missionaries, your boys and girls, are doing that. I cannot preach very much. I say a few words at the end of the meeting, but after such meetings I sit down with the missionary elders and sisters, and we hold a two or three hours' meeting. We do not get up on our feet and talk to one another, but we sit around the table and discuss the situation. I think we have all come to the conclusion that we are all serving the same Master, that we have but one thing to do and that is to see that more people get a knowledge of the truth. I have taken the elders away from the Saints, very largely. I think that they are needed to preach the gospel to those who have not heard it. I have said to the local priesthood in the branches, you take care of the Saints and let the elders preach the gospel. We have had remarkable success in a majority of the branches. I hope to have more success. I hope that we may have a still better year this year than last. Last year was the banner year of the mission. There were two hundred and nineteen converts last year. In the first nine months we baptized one hundred and eighty-three new converts, and we will do better than last year before this year is ended. We are paying comparatively more tithing in the East than you are at home. We are doing wonderful things with the people that are living there. So, no doubt, are all other missionaries.

I feel grateful for the privilege of laboring in the mission. Let me just ask you one thing. There are hundreds of you who have relatives and friends in the East or in other missions. Why don't you write to the elder who presides in the mission where your friend lives, and say to him: "I have a friend, Mr. John A. Jones, living in such a street and such a town?" and we will ascertain the rest. We will approach them right. We will not try to convert them, we will just go and call on them and try to continue calling on them until we get them interested in the gospel. But we would like to have you help us to the extent of giving us the addresses. Merely John A. Jones, New York, doesn't mean a thing. We have tried it, and can't do a thing with them. But give us John A. Jones, 212 Olive street, New York, and they will be visited. We need you, we are relying upon you. The more than eighty missionaries who are laboring in the Eastern states are the ones who are telling them about the gospel of Christ, as you are living it, and we hope that there may be some success come from their efforts.

I testify to you, as I have done to the people in the East, that the gospel of Christ has been restored. That was an old story with me. I am more than ever confirmed in it, and I proclaim it to the people with whom I come in contact. God bless the Saints at home. It is gratifying to have an opportunity to stand before them occasionally and tell them what we are doing, because that is really what is interesting.

God bless you all is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER WM. R. SLOAN

President of the Northwestern States Mission

I am extremely happy, my brethren and sisters and friends, to report the condition of the Northwestern states mission: When I report the condition of the mission and my feelings, I want to associate with myself my good companion and wife, who is a big factor in what little degree of success we have attained this year. We are immensely happy in our labors, and we have been working together, trying with the help of the Lord to further his great work in the earth. We have a great field in which to labor, covering a tremendous area of country, but our population is nowhere as numerous as President Henry H. Rolapp reports in the Eastern states.

In the past ten months I have traveled over twenty-five thousand miles visiting the Saints and friends of the Northwestern states mission, and I am very happy to report a wonderful spirit of cordiality is now extended to us in that section, by the press. The freedom of the press and the way in which the newspapers voluntarily write articles about the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints is indeed gratifying to us, and at no time do we ask for favors but that those favors are granted.

We have seven thousand members of the Church residing in that mission. We have thirty-seven branches, fifty-three Sunday schools, seventy Primaries, twenty-four Relief Society organizations, and seventy-four missionaries now laboring in the field. We could use many times seventy-four missionaries had we them to use. At the present time in our Primary work we have recently organized, in the city of Seattle, a Primary in the Orphans' Home. This is a sectarian orphanage. In this Primary organization we have one hundred thirty-five children. We met with the Board of Governors and the matron of that institution and laid our plans before them and asked for the privilege of organizing a Primary, giving them to understand that we are members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. They asked us to come and hold a class. The class was held. The children were divided into their groups, just as you would organize them here at home, and at the close, in the presence of the governing body of that institution, they came and said: "Can you not occupy at least one hour each day with such work as this?" We have three other Orphans' Homes in Seattle that are open to us, but we have only four little missionary girls to take care of that work, and with our numerous other duties we are handicapped. We are not even attempting to organize primaries in those homes until the time comes when we can get reinforcements. We are happy to tell you that the Presidency have listened to our plea and will send to us eight or ten young women in the immediate future who will constitute the reinforcements necessary, and then we will proceed at once to organize other Primaries. We have four young ladies laboring in Tacoma. They have seven primaries there to take care of, or a Primary every day of the week. So I could go on indefinitely, telling you of this work.

¹ We have today in this audience, I am quite sure, one of our young missionaries who has just been released after serving twenty-eight months in the mission field. Last spring he and his companion were laboring in Olympia, Washington, on the Pacific coast. I said: "Elder, I want you and your companion to go over into Montana. You take the highway and travel without purse or scrip. I don't want you to ask for a ride during your entire journey. Travel as if you had a destination in view and you will have plenty of opportunities to ride." The first day they rode over a hundred miles in an automobile, and at the close of the day, as they were leaving him, the gentleman with whom they were riding put his hand into his pocket and gave them four dollars and forty-three cents, and said: "Boys, I don't want you to go hungry." The next day another gentleman picked them up, gave them a ride of a hundred and seventy-five miles. His father-in-law, who happened to be in the car with them, a little man, was very quiet and had nothing to say all day, but had listened to the conversation. Towards evening, he said: "Boys, I remember many years ago meeting two 'Mormon' missionaries, away back in my old home town, the city of Carthage, Illinois. I do not remember what those men preached about, but I do remember the words of one of the songs they sang." And, by the way, we sang that hymn for our opening song this afternoon. He said: "I cannot remember all the words, but part of the words of that hymn were these: 'Do what is right, let the consequence follow.'" The Elders opened their grips and took therefrom a little pamphlet hymn-book and sang the hymn, "Do what is right." The old gentleman sat there with his eyes bedimmed with tears, and from then on he was talkative in the extreme.

We have a young lady sitting in the congregation this afternoon who, a few months ago, held a street meeting on the streets of Tacoma, Washington, in company with her companion and the elders. At the close of the meeting, just as they dismissed, a gentleman spoke up and said, "May I say a word?" The privilege was granted him. He said: "Ladies and gentlemen, I want to say that the city of Tacoma, Washington, is honored in the presence of these young men and women representing the 'Mormon' Church. I only wish that we had more such young men and young women as they are." He was one of the representative business men of Tacoma, Washington.

And so I could go on. Our Saints are working unitedly together. We are enjoying the work. We took a caravan to the Canadian temple this summer. One hundred and ninety-three people from our mission made the trip to Cardston, traveling in automobiles the entire distance, some of them going sixteen hundred miles. The experiences of that caravan, the spiritual uplift, development and growth as a result of that trip, time will never last long enough to efface. I bear you that witness, my brethren and sisters. The treatment that we were accorded in the Canadian temple was simply wonderful.

Just one word further. I have a clipping from one of the leading newspapers of the Northwest, which I would like to read to show you the spirit of the press. In speaking of the Book of Mormon and that auspicious 22nd day of September, the writer said this. It is an editorial, by the way:

"While Messrs. Dempsey and Tunney are pummeling each other for a million dollars or so at Chicago Thursday night, a scene quite different will be unfolded through Utah on that occasion.

"On the 22nd day of September, 1927, it will be one hundred years since the Angel Moroni delivered to the prophet, Joseph Smith, the gold plates which had been deposited for centuries in the Hill Cumorah, near Palmyra, New York, from which plates the Book of Mormon was translated by the gift and power of God.

"Believe it or not, as you choose. The undoubted fact remains that the 'Mormon' people have contributed vastly to the upbuilding of the west. Literally, they made the desert 'blossom like a rose.' In these days of quarreling religious sects it is worth while to point to the thrift, industry, discipline and co-operation of the 'Mormons' to show what may be accomplished by a church organization in the practical development of a commonwealth.

"'All for one and one for all,' to employ the slogan of The Three Guardsmen, has ever been their watchword.

"The other night as the train moved by the well-kept homes and ripe gardens in the outskirts of Salt Lake City, the Pullman porter who lives in Chicago, remarked: 'They still think a heap of Brigham Young in this town.'

"And well they may. Whatever may be said of the teachings of 'Mormonism,' Brigham Young was one of the ablest and most remarkable administrators and leaders of men and women ever developed in our American civilization."

In closing allow me to repeat the words of one of the poets:

"We are building every day,
In a good or evil way;
And the building, as it grows,
Shall our inmost selves disclose,
And, in every arch and line,
All our faults and failings find.

"We may build a palace grand,
Or a wreck upon the sand.
Do you ask what building this,
That can show both pain and bliss,
That can be both dark and fair?
Lo, its names is Character.

"Build it well what'er you do,
Build it straight and strong and true.
Build it clean, and high, and broad.
Build it for the eyes of God."

So I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

The congregation sang, "God moves in a mysterious way."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Hyrum G. Smith, presiding patriarch of the Church.

The conference adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m. Saturday, October 8, 1927.

SECOND DAY

MORNING MEETING

The conference continued on Saturday morning, 10 o'clock, October 8, 1927. The congregation comfortably filled the large tabernacle. President Heber J. Grant presided.

The congregation sang the hymn, "Prayer is the soul's sincere desire."

Invocation was offered by Elder David K. Udall, president of the Arizona temple.

The congregation sang, "How firm a foundation, ye Saints of the Lord."

ELDER GEORGE ALBERT SMITH

I esteem very highly the privilege of attending this conference and of listening to the instructions and testimonies that we have heard. There is in my soul a sincere gratitude for my membership in the Church of Jesus Christ. As I came down this morning, observing the sunshine, the changing tints of the foliage, and the beauties of this valley that surround us, I felt that surely the great pioneer leader made no mistake when he announced to that little band of pilgrims who had crossed the trackless plains, "This is the place!"

THE JOY OF THE WORK

I desire to be blessed by the Lord, that the thoughts voiced by me may be profitable to you. We are a small part of a great congregation that belongs to our heavenly Father. All the children in the world are his, and upon us has been laid the responsibility of delivering to them the truth, much of which has been in the world before, some of which has been lost until the gospel was restored again in this latter day. We have listened to these good men who preside over our missions, have partaken of the spirit of the mission field, and have rejoiced with them and with those who labor under them, that our heavenly Father has given to us in this latter-day the duty to perform of proclaiming his truth to the children of men. Perhaps it might appear to the outside observer that there is among the Latter-day Saints an unusual enthusiasm. As one man recently said: "It is strange to me how joyfully you people carry your work forward. It matters not whether I speak to a youth or to a mature man, to a gardener or a policeman among your people, they are all happy and satisfied and confident that they possess the gospel of Jesus Christ." Everyone should possess the spirit of the work, a spirit of love, a spirit of kindness, a spirit of charity for the weaknesses and frailties of mankind, but with a pronounced desire that the truth may be made manifest, that those who err in their lives may be led to forsake their folly and turn to the Lord our God.

- SEEK FIRST THE KINGDOM OF GOD

We believe absolutely in the admonition that was given by the Savior of the world when he said:

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all other things will be added."

Therefore, we believe that if we can establish faith in the minds of the rising generation, if we can teach the truth in such a way that our Father's children will seek him and his influence first, that this world will begin to prepare for the Millennium, when there will be joy and peace and happiness, and when our heavenly Father will establish his kingdom, into which he has invited every child of his that has been born into the world. With that understanding in our hearts, and with that feeling in our souls, is it any wonder that there is enthusiasm in our worship, that we have a disposition to be anxious to divide these glorious truths with our neighbors? Is it to be wondered at, that when the time comes that our sons are called into the mission field, or we are asked to lay aside our duties and go out as servants of the living God, endued with power from on high, possessing authority that has been conferred in this latter-day, in order that we may divide with all people this wonderful truth that has made our lives so rich, and that is preparing us to be desirable companions for all his children wherever we may find them, that we respond willingly and gladly?

OBEDIENCE AND THE SPIRIT OF UNSELFISH SERVICE NEEDED

It is this spirit of unselfish service that is needed in the world. Repentance of sin is also greatly needed by mankind. It is necessary that there be obedience to law, not only to the laws of God, but obedience to the laws of the land should be stimulated in the minds of men, if we expect this earth upon which we live to be the kind of a home that he desires us to possess. Our ministry is one of love and forbearance, and we desire to do good to all, and to assist all to understand the plan of life and salvation that the Lord revealed in this latter day. The assurance that God lives is most desirable and that knowledge may be just as fixed in the lives of the humble man and the humble woman in the ranks as it is in the lives of those who preside over us. I am not dependent upon the testimony of my brethren and my sisters by whom I am surrounded, and for whom I have an affectionate regard. And this is the testimony that I desire to leave with you, I may if I will know that God lives, that Jesus is the Christ, that he is the Redeemer of the world, and that he so loved the world that he gave his life in order that his gospel might be preached to all men.

SACRIFICE AND LABORS OF THE PROPHET JOSEPH SMITH

Joseph Smith, the prophet, who was the servant of Jesus Christ, our Lord, was given an understanding of the gospel that was taught by the Redeemer, and in our day was inspired to perfect a church organization that is recognized as the most perfect in the world.

This youth was so sure of the revelation that he had received, and was so anxious that his Father's children, all of them, should know of the truth, that from the time he received the plates of the Book of Mormon from the angel Moroni he devoted his entire life to the organization of the Church and disseminating the truth. Those chosen to carry the work forward received the holy priesthood and were prepared to carry on when the prophet said: "I go like a lamb to the slaughter, but I have a conscience void of offense toward God and all men, and it will yet be said of me, 'he died in cold blood'." So he went to his doom as he understood it, but there was burning in his soul a knowledge such as Stephen had, such as the Redeemer had, that our heavenly Father was at the helm, that it was his work that was upon the earth, that it was his power that would eventually control, that this life was but a part of eternity. He was prepared to give up a part of his earth-life, if need be, in order that he might enjoy eternally the companionship that he so sincerely loved, and the association of good men and women who have and do dwell upon the earth, and will again dwell upon the earth when it becomes the celestial kingdom. This testimony the humblest individuals of this Church may have, and know just as they know that they live, that these things are true.

THE GOSPEL THE POWER OF GOD UNTO SALVATION

This gospel of Jesus Christ is the power of God unto salvation, as the Apostle Paul declared. It is the Redeemer's work. It is the only way whereby we may attain the highest exaltation that the Savior of mankind intended that those who followed him should enjoy. I do not say that egotistically, I say it with all charity for our Father's children who belong to other churches. I say it with love for his sons and daughters who do not understand, but he has commanded that we should say this thing. It is his will that people should know. In no uncertain tone is the gospel being proclaimed among the children of men, and the message of life and salvation is being offered, without money and without price, to all our Father's children, in order that they may avail themselves of the knowledge that will prepare them for eternal life in his celestial kingdom. That is why there is rejoicing in the lives of those who keep the commandments of God.

THE CAUSE OF HAPPINESS

The happiest men and the happiest women that you know in the world are those who are conforming their lives to the teachings of the gospel of Jesus Christ. They are those who have the assurance of eternal life; they are those who understand the purpose of our being; they are those who realize that to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, means for them all that men and women can enjoy in this life or in the life that is to come.

With happiness and with thanksgiving, there departs into the world from his Church a group of men and women whose lives are devoted to proclaiming the truth. In the neighborhood of two thousand are in the world today, paying their own expenses, going from door to door, teaching what our heavenly Father has said must be known by the children of men before this world can be transformed into the kingdom of our Lord. These are your sons and daughters. After them shall go others who will carry this message forward to the honor and glory of our heavenly Father. As I have traveled to and fro in the world bearing this message, my soul has been filled with joy, and my eyes have been dimmed with tears, when I have seen how perfectly men's lives may be transformed by the gospel of Jesus Christ. I have seen those who were discouraged, those who were in darkness, those who questioned the purpose of their being, and when they have had taught to them the glorious truths of the gospel of Jesus Christ, they have changed, they have learned to be happy, to be contented, to be satisfied, to be enthusiastic in believing and teaching the gospel that was proclaimed by Jesus Christ when he dwelt upon this earth and traveled in Galilee.

THE GOSPEL MISSION PROCLAIMED IN LOVE

Brethren and sisters, the world does not understand that, but it is our mission to assist them to understand it, and it is not with egotism, it is not with arrogance, but with charity for all, with loving tenderness, that this message is sent forth. We do not say to the Presbyterians, to the Methodists, to the Baptists, to the Catholics, and those others who in their lives are striving to live the teachings of their churches, we do not say to them: "You must give up all that you have been taught, you must turn away from the truth that has been deposited with you in order that you may come into the Church of Jesus Christ." But we say to them. "Keep all that you possess. Keep all the virtues, keep all the truth, keep all the goodness that has ever come into your lives, and then permit us to share with you the additional light that our heavenly Father, in his tender mercy, has bestowed upon the children of men in our day." That is our mission to our Father's children. It is a mission of peace, of good will towards all men. It is an intense and enthusiastic desire to divide with all our Father's children the good things that he has so generously bestowed upon us; and it is with the hope that they may understand, that we go upon our bended knees, day after day, and pray that their hearts may be touched, that the spirit of God may come into their souls, that they may understand the truth as it is given unto them, and thereby make preparation for the time to come when our heavenly Father will gather those who have sought him first and who have prepared themselves thereby to be the eternal companions of Jesus Christ our Lord.

TESTIMONY AND GRATITUDE

This, my brethren and sisters, is what brings joy into our hearts.

That is why there is peace in your home and in mine. Therefore, this morning, as one of the humblest among you, I thank him with all my heart for the assurance that has come into my life, for the privileges that have been mine, for the associations that are so desirable, that I have been permitted to enjoy while I have lived here these few years upon the earth. And above all, I thank him for the knowledge that has been burned into my soul; I know that my heavenly Father lives, I know that Jesus Christ is the Savior of mankind, and that there is no other name under heaven whereby men and women may be exalted, but the name of Jesus Christ, our Lord. I do know that he came into the world in this latter day, that he bestowed divine authority upon a humble boy who was seeking the truth, and the result of that has been the organization of the Church with which we are identified; and there is with it the power of God unto salvation to all those who believe. Knowing that as I know that I live, I bear you witness of it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER J. GOLDEN KIMBALL

Of the First Council of Seventy

About the middle of September of this year I was taken by my son from San Pedro, California, to Hollywood. At that time I attended Grauman's Chinese theatre. They had printed on their program: "The Glories of the Scriptures." The screen play was "The King of Kings." The prologue was enchanting and wonderful. This screen play has not yet been released. Thousands and tens of thousands of people have gone to Hollywood to this great theatre to witness this play, the "King of Kings." The cast of great actors—they tell me they are among the great actors—represented Jesus the Christ, Mary the Mother, the Twelve Apostles, Mary Magdalene, Martha, and Mary of Bethany, Caiaphas, the Pharisee, the Scribe, Pontius Pilate, the woman taken in adultery, satan, and hundreds of other characters as found in the story of Jesus. The characterization, costumes, life and surroundings must have been true to life. At times it was thrilling and pathetic. Many who were at all spiritual were brought to tears. It was the greatest sermon of Christ's life, sorrows and sufferings, ending with his crucifixion and resurrection, that could possibly be presented, and its effects will be everlasting. To my mind it would almost immortalize Cecil B. De Mille and others.

The actors, so I am told, signed a pledge, a contract, binding upon them to live lives that would be fitting to the characters they represented, for three years, for in doing otherwise it would mar and destroy the effect and purpose of the picture.

When I returned home I read the Life of Christ by Giovanni Papini, to make clear my conception of men. I learned from this book this information:

"What manner of men were the Apostles, chosen of Christ?

"He chose them from among the Galileans; he chose them from among the poor; simple men, but of divine simplicity, transcending all philosophies. He knew these men were rough, but had integrity; were ignorant, but ardent, and that he could in the end mold them according to his desire and bring them up to his level."

"These disciples lived with Christ and were fortunate to walk, to eat with him, to sleep in the same room, to look into his face, to touch his hand, to kiss him, to hear his words from his mouth."

"We see them, hard of head and of heart, not able to understand the clearest parable of the Master; often lacking in faith, in love, in brotherly affection, eager for pay; envying each other, impatient for the revenge which would repay them for their long wait; intolerant of those who were not one with them. One of them denies him three times." They disputed among themselves to know who should have the chief place in the new kingdom. Jealous of their privileges, they denounced to Jesus one who was casting out devils in his name. Jesus said: "Forbid him not for there is no man which shall do a miracle in my name that can lightly speak evil of me. For he that is not against us is on our part." This is a hard saying; who can hear it? and they left Jesus.

Peter, James and John are the only ones who accompany Jesus into the house of Jairus and on the Mount of Transfiguration and they are the ones whom he takes with him on the night of Gethsemane. But in spite of their long intimacy with the Master, they did not acquire sufficient faith and humility.

At one time Jesus and some of his disciples started together towards Jerusalem. They were crossing Samaria and were badly received in a village. James and John said: "Lord, wilt thou that we command fire to come down from heaven and consume them." But he turned and rebuked them. It seemed in vain that they had heard the Sermon on the Mount. James and John wanted Jesus to grant them the right (one to sit on the right hand, and one on the left hand in his glory). Yet John was among the nearest and most loving of the disciples.

Jesus Christ trained, educated, and tried to mold, his disciples according to his desire to bring them up to his level. To the Twelve much should be pardoned, because always they had faith in him, because they tried to love him as he wished to be loved. I would like to have myself and everyone feel and realize that God, too, is molding his servants in this day and age of the world. The gospel has been restored upon the earth through the Prophet Joseph Smith, with all of its gifts and blessings pertaining thereto, and I am a living witness, a Seventy and a preacher of righteousness who, standing before you without fear and without doubt—for I have seen the power of God made manifest through the administration of those ordinances. So it was with these great apostles, and we love and cherish their memories. But what they needed was to be enlightened by the flame of the Holy Ghost for their transformation. Until the day of Pentecost they acted like natural men. They were then prepared to announce that the kingdom of heaven was at hand, to heal the sick and command men everywhere to repent; and they quoted the scriptures—as I have quoted those passages of scripture in the South hundreds and hundreds of times, and they are being quoted all over the world by the elders who are preaching the gospel.

"Behold I send the promise of my Father upon you;" that same promise is upon us. "Tarry ye," said the Lord, "Tarry ye in the city of Jerusalem until ye be endowed with power from on high." I never place my hands upon an elder to set him apart that I do not think of that passage of scripture. It has been verified and fulfilled, for elders have come back, young men of whom I have no remembrance, but they come back to the apostles and to those who set them apart and say: "Brother Kimball, you set me apart, and the promises you made have been realized."

"And he led them out as far as to Bethany and he lifted up his hands and blessed them." Luke 24:49, 50.

"But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, he shall teach you all things and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you." John 16:26.

"Howbeit when he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for he shall not speak of himself, but whatsoever he shall hear, that shall he speak; and he will show you things to come.

"Nevertheless, it is expedient that I go away, for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you, but if I depart, I will send him unto you."

After the crucifixion and death of their Master they go forth as witnesses to teach the truth and to speak without fear, and without hiding anything, and to cry out from the heights in order that all may hear it, in order that there may be no one to say on that day that he has not heard it.

Now, brethren, I confess to you that I have been among this people for a considerable length of time, and have tried to fill my appointments as best I could. I have traveled among the people from Canada to Mexico, but I have never in all my labors felt the thrill and the flame of the Holy Spirit like I did when I was on my mission. It has been strange to me that I have not been able to reach the hearts, to reach the humility, the childlike simplicity, the perfect faith in God that I enjoyed in the Southern states, as an ignorant elder, perhaps, and with very little information. Yet I traveled without purse or scrip absolutely, and I had such perfect confidence that I never doubted but that I would be cared for. Now, I want to say to you that a while back I was sick, two or three weeks, with what they call the "flu." I inherited that disease; I get it every little while. While I was there I wondered if I had exaggerated my experience in the South, so I hunted up my diaries which I had not read for forty years, and I discovered that I told the truth. The record is as correct as the record of the Bible, and I was astonished how God blessed me and how I enjoyed his spirit and the manifestations and testimonies that were given to me. Let me call your attention to an incident. It happened away down in Alabama. That was at a time in the '90's when I presided over the Southern states mission. The elders had been asked to assemble themselves together. They were laboring in that low, marshy, malarial district that was scarcely safe for a human to live in, and they came straggling in, suffering with malaria, rather low-spirited, because they had been traveling without purse or scrip through that section of the country. We assembled to hold a conference. After the conference was over, two days, we were to hold a priesthood meeting. We had no place to meet in those days except in the woods, but I had instructed the elders to clean some place off in the woods, a circle, where we could meet together and hold our priesthood meeting. On that occasion there was a young man whose mother was a remarkable woman, a Latter-day Saint. The father had left the Church years and years ago. He opposed the boy, he stood out against him, he refused to assist him, but the mother's faith and the faith of the young man who was in that conference did not fail. I don't know what his trouble was, but one of his legs was as large as my body, and it looked like a great piece of raw meat. It looked like it would burst. The people there did the best they could for him. He had no physician. We did not know what a physician was in the South, in my day. There may have been physicians there, but I never happened to meet any. So on this occasion I said to this elder: "Well, you will have to stay here with the people. You can't go up there." "Why," he said, "Brother Kimball, I have been dreaming about this, and I have been talking about it. It would ruin my whole mission unless I can be at that priesthood meeting." "Well," I said, "if you feel that way, two of the elders will carry you up there, one mile." We went there in order to get away, to a place where we would be secluded, and when we got into the woods in that little circle and sat down, as best we could, I looked those elders over. I was not very well myself, but I said: "Brethren, what are you preaching?"

"We are preaching the gospel of Jesus Christ."

"Are you telling these people that you have the power and authority, through faith, to heal the sick?"

They said: "Yes."

"Well, then, why don't you believe it?"

This young man spoke up and he said: "I believe it!" He sat down on a stump and the elders gathered around him. He was anointed and I administered to him, and he was healed right in their presence. It was quite a shock; and every other elder that was sick was administered to, and they were all healed. We went out of that priesthood meeting and the elders received their appointments, and there was a joy and a happiness that cannot be described. The people gathered around, and the elders before their departure, got down and they cried. Those elders, many of them, had never seen one another until they assembled in that conference, and "Such love," those people said, "we have never known." My brethren and sisters, I realize that we at home are carried away in many instances with material things.

It is spiritual first, and then temporal. My experience of late has been such, unfortunately, that I have had to hark back to find testimonies of the great healing power of God.

I will tell you a story and then I shall stop. I got a telephone message some time ago, I think a year ago, may be, that I had some relatives in the hospital. They wanted me to hurry up there and administer to them. They were two sisters. They were married, and they were not city people, and, by the way, their father and mother were good Latter-day Saints, and these young girls had been taught and they had been active, but they were not healed, so they came to the hospital. When I arrived I found one of them in one room, and she had been operated upon, and getting along very nicely. The other sister wanted me to bless her before she was operated upon. I asked her how much she was paying for her room. She told me. "And how much are you paying the doctor."

"Three hundred dollars."

"Well, haven't you got confidence in him? He is charging you enough. Why don't you trust him?"

"Well," she said, "Uncle Golden, I have been administered to, but I was not healed, and I felt forced to come to the doctor."

I said, "I am a little jealous for God, and if I bless you, and you are healed, who is going to get the credit? If the doctor gets all the money and all the credit, and God heals you, I don't think that fair."

So I blessed her as best I knew how, and I blessed the doctor. I made a full anointing and blessed the nurse, and asked God that his spirit might be there and the patient's life be spared. I realize that hospitals, physicians, and surgeons, do wonderful things, and that faith without works is dead. I want to bear testimony to you, and I know it, I don't think it, I don't imagine it: I have seen God heal the sick. I know it isn't in me, but I know that where there is faith there is nothing impossible, and these young elders who are sent out now, it may not be wisdom to send them out as we went, but when we were in the South, God had to take care of us, whether it was stormy or sunshine, as we had no choice. I know the Lord can take care of us and will take care of us if we have faith.

I was in the South three years, presiding over the mission, under the greatest hardships; and the greatest difficulties I have ever endured in all my life were experienced in the missionary field, yet I have had the greatest joy and the greatest peace and happiness. During my three years of presidency there was only one elder who died. Elias S. Kimball presided over the mission for seven years, and he had seventeen hundred fifty elders under his presidency, and only two died. When the Spanish-American war was on, there were at Chickamauga Park, Tenn., forty thousand of the finest young men of America, and they were looked after, and yet they died by the hundreds. Don't tell me that God can't take care of his servants if they will have faith.

I know this work is true. I pray God always to help me to sustain the work, to uphold the hands of the priesthood, and to overlook my weaknesses and help me to finish and complete my mission here upon the earth. I have no fear of the hereafter. I am not afraid of God. I know God is a God of love, a Father who will look after you, if you will trust him. I sustain this work, and I sustain the brethren. I sustain all those who labor for God and his cause. All of which I humbly pray for, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER RULON S. WELLS

Of the First Council of Seventy

When President Grant announced the changes in the missionary field in his opening remarks yesterday. I whispered to Brother McMurrin who sat next to me: "Surely he overlooked the change in the European mission in the appointment of Elder John A. Widtsoe to succeed President James E. Talmage in the presidency of that mission." We were pleased, however, when the announcement was subsequently made, and I have been thinking: "How abundantly has the Lord endowed Brother Widtsoe to become the successor to that other defender of the faith (who is now honorably released to return home) with those qualifications and endowments that will enable him to accomplish a good work in that great mission, which, however, is a mission comprising many missions located in various parts of the eastern hemisphere, where a great many different foreign languages are spoken; and in this particular Brother Widtsoe is especially fitted and equipped, it seems to me, for the great work unto which the Lord has called him.

Not very many years ago I had the pleasure of attending the Canadian quarterly conferences in company with Elder Widtsoe. Previous to our conferences Dr. Widtsoe had been visiting the Northwest delivering addresses on agriculture, irrigation, reclamation, dry-farming and kindred subjects, and there were people including many not of our faith and living in outlying districts who desired to hear him, for his fame as an agriculturist had gone before him. Accordingly a meeting was arranged and some of the visitors at the Alberta conference, including myself, were also in attendance. He gave a most excellent talk. I have never listened to one where I received so much information regarding the principles of agriculture. He stated that there were five essentials to successful farming: first, soil. There must be soil. Second, there must be air. Third, there must be seed. Fourth, there must be water, and fifth, there must be sunshine. He went on explaining how it was necessary to break up the soil, to pulverize it in order that the air might get in, that it might be thoroughly aerated, fairly filled with atmosphere. He went on to show how it was necessary that seed should be planted in the soil, thus prepared. He continued to show that it was necessary that water should be applied if that seed is to grow and that the sun must shine upon it before it can yield a harvest. He made it much more complete than I would be able to do here; but what surprised me most was that, at the close of his remarks, he said: "Now, before we dismiss this meeting I would like to hear from my companion, Mr. Wells, who is a practical farmer."

Well, I thought that was rather a strange introduction to give to me, as I had never held a plow in my hand in all my life. I had no horny hands of toil and my muscles were soft and had not become hardened to that kind of work, but nevertheless I responded to the invitation, and as I did so it came to me that perhaps after all Dr. Widtsoe was right, and that I was indeed a practical farmer, but the soil that I have been endeavoring to cultivate is the soil of the human heart. It is sometimes an unwieldy soil, and full of hardness. It needs to be broken up and harrowed; it needs to be pulverized and softened before it is prepared to receive the seed. The seed that I have been planting has been the seed of faith. We do not call it farming; we call it sowing the seeds of faith—faith on the Lord Jesus Christ, that men shall believe that he is indeed the Son of God, who was chosen before the foundations of this earth were laid to create it and redeem it. For, let it be remembered, there had been a great council in Heaven, when the great plan of life and salvation had been proclaimed among the children of God before this world was, "When the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God shouted for joy;" and, in order to carry out the Lord's plan, the question arose: "Whom shall I send?" There was one like unto the Son of man who arose and said: "Here am I, send me. Thy will be done and the glory be thine forever." This was the first-born, even Jehovah, who became the Only Begotten of the Father, and was known as Jesus Christ in the flesh. I have been teaching men to have faith in him who came into this world, created and peopled it with the children of God, that they might have life in this world, this natural world where we should have the experience of an earth-life; to have faith in him who not only created the world, but who should redeem the world; who should redeem mankind from the fall which was to ensue, thus giving us the opportunity to prove whether we, with a knowledge of good and evil and in the exercise of our free agency, would do all things whatsoever the Lord our God should command; to have faith in him by whose almighty power mankind should be redeemed from death and the grave.

But there was another who arose in that primeval council who rejected that plan and led many away from God through his deception and insidious sophistries, and he said: "Here am I, send me. I will be thy son, and I will see that not one soul shall be lost and surely I will do it; therefore give me thine honor." And God said, I will send the first; and satan, for he it was who spake thus, became angry and was cast out of heaven and with him fell one-third of the hosts of heaven. The one all important thing, then, is to teach men to have faith in Him whom God sent, and reject the other whom God cast out of heaven. The first was a plan of freedom wherein men should exercise their own volition; the other was one of compulsion and eventual subjection to the power of evil. To teach this fundamental truth has been the good seed which I have always endeavored to plant in the hearts of men, in this oftentimes unwieldily, sour and hardened, but withal most prolific and fertile soil.

But other seeds were constantly being planted in this receptive soil—evil seeds. That war begun in heaven is continued here on earth. The evil hand that led so many away from God in that primeval conflict, with all his evil followers, continues here to lead mankind astray by planting evil seeds, the seeds of hate, of greed, of avarice and lust, and these grow, too, along with the good seed. These are the weeds, the thistles and the thorns, hence the good farmer will pull them out or cut them down, lest they overrun the good and hinder its growth. This we call repentance from sin or casting the devils out.

Then comes the need for water, another essential in successful farming. So we preach not only faith and repentance but also baptism by immersion for the remission of sins, for the extinction of all the evil effects of sin, that the hearts and souls of men may be washed clean in the blood of the Lamb of God, by being buried with him by baptism into his death, and coming forth from that watery grave in the likeness of his glorious resurrection.

Now let in the sunshine of God's Holy Spirit. How can the garden grow in darkness? How can the trees blossom and produce their luscious fruit? Or how can the fields grow and ripen into golden harvests, unless the sun shall shine upon them? How can we know or understand the things of God without the light of his Holy Spirit? And yet, "This is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent." Hence; there is need to obtain the gift of the Holy Ghost which in the gospel of our Lord is bestowed upon repentant and baptized believers by the laying on of hands.

These are the essentials in this practical farming which has engaged so many years of my life. There appear to be two kinds of farming and both are practical. How greatly and grandly do they resemble each other! I think it was Goethe, the great German poet, who said: "Alles vergaengliche ist nur ein Gleichniss,"—all things temporal are but symbols of things eternal.

And now, Brother Widtsoe, so well informed in the science of agriculture—the reclamation of the waste lands of the desert—has also had a still greater experience as an apostle of the Lord Jesus Christ in the cultivation of human hearts, in planting the seeds of faith, not only by word of mouth, but also by his convincing pen in this still wider field of human welfare, by applying, in their spiritual form these same essentials of practical and successful farming.

May the Lord bless him in his ministry abroad. And, as he shall travel in the various missions of Europe, may he be able to speak forth the words of eternal life to every nation, kindred, tongue and people wheresoever he shall come, even to the convincing of the honest in heart and in a language which they can understand. This is my humble prayer and sincere wish for Brother Widtsoe, and I ask it in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH W. McMURRIN

Of the First Council of Seventy and President of the California Mission

I have rejoiced, my brethren and sisters, in the proceedings of this conference, and feel that we have had a truly wonderful time together. I have enjoyed the testimonies and counsels of all who have spoken, from President Grant to my companion and fellow-laborer, President Rulon S. Wells. I would like to say that I know, by close association with President Wells, that he has been a successful farmer in the manner that he has indicated, in sowing the seeds of the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ in the hearts of the children of men. I joyfully bear witness to the good that has come to me as an individual through my companionship with President Wells, both at home and abroad, and I thank God for his example, for his patience, for his excellent teachings, for the love he has manifested for his fellow men, and for the blessings that he has produced in my own soul by his teaching and by his kind and loving companionship.

If I caught aright the suggestion made by the President of the Church yesterday, it was his desire that the mission presidents should give information concerning the mission intrusted to their care. You have all learned from the remarks of President Grant that some things a little out of the ordinary have taken place in the California mission. Three stakes have been organized in that mission. I suppose I can say in the mission, although in a sense they are entirely outside of the mission, for the presidencies of the stakes, and those who are under their direction, control and manage and direct the organizations that are within the stakes, are entirely independent of any mission authority, and yet there are missionary districts covering some of the same territory that the stakes cover. The Los Angeles missionary district covers the territory that is embraced in the Los Angeles and Hollywood stakes. The San Francisco missionary district covers the identical territory now embraced in the San Francisco stake. I think there has never been just this kind of experience in missions before. It is true that stakes have been organized that have taken sections of missions, but the mission headquarters have not been maintained in the midst of those sections; so that, in California we have what might be termed a double line of authority, the authority of the mission and the authority of the various stakes.

I am happy to say that the utmost goodwill has been maintained between mission authority and stake authority. At the present time in the San Francisco stake, President MacDonald and his associates, and Bishop Newman of the San Francisco ward and his associates, and the Relief Society organizations in that section, are all banded together to improve the quarters in San Francisco that are occupied by the missionaries. We thank the Lord for such men as are in the San Francisco stake presidency and other presidencies in California, and for their desire to honor and respect and build up the missionaries and give them opportunity to accomplish the work that belongs to them. I feel that that is just as it should be. The missionaries are sent forth by proper authority to proclaim the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ, and they should be given in California, in every stake and in every ward, abundant opportunity to lift up their voices in proclamation of the truth, that they may magnify the callings whereunto they have been called. I am happy to say that this condition prevails.

Then, outside of California the missionaries, under the direction of mission authority, have labored in the St. Joseph stake of Zion and in the Snowflake stake of Zion, and I think have been instrumental in accomplishing good in all of the stakes named. We have gone into those stakes by permission of stake authority, and have operated among the people under their jurisdiction, with their full approval and sanction. The mission has turned over to those stakes of Zion possibly some thirty wards, numbering about eleven thousand souls, and with the organization of the stakes there has gone to the stakes about two hundred thousand dollars' worth of chapel property that had been built up under mission authority. In the organization of the San Francisco stake, ten splendid wards went into that organization. I am happy to say that since the stake was organized, we have been successful in organizing four new branches in other parts of the mission, two of them being in Sacramento, the capital of the state of California. Instead of one branch in that city we now have three branches, and recently a branch has been organized in San Luis Obispo, the first Church branch ever established in that city, and we have just recently organized a branch of the Church in Compton, right in the heart of the Los Angeles stake; and this has been done with the full sanction and approval of the presidency of that stake. We hope that under mission authority men and women will be developed in the branches and in the auxiliary organizations who in a time to come will be instrumental for the advantage and welfare of that and other stakes of Zion that I have named. I am reminded also that we have labored in the Maricopa stake of Zion and have been given a most hearty welcome in that stake by President Price, who formerly was the bishop of the Phoenix ward. He has always given me to understand that when missionary tours were being made in Arizona, that he would like the Phoenix ward to be numbered, temporarily at least, in the California mission. We have had some wonderful times in Phoenix, and we have rejoiced very greatly in the testimony of Bishop Price and others that the ministry of the missionaries in that section of the country has been very greatly to the advantage of the work of the Lord in that stake.

We have, at present, outside of the stakes of Zion, nearly fifty Relief Societies, seventy Sunday schools, thirty Young Men's Mutual Improvement associations, thirty Young Ladies' Mutual Improvement associations, and thirty Primary organizations. All of these organizations are established exactly in the same manner as they are organized in the stakes of Zion, and are officered in that manner. They conduct their services strictly in accordance with the lessons outlined by the General Boards, and that are in use in the stakes of Zion. In our mission, branch presidents carry practically the same authority carried by the bishops in the stakes of Zion. They stand at the head, they receive the tithings of the people, they ordain, according to their judgment, young men to the Aaronic Priesthood. Usually, if men are to be ordained to the Melchizedek Priesthood, before such ordination their names are referred to the mission president.

We need more missionaries. I suppose it is impossible to get that into the minds of the men in authority, who are here in this congregation. I mean not the men behind me, but you men down in the congregation who make recommendations to the presidency of the Church. We have discovered a way of getting missionaries that could be adopted. It is to call stake presidents into the mission field. They sent Stephen L. Chipman to the California mission, and there seemed to come to Brother Chipman a great revelation concerning the necessity of missionaries, and while he was in the mission field he got more missionaries from the Alpine stake of Zion than he has been able to obtain since he returned. One of our missionaries intimated that it was because he had the missionary spirit upon him in the mission field, more than he had in the Alpine stake of Zion; but if we could have other stake presidents sent into the California mission, who would do the same work that President Chipman did in obtaining missionaries, one of our great problems would be solved.

I was impressed yestergay with the testimony of President Henry H. Rolapp. He told us that when he was called to preside over the Eastern states mission he had some question in his mind as to whether that would be a satisfactory way in which to spend his time, and yet he declared that a wonderful revelation had come to him regarding the joy of missionary work. Well, that comes to every missionary who faithfully meets the obligation that rests upon him. I would not like to be misunderstood, or to give offense to anybody, but I say deliberately that in the mission field I have listened to trembling boys and trembling girls bear witness concerning the truth of the gospel, when my own soul has been pierced just as greatly as in listening to the testimony of any man of authority who has ever saluted my ears with his testimony. I thank God for that condition. Young men and young women do make the discovery by the power of God that they are engaged in the work of God; and I feel that when these weak vessels, for they feel that they are weak, can pierce and melt my own soul and bring tears of joy to my eyes with their testimonies, surely by the same spirit and by the same power they may reach the hearts of men who are not of our faith, and that the Almighty, by the weak things that he has called and sent forth to minister in his name, is actually accomplishing the work designed in the sending forth of these young men and young women who feel most intensely their own weakness. I thank God for their companionship. I am proud of them, I love them, I trust them, and I believe they love me. They gladly hearken to my counsel, and they carry out, generally speaking, without hesitation, and in great cheerfulness, the recommendations that are made to them.

During this last month of September, we suggested to the missionaries of California that in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the delivery of the plates of the Book of Mormon to Joseph the prophet, they should make an extra effort to place the Book of Mormon. They responded wonderfully. We do not know just how many were placed, but we believe that in September alone we placed in the California mission three or four thousand copies of the Book of Mormon.

I am glad to say that about twenty-six of our branches are housed in comfortable chapel buildings, which they own and control. This has been brought about by the liberality of the presidency of the Church, and it has given me wonderful satisfaction to tell the people in the California mission that every dollar of the tithing paid throughout the California mission has been expended in helping to house the branches of California in proper meeting places. When I say that of California it includes portions of the state of Nevada, and portions of the state of Arizona. We have built during the season just closing a comfortable little chapel in Fresno, California. We are roofing at the present time in Prescott, Arizona, a wonderful chapel, built to endure, you would think to look upon it, forever and ever, built out of blocks of granite. And the preliminary steps have been taken for the erection of a chapel in Binghampton, Arizona, and in Palo Alto, California. So, little by little we are obtaining better foothold, and I am happy to say that I feel in my soul that it is not a liability, in any sense of the word, in the California mission, to be known as a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. I believe, with many of our non-"Mormon" friends, that the announcement that an individual is a member of the Church is a distinct asset to him, and we are held, generally speaking, in high esteem by our non-"Mormon" friends in Nevada, in California and in Arizona. We feel that the purposes of God are advancing, and we know, thank God, that we are engaged in the Lord's service. May he help us to meet our obligations and magnify our callings, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

We are honored with the presence of General Charles T. Summerrall, Chief of Staff of the United States Army, and some of his associate officers. He is visiting Salt Lake on a tour of inspection. We will ask our organist to play a selection in honor of these guests, and then we will be honored by listening to the General.

An organ solo was then rendered by Edward P. Kimball.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I have very great pleasure in presenting General Summerrall.

GENERAL CHARLES F. SUMMERALL*Chief of Staff, United States Army*

President Grant and friends: It is a very distinct honor to appear in this noble temple, the fame of which is known throughout civilization, and to look into the faces of the men and women who represent the sterling citizenship of this great state of Utah. While I am not a stranger to your people, this is the first opportunity afforded to bring to you, as a representative of the army of our country, a greeting and an expression of appreciation of what the people of your faith have done as patriotic citizens, throughout your history, in the service of our country. Many, many years ago, it was my privilege to number among my friends and my comrades in arms, men who represented not only the high ideals of the faith of your Church, but the high ideals of officers and soldiers of the army of our country.

Our nation is great, not because of any material development of the people, so much as by the lofty faith of the religious denominations throughout our great land. It is the religion of a people which has ever marked its civilization. One cannot traverse your state and see its productive fields, its prosperous and happy homes, its attractive and rapidly growing cities, without realizing that there is a guiding hand and a great influence over the minds of its population. They have achieved great industrial development. Their educational system is second to none. This morning I was only a few minutes in your University, and yet I was profoundly impressed by the educational standards, under the dominant leadership of Dr. Thomas, which must make you indeed very proud. You are guiding the footsteps and the minds of the rising generation along the paths which you and those who preceded you have found to be essential to make a noble, a powerful, a pious and a God-fearing people.

I stand before you, therefore, with reverence at your accomplishments, with admiration of your ideals, and with a sense of pride that I, too, am with you a citizen of this great land. We share love of country and the flag and patriotic loyalty with our fellow citizens wherever they may be found. It is a noble tribute to your faith and your convictions that we find today so many who have laid aside the burdens of their daily lives to come together for religious devotion in order that they might make better, not only their own lives, but the state and the country in which they live.

Let me thank you, indeed, from the bottom of my heart, for this privilege, and to hope that I may continue to enjoy the friendship of your people, and the support that we need from you in carrying out the great mission of making our country safe for us and for those who come after us. Thank you.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

I regard it as a great honor to have listened to the very splendid compliments that have been paid our people. I rejoice in knowing that there are no people in all the United States of America who are really more patriotic than the Latter-day Saints, or more willing to perform every duty that devolves upon them, and where the members of our people have been in the army or the navy they have made a record second to none.

The congregation sang, "Come, come, ye Saints."

Prayer was offered by Elder George Whitehead of the St. George temple.

The conference adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

AFTERNOON MEETING

The meeting opened at 2 o'clock in the Tabernacle, October 8, 1927. President Heber J. Grant presided.

The congregation sang, "O ye mountains high."

Elder Franklin S. Richards offered the opening prayer.

The congregation sang the hymn, "How great the wisdom and the love."

ELDER MELVIN J. BALLARD

There is no situation that has arisen since the organization of this Church, neither will there be, in the future, that the Lord has not made ample provision to meet. No matter how complicated it may seem to be or how difficult, there is ample provision made in the wisdom of the Lord to solve it.

THREATENING DANGERS FORESEEN

We read in the first section of the Doctrine and Covenants:

"Wherefore, I the Lord, knowing the calamity which should come upon the inhabitants of the earth, called upon my servant, Joseph Smith, Jun., and spake unto him from heaven, and gave him commandments;

"And also gave commandments to others, that they should proclaim these things unto the world; and all this that it might be fulfilled which was written by the prophets."

The Lord has seen fit to warn his sons and daughters, has anticipated their danger and foreseen their needs, in ample time to save them. He has submitted not only the warning that there is danger ahead, but the means of escape have been provided and in ample time to save his children. So that I say the Lord knew the perils of this hour that were spoken of yesterday, the dangers that threaten the world, this country, and this present civilization. These things were known by the Lord when he laid the foundations of this work, and he prepared his work to be able to withstand all the storms that should beat upon it, and that it should stand as a shining light before the nations of the earth. He endowed us not only with the responsibility of becoming the salt of the earth but with every facility to attain unto that distinction.

In the 115th section of the Doctrine and Covenants, the Lord says to all the Church:

THE GOSPEL, A KEY TO THE SOLUTION OF ALL PROBLEMS

"Verily I say unto you all: Arise and shine forth, that thy light may be a standard to the nations;

"And that the gathering together upon the land of Zion, and upon her stakes, may be for a defense, and for a refuge from the storm, and from wrath when it shall be poured out without mixture upon the whole earth."

I say that the Lord has made ample provision that we may arise and shine. The obligation is upon us. There is coming a day when we shall see the fruits of the gospel as it has been lived in the lives of the Latter-day Saints, and discover that it has not only brought peace and happiness to them while they live, but made them a light to the nations, and their salvation. In keeping these simple gospel commandments, men and women are also fortified to stand when the storms do beat upon the children of men, and in them lies the key to the solution of all the problems that at present distress the world.

DANGERS AHEAD

I confess to you, my brethren and sisters, that I have felt in my own spirit that there is danger ahead, not only for the world but for the Church. I recognize that the powers of evil have been arrayed against this Church from the beginning. When the prophet's life was taken, that was but one item in the program of the adversary. The driving of the Latter-day Saints from their homes to this western country was another; and their long years of struggle to maintain their right to exist has been contested until that right, apparently, is conceded. And yet I can plainly see that the adversary of this work is not yet satisfied. I believe that the thing he has at heart is to realize his first great ambition; namely, to have the privilege of ruling over the kingdoms of this world. He has never lost sight of it, and when he met the Redeemer of the world and tempted him, while Jesus was among men in mortality, the great purpose of that temptation was manifest in the last effort when the kingdoms of the world passed in panoramic vision before the mind of Jesus. The tempter said, Are they not wonderful? Would you not love them? They are mine. Bow down and worship me, and you may have them on easy terms. He knew that this was the purpose for which Christ came into the world to die—to earn the right to become the King of kings and Lord of lords and rule over them. Satan's purpose was not to give the kingdoms of the world, but to overcome the elect and chosen Son of God. Jesus went to Calvary and paid the price and earned the right to rule over the kingdoms of the world. But the enemy was not satisfied, and he encompassed Christ and brought about his death, and planned the death of the apostles and the destruction of the Church.

ESTABLISHING THE WORK THAT SHALL NOT FAIL

No wonder when the boy Joseph Smith knelt in the grove that before the Father and the Son could appear unto him the powers of evil knew that this humble instrumentality was God's means of establishing once again the work that shall not fail. He is vain enough to believe, the enemy of our souls, that he is yet to win the contest, for he has an ambition to become the king of this world, and has sought to frustrate every proposition that our Father has made permanently to establish here God's work.

How grateful I am for the assurance that we have in the vision which the Lord gave to Daniel of old that in the last days, when our Father should set up his kingdom, it should not be overthrown nor left to another people; and yet that kingdom shall be buffeted, and has been buffeted. Nephi saw it. He saw its trials, saw its dangers, dangers that are past and dangers that are yet ahead of it; and yet out of it all, we cling with joy and gladness to the assurance that these are the last days, that this is the last time when God shall set his hand to accomplish his work, and that it shall not fail no matter how the powers of evil may conspire against it.

EVERY INDIVIDUAL TO BE TRIED

Powers of evil are not through with their opposition, neither have they conceded to us the right of way, but are seeking to tempt the Latter-day Saints, to turn away from the promises of the Lord, seeking to blind their eyes. The spirit of self-indulgence that is rampant in the world, that leads to such lawlessness as was described here yesterday will naturally have its influence over the Latter-day Saints. There will not be a man or woman in this Church, a boy or a girl, who shall not be tempted or tried. The adversary will lay individual siege against every man's faith and against every woman's faith, to seek to darken their spirits, and have them believe that they have perhaps been deluded in some of these great and wonderful things; that the Lord is not sustaining the establishment of this work, or that the Lord delayeth his coming, or, that after all it is only a matter of opinion. The love for things of this world will take possession of the hearts of men even in this Church and blind their eyes, for the desire for material things will darken their spirits. But the most damning thing that shall happen is the sin and transgression into which men and women will go, who, yielding to that spirit of self-indulgence, will not be able to keep the commandments of God because of not observing the Word of Wisdom, and they will weaken themselves until they shall succumb to a greater and more terrible evil, the evil of immorality, which is the end of self-indulgence, which has brought about the destruction of men and nations.

HOW TO GAIN STRENGTH TO RESIST

Yet the Lord has fortified the Latter-day Saints in these simple gospel principles, if only we shall adhere to them, to enable us to stand when the storms do blow, and when the dangers threaten. Men and women who keep the Word of Wisdom, observing to abstain from the things that the natural appetite of men may crave, shall develop a strength and power to resist greater temptations when they come. But whosoever has been unable to observe this law that is suited to the capacity of the weakest of the weak, may not be able to survive the dangers that shall come.

A WARNING OF DANGER

Now, I do not want to paint a dark picture, I simply want to lift my voice in warning as a watchman upon the towers of Zion, that there is danger ahead; that the time of peace and prosperity of the people becomes their most perilous time, and has been so in all the ages of the past. And yet with perfect confidence I look forward throughout those days of individual testing to a time to come when vindication will arise for those who are true and faithful under all circumstances and adhere to these gospel principles. It is not an idle boast. We have lived long enough to see the fruits of "Mormonism" in the lives of Latter-day Saints, and by their fruits they shall be judged, and that is a just and righteous judgment.

Behold how the application of the law of tithing has helped to solve a problem for the Latter-day Saints. It has brought them into the enjoyment of facilities and opportunities, not only in a religious, but in a social way. It has enabled the authorities of the Church to provide ways and means for the social welfare of people by the building of recreation halls, by the building of temples and the building of tabernacles, by the provisions such as are not found in any other church. And this by reason of the fact that the great majority of the Latter-day Saints have observed the law of tithing.

SOLVING THE CONFLICT BETWEEN CAPITAL AND LABOR

That is only, however, an incident along the way, for all this is a training and preparation for other things that are to come. The eternal conflict that has been waged between capital and labor cannot be solved nor shall it be solved by all the legislation that men shall enact. When men become their brothers' keepers, when the love of God is in the hearts of men, and they are willing to pay their honest tithing they are making a step towards the establishment of an order that obtained once in the days of Enoch and shall obtain again when the Lord Jesus Christ comes to rule and reign. And there shall be no rich and no poor. The Lord's gospel plan is the true and only solution of that problem.

GOVERNMENT'S STRENGTH LIES IN THE PEOPLE'S OBSERVANCE OF LAW

I rejoice in every measure that is put forth to curtail the use of alcoholic beverages. I rejoice to know that at one time at least in the history of our own country we rose to the height that we were enabled to establish in the Constitution of the United States a law that prohibits the use of liquor or strong drink which every intelligent man knows is positively an injury to the human body. Yet I grieve to see a spirit rampant in the hearts of men who ought to know better, to temporize with and alter this law. If we do recede from the high ground we took when this country made an attempt to free itself from the destructive influences of alcoholic beverages, we shall start on a downward program that is full of danger and destruction to the people of this country.

So far as the Latter-day Saints are concerned, we rejoice in every measure that seeks to preserve us from these destructive influences, and yet I recognize that all the legislation that can be enacted will not charge the appetites of men or control their will. If it becomes necessary for us to use half the people of this country to police the other half, civilization will be in dire peril. The strength and power of the American government was in the willingness on the part of the great masses of the people to observe the constitutional law and honor and respect it. We have been changing year by year from that time until the present, and never before in the history of our government has there been such a police force in use in the nation, in the states, and in the counties and in the cities to attempt to maintain law and order. There must come an awakened respect for law and order or we shall reach the point where 51% of the people shall be lawless, and then our interests will be in danger, our constitution, our privileges and our rights will be in imminent jeopardy.

CIVILIZATION RESTS UPON SELF-CONTROL OF PEOPLE

I heard an eminent economist of our country, (I refer to Dr. Thomas Nixon Carver) deliver an address at the commencement exercises of the University of Utah a few years ago, wherein he discussed the subject of how much civilization can the world maintain. He undertook to prove, and I believe he was successful, that the present civilization can endure only because the majority of the people of this country can maintain the power of self-control; that a nation or a people who have lost the power of self-control have lost all possibility of preserving unto themselves and their children a civilization. There was published last year by Professor Wiggam, an interesting treatise upon that very subject. He draws attention to the fact that ours is not the only civilization that has reached a glorious eminence. He refers to Egypt in all its glory, to Greece, and to the civilizations that arose and flourished on this American continent, that perhaps in some respects excelled our own civilization. And said he:

"We need not feel that we are secure as the mountains, or that our present civilization shall stand and endure no matter what may come."

DANGERS THAT THREATEN OUR CIVILIZATION

He points out the dangers that threaten our civilization and asks the question whether or not we have reached the summit and shall begin to recede, and whether there is in humanity itself the power to preserve forever a civilization. He said that it is only a short step, as nations in the past have shown, back to the jungle; that while there has always been an element, a few, that have contended for the maintenance of these high standards, they have been gradually absorbed and overcome, and the will of the majority has prevailed and darkness has come over the spirits of men again. As I read his gloomy forecast I was filled with this hope and absolute conviction, that the Lord God Almighty knew the dangers and determined to preserve a civilization that shall withstand all the troubles of the future. But that civilization cannot be maintained by the wisdom of man. God alone can do it, and the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ alone is the path and the way and the means by which that civilization may be preserved.

KIND WORDS FOR THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS

This same author that I am referring to calls attention, in a treatise of that subject, to the strength and power of the "Mormon" Church. It is gratifying to me to know that while we ourselves know the plans and purposes of the Lord and have faith in those plans, that men who are looking from the outside are also noticing the fruits of "Mormonism" in the lives of the people. And so it ought to be. We should be attracting the attention of the world.

I remember that a few years ago Dr. Carver said from this very place where I now stand, that if he were going to search the world over to study the highest state of civilization being developed he would come to Utah and find it among the "Mormons." I discovered in Boston, during my recent visit there with President Rolapp, that Dr. Carver is just as freely speaking there of his findings among the "Mormons" as he did here. For he said, on his return in 1925 from teaching summer school in the Agricultural College, the philosophy of life involved in the "Mormon" Church is the most constructive thing he has seen in American life. He sees only a church which embraces the whole faith and has a tremendous value for the adherents, so well is it organized, so much is it the center of all community pleasure, so closely does it endeavor to establish heaven upon earth.

Dr. Wiggam, in his observations, has the following to say in Next Age of Man:

"There can be little question that in all ages religious appeal has had great influence upon the birthrate."

He is calling attention to the fact that nation after nation is receding in its birthrate, that decay is setting in and the end may be that nations will destroy themselves by their own suicide; and in the solution of this question he sees a ray of hope in what he calls the "Mormon" plan:

"As an illustration the 'Mormon' people of Utah, under the influence of their religious belief, have kept up a higher birthrate among their intellectual and professional classes than the people of any other state of the Union. Their theology teaches that every child that is born means that this act of human beings gives another soul its opportunity to pass from a lower state of existence through the trial state of this bodily life to a higher state of spiritual evolution. Dr. Johnson, a professor in the University of Pittsburgh (I met this gentleman in the east. He was in one of our meetings in Pittsburgh) believes that the 'Mormon' religion is the most eugenical religion in the world."

ETERNITY OF THE FAMILY RELATIONSHIP

In this time of trouble that is threatening not only the peace of the nation but its life, in the destruction of the home, the "Mormon" example is attracting attention, wherein we plan to be united in companionship not only until death does us part, but for eternity, which is quite in contrast to the spirit of the age that seeks for companionship marriage that may be dissolved at will, without the edict of the court. Upon an enduring foundation we look forward to the perpetuation and the establishment of these unions throughout time and all eternity. God never could have provided for the strength and endurance of this Church on a more solid basis than he did when he established in it the union of families for time that shall endure throughout all the ages, and gave us the conception that the children who come to us are his sons and daughters, entitled as much as we are to the rights and privileges of earth life, and that it is one step onward towards their glorious destiny.

There has been inculcated into our hearts, therefore, by the example of our fathers and mothers, through the observance of the first great commandment of God to multiply and replenish the earth, the true conception of one of the chief purposes of life that cannot and must not be lost sight of by the Latter-day Saints, and through adhering to it we shall survive and shall not perish.

THE KERNELS OF LIFE IN GOSPEL TEACHINGS

So each simple gospel principle has in it the very kernel of life. We need no new revelation. All we need to do is to get a new conception, perhaps, of those simple gospel principles contained in these doctrines taught during this conference: The observance of the Fast day, thereby taking care of the poor of the Latter-day Saints, and also providing for a spiritual growth and development on the part of the membership. The adherence to these gospel principles shall bring honesty, for the man who pays an honest tithing is inculcating deep in his heart the elements of honesty such as no other practice or teaching can do. The old "Mormon" slogan that "a 'Mormon's' word is as good as his bond" should be the watchword of all Latter-day Saints if we are to seek to distinguish ourselves and establish integrity the like of which is not known elsewhere.

I think as I said a moment ago, the Lord has overlooked nothing in enabling us to realize these great promises. He has selected the right people. They are the house of Israel, sons and daughters of Joseph.

WE ARE THE CHILDREN OF JOSEPH

I read, a few years ago, an article by an eminent author in one of our national magazines in which he discussed the question, "Are the Jews the chosen people of God"? He granted to them a claim to all the blessings that were pronounced upon their father Judah. "But when," said he, "they assume to be the inheritors of those blessings that were pronounced upon his brother Joseph, they are usurping that which they have no right to." And he concluded his article with the statement that if somewhere in the world we could find the descendants of Joseph, the descendants of Ephraim, we would indeed find the chosen people of God.

WE SHOULD THEREFORE RISE TO THE LORD'S EXPECTATIONS

How we ought to rejoice in knowing that they are found and that we are the children of Joseph. These are the chosen people of God, and yet not in boastfulness, but as the natural inheritors of blessings and privileges. We should arise to the Lord's expectations; and through his providing we ought to become distinguished and unlike the world, a peculiar people. The Lord brought us to the right place, in the right part of the United States, where, with all its natural privileges and advantages, there can be developed an unusual race of men. Every environment, every setting, every struggle through which this people have passed and the very nature of their employment, means that there is in these things the building of men and women who shall arise and shine. I am glad to know that we have the only plan, God's plan, that would make any people, I care not who they are, distinguished people—with inspired leaders, with a man to whom the revelations of God are given, to tell the people what to do next in the unfolding of this program. With such possibilities, nothing overlooked on the part of the Lord, why shall we not arise and shine, that our light indeed may be a standard to the nations, that we may become the salt of the earth? The power is in this Church, to become a mighty people.

God bless us that we shall treasure our heritage, that we shall recognize that we are to do an unusual thing. We are not called to be imitators, we are called to be exemplars to the world, a light that shall shine until the day will come when from the east to the west, the north to the south, they will come, not to look upon our lands nor our fields nor our factories, but to learn of our ways that they may walk in our paths, and thereby find peace, preservation and salvation now and eternally.

May God bless us to keep our eye upon our glorious destiny and recognize that within our hands are the means of accomplishing such an end, and not be blind to our privileges. The Lord help us thus to see his wonderful providing and go forward towards that which is ours, through our faithfulness, and may God grant it, I ask in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER CHARLES H. HART

Of the First Council of Seventy, and President of the Canadian Mission

During the fifteen minutes allotted to me I am very anxious that the spiritual feast which we have thus far enjoyed shall be continued.

I recognize the practical value of the principal theme of this conference—law enforcement. The Dominion of Canada is a country of law enforcement. They have celebrated this year the Diamond Jubilee, or the Jubilee anniversary of confederation. They revere the fathers of federation as we revere the fathers of our Constitution. They are not unmindful of the comparison between the United States and Canada in the matter of law enforcement. My defense has been that the United States is great in potentialities, in practical statesmanship, in self-government and in good common sense, and that it is just a question of a little time when the laxity of law enforcement in the States will be remedied. There have grown up too many technical refinements in the administration of the criminal law, and those refinements and technicalities will have to be swept away without impairing the valuable system of judge-made laws that exists in the United States.

Canada can give us an example of law and order upon the Sabbath day. No newspaper is published nor even distributed on that day, that I have been able to learn of in my sojourn there.

In speaking of the missionary work in Canada: We do not have the background that exists in many of the missions of the United States, the background of from five to eight thousand members to support the missionary work. The statistics of the Dominion give our church credit for having nearly twenty thousand members, about ten thousand of whom are located in the stakes of the Alberta Province. The other ten thousand I do not know just where they may be scattered. Certainly there are not more than one thousand of them in the mission over which I have the honor of presiding. We do feel the assistance of the few we have, scattered as they are among the millions of population there, in supporting the cause. We have young ladies newly converted to the Church who will stand upon the street corners and with very fine courage give a reason for the faith and knowledge which they have. At one of our conferences we called forward two young converts, one from the Northwestern states mission and one from Montreal. Each of them gave a telling speech describing their conversion and the great joy which had come to him as a member of the Church.

We are building upon the work of all those who have gone before—the work there of President Grant, and Elders George Albert Smith, Orson F. Whitney, and Joseph Fielding Smith, all of whom have made tours through that mission. We are building upon the work of President Nephi Jensen, President Joseph Quinney, Jr., and the hundreds of elders and sisters who have served there during the past decade. We are finding very many encouraging symptoms. In going through the districts of the mission last month I discovered a marked contrast between conditions existing now and those of three months before. Instead of the conferences assembling in a private home, as was the case in the city of London, a city of some sixty-five thousand people, we had two or three times the number of people in attendance in a public hall, and some of them had arisen as early as 5:30 in the morning and traveled long distances to be in attendance at that conference. We have no meeting houses of our own there, but we have about reached a stage when it will be proper to have the stabilizing influences which will come to the people by owning their own meeting houses. I am sure the Presidency will be just as generous with the Canadian mission as with any of the other missions. They have indicated that. They have given token of that in spending the large sums of money necessary to build the Cardston temple.

We have a very fine body of elders and sisters in that mission, although few in number. They are of the same quality as described by the brethren of the other missions. It will save much time for me to simply incorporate in my remarks here the same words of just praise that have been given the missionaries in each of the other missions by their presidents during this conference. These elders and missionary sisters are of the same cloth, so to speak, that these other missionaries come from. They manifest good zeal, good spirituality in all they have encountered, and when they have made it a matter of fasting or of prayer, the end desired has been attained. That was the case in the matter of having the privilege to use a Young Men's Christian Association pool to baptize in. As they went back after their fasting and prayer, without any argument, they were accorded the privilege denied them by the same man shortly before their fasting and their prayer.

We have experiences of interest, adventures upon every street corner where we hold meetings; and we are holding many street meetings during the summer months. The period is very short during which it is practicable to hold such meetings in that cold climate. Next month, if not this, will surely terminate the holding of street meetings for the year.

While upon an elevator in the Queen's Hotel, going to luncheon, by invitation of a member of the Rotary Club, I was introduced to "Jim Hughes," as they called him in Rotarian parlance, but no less a person than Dr. James L. Hughes of Toronto. He said to me in a voice loud enough to be heard by all those in the elevator, knowing that I was from Salt Lake City:

"Are you a member of the 'Mormon' Church?"

In a tone just as emphatic I declared that I was. I did not know what was coming, but he followed his question and the answer thereto by saying:

"Mr. Hart, do you know that I am the first man in Canada to do justice through the press to your people?"

He had written a splendid article for the Canadian Magazine in the April number, 1904, under the caption, "My Misconceptions of the 'Mormon' People," or some such heading. He had visited the tabernacle. His interest in the subject started from an acquaintance with one individual, Sister Susa Young Gates. He told me that after his article was published a preacher said to him, "Dr. Hughes, I am ashamed of you for writing the article you did." And he said, "I retorted to the minister, 'I should think you preachers would be ashamed after all the fibbing you have done and are doing against the 'Mormon' people. I'll tell you what I will do. We will get on the train and go to Salt Lake City, and if you can find a single misrepresentation in that article I will pay the expenses for both of us. But if you are unable to find a single thing in which I have misrepresented the case, then you pay the expenses. Now, come on, let us get on the train." The preacher would not accept the challenge.

We need such information as that and such friends to remove prejudice. It is not an unusual thing to find people who at first will rave at the mention of the "Mormon" people; they will decline to accept a tract, will refuse to hold a conversation with you, but by being a little patient with them so as to get our cause before them, they soon grow apologetic. It is a rather good sign when they are so intense in their feelings to begin with, because after we get the truth to them they are more friendly than they perhaps otherwise would be.

The missionaries there are laboring hard. For example, one of the elders purchased a second-hand car, and used it as a means of conveyance by day and a bedroom by night for himself and his companion. They presented the picture slides, giving archæological and geological support to the Book of Mormon, to 2,500 people scattered through the eastern part of the Dominion. They traveled 3,725 miles and held fifty-seven meetings.

We had a choice treat in meeting at the Memorial Cottage. We had the honor of warming our feet at the same hearth where the Prophet as a child had been warmed, whose destiny was to take part in the greatest single achievement of the nineteenth century,—the coming forth of the gospel and the restoration of the holy priesthood. The monument to Joseph Smith is certainly a very beautiful creation. Those who had to do with it are to be congratulated. The one hundred tons of granite are certainly in very beautiful form.

It is a matter of regret to me today that I could not attend the unveiling of the monument to our Salt Lake boys of the 145th Artillery. I stood the other evening viewing the Mormon Battalion monument, and it seemed to me it was a beautiful creation, and I was impressed much as the poet Vachel Lindsay was impressed, as recorded by his traveling companion, who gave a description of the Canadian temple by electric light and moonlight. For an artistic treat one should visit the monument not only by day but also by night.

We were thrilled at Cumorah in celebrating the centennial of the anniversary of the delivery of the golden plates. We had the honor to there meet President Grant and several of the mission presidents. Those who sang, those who prayed, and those who spoke did so in proper appreciation of the historic significance of that occasion. The missionaries, two hundred of them, some of whom had traveled a thousand miles to be in attendance, at the invitation of President Grant, were greatly impressed. I am sure they received a spiritual elevation that will richly repay them for the journey. They made that journey, many of them, by the "missionary express," and they were not so modest as not to remember the scriptural passage, "Ask and ye shall receive." They were cheerfully driven by men who acknowledged that they were not in the habit of picking up people upon the highway, but it seemed to be different to them on this occasion. The elders have preached the gospel as they traveled, and have received the appreciation of people of distinction who have driven them for hundreds of miles.

We were thrilled by holding the exercises in the Sacred Grove. I look forward to the time when that will be made a Mecca more than it is now. I anticipate that the desire to visit there will increase from year to year and that they will receive spiritual exhilaration, as they contemplate the glories and wonders of the great event that occurred there more than a hundred years ago.

My time has expired. May the Lord bless us, my brethren and sisters, and help us to put into this work all it is entitled to receive, that this glorious message may go forth to all the world, is my prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

William Holdaway sang a sacred baritone solo: "Asleep in the deep."

ELDER LEVI EDGAR YOUNG

Of the First Council of Seventy and Supervisor of the Bureau of Information

My brethren and sisters: The Japanese gentleman present this morning on the stand with us, was Dr. Seiska Tada of the University of Tokio, Japan. He is at the head of all the railways of the government of Japan and this is his first visit to America. Doctor Tada is one of the very many distinguished men who have visited the Temple Block mission this year. There has grown up at this mission a wonderful center for the entertainment of tourists who come to Salt Lake City.

Recently we had a party of German scientists who for three days kept coming to my office to talk on the subject of religion and science. One of these distinguished men was a relative of the great German historian and philosopher, Oswald Spengler, whose book entitled The Decline of Civilization in the West, is one of the outstanding works of history. It is considered by some to be the most scholarly work on history written since the days of the French philosophers of the eighteenth century.

We had the pleasure of conducting a party of French actors through the grounds one day this Summer, and when we took them to the stage of the old Salt Lake Theatre and told them the story of the building of the great theatre in the wilderness, they were overcome by its beauty and idealism. We have working at the mission fourteen brethren and sisters who willingly give much of their time in coming to the Bureau of Information to conduct tourists through the grounds and buildings. They are very faithful, and are doing a very important work.

We receive letters from all over the world asking about Utah and the "Mormons," and while it sometimes requires weeks to answer them, information is sent as requested, and many of our letters have been printed in leading newspapers of the world. It is necessary that we missionaries become careful and comprehensive readers, for the questions asked cover a wide field of knowledge on religion, science, and philosophy.

During the months of June, July, and August we have averaged from eight to ten thousand people a week. The groups are cosmopolitan in nature. One day we had twenty-two states represented, and in another group there were thirteen nationalities represented. It is our object to welcome every tourist who comes here, and to make him feel that we are servants in God's house, and if there is anything we can do for him it is our desire to do it.

During the past year we have had a missionary class consisting of the missionaries of the Temple Block. To give you an idea of the instruction the brethren and sisters receive, I quote to you one of the twenty letters that was placed in their hands to study:

TO THE MISSIONARIES OF THE TEMPLE BLOCK MISSION

Dear Brethren and Sisters: In conversing with a company of tourists on the Temple Block, try to understand the nature of the people with whom you speak. The spirit of crowds is often very much the same, and there are some dominant personalities who will lead the conversation. In conversing on the GOSPEL, remember that you can give your views freely if you will bring your hearers to you. There are always so many vital truths common to all people. Belief in God and the great work of Jesus Christ our Lord will find a happy response on the part of your hearers. If you speak about the beauties of the Holy Bible and the Bible as a work of history and religion, you will win the people to your side, and then is the time to explain something of the GOSPEL OF JESUS CHRIST.

Let me give you an example of how I was able to interest a crowd not long ago. We were in a museum, and a woman read the words of Emerson inscribed on the wall: "MAN IS LORD OF HIS OWN ACTIONS." As she went to copy them, she asked how I interpreted their meaning. The crowd was interested, and immediately I had the opportunity of explaining to her the vital principles of the ethics of the "Mormon" people. We have the right to choose between right and wrong, and the choosing of right becomes more powerful on our part, as we discern the spirit of the Gospel of Christ by our lives and our attitude towards the world and humanity. In fact, the thought of Emerson opens up the whole theme of the gospel: Free Agency, Faith in God, the principles of the gospel by which we come to know the life that God would have us live. This was the way I interpreted Emerson's words, and the people listened.

Another little folder we issued is entitled The Missionary's Responsibility.

THE MISSIONARY'S RESPONSIBILITY

Any faith that lasts will teach righteousness toward man as a part of duty toward God. It was so in all the past and will be so in all time. Thousands of inscriptions exhumed in these modern times teach us this truth of the past and we have Christ's teachings and those of his followers to guide the present. In this particular mission field on Temple Square, we come in close contact with people from every nation, every creed, every race, every tongue. They come in a peculiar frame of mind—they are curious, open-minded, tolerant and pleasant and without fear of the petty worries and anxieties of every-day life. They are on a vacation, free and observant; critical and appreciative. For these reasons and many others I believe this mission to be the greatest in the world. When they leave us we want them to have the wish, the desire, the determination to know something of the truth we believe to be the everlasting and true Gospel. We wish to inspire them with our ideals, our faith, concerning what we are and what we know we ought to be. That "Power that makes for righteousness" and "A Power not ourselves" is the basis of every reasonable faith and all durable hope. We wish to impress them with a knowledge of this Power as it has been brought to us and as it has brought our lives to their present stage of righteousness "toward man"; and knowledge of what God is and what he has destined man to be.

We always meet these tourists and talk to them with this one thought in mind: "Therefore all things whatever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets." To live this law means a careful study of yourself, as well as a careful study of the attitude, the mind, and the feeling of the traveler, the tourist, the stranger, the brother who comes to you. We meet the learned and the simple alike. The gospel to them all should be intelligible, attractive, and convincing, remembering always that no truth is really important in our lives that cannot be simply stated. St. Paul expressed a fear for the Corinthians that lest, "as the serpent beguiled Eve, their minds should be corrupted from the simplicity that is in Christ." Robert Louis Stevenson said, "My duty to my neighbor is not to make him good but to make him happy if I can." Does not this state Christ's admonition in another form? This is simple and true. How do we like to be treated? Do we wish to express our views? To answer this imagination is absolutely necessary. We must for the time be the "other one." We must develop imagination or we are ignorant and dull.

Loving God, loving one's neighbor as one's self, doing justice is what the Lord requires of us. It comes to us through study, which is work; through prayer, through cultivation of imagination, and sympathy.

We are very anxious that the spirit of reverence be increased in our hearts, for these buildings and grounds so that the tourists may know rather from a spiritual influence than by words, that we have sincere faith in Almighty God. We show the visitors this great Tabernacle and our beautiful Temple. Marvelous buildings, they are. The Latter-day Saints were never so happily inspired as when they erected these buildings. A house of God or Temple such as this is a "part of the great picture book of humanity." As I look over this vast congregation to-day, I am reminded of the words of the priest, Abul-Fazl, which appeared on the portal of his temple in Kashmir:

"Oh God, in every Temple, I see people who see Thee,
And in every language I hear, they praise Thee."

We are often asked what these buildings represent, and the answer naturally brings out the resourcefulness and courage of the founders of the State of Utah. But they signify something vital and far more important than the average man appreciates. I want to say that these buildings express the conception of the all-loving Christ as the Redeemer of fallen humanity. This is the thought that inspired the building of them, and it has vitalized every bit of our creative work and ideals in our history.

I was impressed this morning by what Doctor Tada said to me.

He was to have left the building at 10:30 and when the hour came and I suggested that we go, Elder George Albert Smith was speaking, and Doctor Tada turned and said, "I beg your pardon, but let us wait until the gentleman who is speaking finishes his devotions to his God; then we will go."

The success in preaching the gospel of Christ lies in the method of approach. Impressions are lasting things, and if we can impress the people of the world with the spirit of our lives, it will go much further than words, "For he who walketh in the light has the truth, and the light shineth upon the paths of men." Much has been said at this conference concerning the ills of human society. The social order is in a furor and there are five principal ills afflicting humanity. They are the unprecedented challenge to law and authority; hatred between man and man; the abnormal aversion of work; the excessive thirst for pleasure as the aim of life; and the gross materialism of the day which denies the reality of the spirit in life.

I wish to add a larger element to this statement. Today there is a great misunderstanding as to the meaning of religion. The difficulty with the various Christian sects is that religion does not exist for the saving of the souls but for the preservation and welfare of society. If Christ our Lord taught anything it is the fact that "Pure religion and undefiled is for the saving of the souls of all men." The trend of modern sociology has resulted in a false conception of the word "religion."

There are three distinct things needed in the world today as forces to spiritualize humanity. First, a revival and adherence to the Ten Commandments given to Moses on Mount Sinai; the second is a renewal of faith in God the eternal father, and his son Jesus Christ; and the third a divine knowledge that in this day and age of the world the gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ has been restored by revelation. The priesthood, sacred in its gift, divine in its influence, and spiritual in its character, has been given to man directly by the power of God. These are the three great truths that must be taught to the human race.

The gospel of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ is a champion of the truth concerning the redeeming love of God, "and is the custodian of a particular and exclusive way in which the redeeming power reaches man." To have the right kind of belief in the plan of salvation is indispensable to right relations with God. We believe in the infinite power of the human mind; we hold to the truth that man is divine, and his personal power and individuality live throughout the countless ages of eternity.

I pray that we may grow in knowledge and in faith; and that the divine love of God will lead us to people with his divine message. Amen.

ELDER HYRUM G. SMITH

Presiding Patriarch of the Church

I am very grateful to be present at this conference, as it has been a year since I was present, not being able to attend the last general conference of the Church.

Just a year ago today (Oct. 8, 1926) I left Salt Lake City, in company with a group of missionaries, one of whom was our eldest son, who is now in Germany. At that time it was my privilege to visit the Northern States mission in company with President John H. Taylor. I enjoyed the spirit of missionary work manifested in the devotion of the young men and women who are in the field.

I was very sympathetic in my feelings when the mission presidents were making their reports, and declaring to us the testimonies and blessings that come to the missionaries and to the presidents of missions because of their faith and humility in the mission field. It is a sacred truth that the happiest time of our lives is while in the mission field, and in the faithful performance of our duty.

It is true, however, that the Lord blesses his servants both in the mission field and at home, for I am a witness of the fact, and I wish to take this opportunity to thank both the Lord and my brothers and sisters for their kindness, for I know that it is through the kindness of the Lord and the faith of members of the Church that I have thus far been so greatly blessed.

I am very grateful that the Lord has extended his mercy to me and given me a testimony of his work. I am very grateful for the privilege of doing what little I can in his service, because I feel that I am one of the weakest of the weak, and that it is an important privilege to labor in his service. I am also very grateful for the privilege of standing here, in the sight of those who are members of the Church, to acknowledge the hand of the Lord in blessing the people, for I have seen his blessings manifest as I administer in the stakes of Zion, and to individuals. I know that the Lord has blessed this Church and the people and that not only has he magnified those who are called into service and leadership, but he has blessed the people in their homes, in their flocks and in their herds. He has blessed us far beyond our gratitude and acknowledgement of his kindness. He has extended his mercy to the sick and afflicted, to those who are tried and those who have been deprived of many of their privileges.

I desire to bring to your attention one of the items that is so interesting in the Book of Mormon. We are told in III Nephi, 17:25 (I will not take time to read it. I think I can tell it more briefly), that the Lord, when he visited his people on the American continent, expressed his joy in meeting them and his heart was touched in kindness towards them. He blessed them, and we know that they received his blessings because they gathered around him in the spirit of appreciation and gratitude. After he had taught them pertaining to the Lord's Supper and had given them the emblems of his body and blood, which we call the sacrament, they further desired his blessings, and as they gathered around him they expressed their appreciation in fondness.

He desired to further bless them, and so he said, in words to this effect: Bring your sick and your blind, your lame and those who are afflicted; bring them hither and they, too, shall receive a blessing. And so they did. I imagine I see them now, going from home to home or from place to place, tenderly and lovingly bringing their sick and afflicted, and their blind and those who had caused them great care and anxiety, and there, in the love of the Lord he extended his blessings to them and healed and restored them. Then he further directed them to their little children, that they, too, might receive a blessing. They were brought, and the people saw the angels of the Lord ministering to their children.

This is only one example of how the Lord extended his kindness to the people that once lived upon this continent. He has been just as kind to us. I have seen the sick healed. I have seen the power and kindness of the Lord made manifest to his people. I have seen his blessings fulfilled upon little children. I have seen little children offer their prayers for the restoration of the sick and afflicted, and I have seen those prayers answered immediately; so that I know that the Lord still loves us and is still anxious to extend further mercies, if we will only hearken to the teachings and counsels that we have received in this conference, because the Lord in all his kindness, in all his anxiety to bless us, to heal our sick, to restore the blind, to comfort those who are in distress, and to bless those who are healthy and well, is bound by law. It is a wonderful thing for us to have the laws of the gospel, which are the laws of Christ, given to us in our own language and in such plainness.

Now, my brethren and sisters, let me plead with you as members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, accounted to be the most blessed people in all the world because of the wonderful opportunities that have come to us, and because of the fact that we have the gospel, the law of Christ, for we have all the blessings and privileges that the Lord in his kindness has seen fit to grant unto us for our happiness and our progress. Therefore we should express a greater appreciation for our blessings by greater diligence in serving the Lord, and by further preparation for the blessings which are promised unto the faithful.

I see in our midst a number of Lamanites, commonly called Indians. I am very grateful that they have faith as well as we do. They are descendants of Manasseh, and we are of Ephraim. The Lord has blessed the sons of Joseph who were sold into Egypt, and I was much interested when Brother Pratt made his report relative to the great nation of the house of Manasseh, for they truly are the descendants of Joseph, but they are the descendants through Manasseh, while we are the descendants through Ephraim. Now, there may be others of the house of Israel among us, but the great majority of people who love and enjoy the blessings of the Lord upon both North and South America, are the people of Joseph, and they are enjoying the blessings which were declared upon the head of Joseph and his sons Ephraim and Manasseh. So I desire to call your attention to the kindness of the Lord in blessing this land and the people who live upon it, both in North and South America.

I pray that the Lord will continue to bless us and further extend his kindness to us, and magnify us in the eyes of all the world, that the purposes of the Lord may be brought about through our efforts to serve him and keep his commandments. I know that it is a good thing to hold up to the world our good deeds and to strive diligently to make our deeds better, and to cause that our light should shine before the world, and to honor the Lord and to glorify him. I therefore, desire to put to the front the best we have, and acknowledge the hand of the Lord for his kindness in blessing us in our homes and in our congregations, in our fields, in our flocks, and in all that we possess. I pray for a continuation of God's blessing upon the land of Joseph and the people who possess it, upon President Grant and all the leaders of the Church, all who bear the priesthood, all who are called to lead and to direct, that we may further honor the Lord through obeying the teachings which he has given us in such simplicity and plainness, that we may be recipients of his kindness and mercy even unto the end.

I pray for these blessings and leave them with the Church and with this congregation in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

PRESIDENT HEBER J. GRANT

INTRODUCING STAKE PRESIDENTS

With the exception of some of the brethren who have been absent, all of the stake presidents have had the opportunity of offering a prayer in our general conference. There are still some thirty-three stake presidents who have not had the privilege, during the past five years, some of them during the past seven years, of saying anything in our general conferences.

I would appreciate it if the stake presidents, when they cannot be at our conferences, would notify us of that fact, because it must be a little humiliating for me to call upon brethren to pray or to preach for a few moments and they not be here. There are many occasions when it is not possible for men to be at these general conferences, and I have been very glad to receive excuses from those who are not here.

I am going to call upon some of the brethren to make five- or six-minute speeches. Of course, I do not know whether they are here or not, but I am going to start with those who have been longest neglected.

ELDER CLARENCE GARDNER

President of the Star Valley Stake of Zion

My brethren and sisters: While I feel my weakness and inability in addressing you this afternoon, I desire to assure you that I appreciate my standing in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints.

As I look over this congregation I feel that indeed it should be a great strength to the Church in going from this conference, in carrying with one the spirit that has been manifest during these meetings. I have enjoyed to the fullest extent everything said during this conference, the wonderful spirit that has been manifest by the brethren who have occupied this position. I greatly enjoyed the excellent remarks yesterday by the brethren who have been called and chosen to go out into the various parts of the world to lead the work of the Lord in proclaiming his word to the nations of the earth. My heart is filled with gratitude unto the Lord that I have had the privilege of going into the world and bearing testimony that Jesus is the Christ, that Joseph Smith is indeed a prophet of the true and living God. I am grateful also that my son has just returned from a mission after having spent two years of his time in the Eastern states in raising his voice in defense of the truth. I also feel grateful that I now have a daughter who is in the Northwestern states mission laboring for the advancement of truth in that part of the Lord's vineyard. I am grateful beyond words that I have been called and chosen to labor in the ministry of the Lord in one of the stakes of Zion. I desire from the bottom of my heart to fill and magnify my calling in a way that will be acceptable unto our Father in heaven, and also those who preside in this Church.

I feel that we are indeed a blessed people. I love my adopted state, the state of Wyoming. I was born in the state of Utah and moved to Wyoming. I want to tell you we have a splendid people there. For a number of years in our schools, and in our different gatherings, our children would sing of Utah, "Utah, the queen of the West," but today after years in that state our children have learned to sing "Wyoming, we love thee." And we do love Wyoming. We have a splendid people, and I find in my travels throughout that state that we are becoming established in every part of it. Branches are being organized in all parts of Wyoming. Therefore, no matter where we go, whether it be Canada, on the north, or Mexico, on the south, or whether it be in these stakes and wards of Zion, we find the same testimony borne, we find the same spirit manifest in all parts of the United States. I am grateful for this, and it is a testimony unto me that we have the truth, that we hear the same teachings, no matter where we go. As we meet upon these grounds, and as we meet our brethren and sisters in this conference, whether or not we have met them before, as we take their hands we feel that same good spirit coming from them, which to me is also a testimony that we are engaged in the work of the Lord.

May God grant unto us who preside in the stakes of Zion and those who preside in the wards, that we may enjoy the splendid spirit that has been given unto us, that has been manifest always, that we may carry that same spirit back to our stakes of Zion, and, as has been said here, seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness. Then I know that the Lord will be with us and make us equal to the great duties and responsibilities that rest upon us. God grant these blessings unto us, I pray in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER GEORGE E. BROWNING

President of the Weber Stake of Zion

My brethren and sisters: I appreciate the honor of being asked to occupy a few moments of your valuable time this afternoon. To me the associations of the Latter-day Saints is worth more than all else in life. Had it not been for the early elders in the Church having found my father in his native state of Tennessee, where he accepted the gospel, and moved to Nauvoo, where he was a neighbor of the Prophet Joseph Smith, from whence he came to Utah in the early days—had it not been for the first elders of the church going to England, where they found my mother, who accepted the gospel and came here, walking from Omaha to this valley, pulling a handcart all the way—had it not been for their faithful lives and for these glorious events I would not be here today. So I owe all that I have to the gospel.

I feel grateful indeed to my heavenly Father for the testimony I have, that the Prophet Joseph Smith was a servant of God raised up in these latter days to restore the gospel. I am thankful that I have a testimony that President Heber J. Grant, together with his counselors and the quorum of the Twelve are prophets, seers and revelators unto us, and I trust that I may ever be able to remain faithful and true unto the covenants that I have made. It is gratifying indeed to me to be associated with the faithful band of brethren and sisters who are striving to do the will of our heavenly Father, and for the blessings that we see following those who believe and practice the principles of the gospel.

I pray that the Lord may bless the youth of Zion; that we may all ever stand for the right, and against the wrong, and that we may ever remember that "angels above us are silent notes taking of every action. Do what is right." May we ever have the moral courage to stand up for our honest convictions and thereby gain the respect and love of those who know us, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER LEVI S. UDALL

President of the St. John Stake of Zion

My brethren and sisters: I have waited in fear and trembling for five years for this occasion, and I hope that I can attend as many more conferences of the Church without being thus embarrassed. But I do appreciate the confidence of my presiding brethren. I appreciate the privilege of coming here and partaking of the spirit of this conference, and of mingling my testimony of the truth of this work with those who have spoken before me.

The message that I would like to leave with you this afternoon is this: If, as brethren and sisters in the wards and stakes, you will avail yourselves of the opportunities that come to you to entertain the general authorities of the Church, and take them into your homes, I am sure you will never regret it. But on the contrary it will be the greatest influence in the lives of your children that can come to them. I speak as one who was reared in a home where the general authorities of the Church visited for thirty-five years. I believe that their association, their example and their teachings in my father's home have done as much as any other influence to inculcate a love of the gospel in the hearts of his children, and I would like at this time to thank the general authorities for their wonderful influence in my life and the lives of my children and those whom I love.

As has been stated in this conference by some of the previous speakers, the strength of the Church lies in the individual testimony of its members. We are not depending upon the testimony of the general authorities or upon the testimony of others, but each of us can, if he will but live for it and study, gain for himself that testimony that will give him a knowledge that this is the work of God in which we are engaged. It seems to me that we have some of the most beautiful principles in the gospel, and that the world should see them, and some of them have seen, as was quoted from Emerson, who said:

"The vice of our theology is seen in the claim that the Bible is a closed book, and that the age of inspiration is past."

This great thinker recognized what was the vice in their theology. Thank God we have, in our Church, inspiration, that we have books that have come to us, such as the Book of Mormon, the Doctrine and Covenants, and the Pearl of Great Price, which make clear the principles taught in the Bible, and to us the Bible is not a closed book, because we have with us the living oracles of God.

It is my testimony, my brethren and sisters, that the work we are engaged in is true. May God help us to do our duty. I desire in closing to read a verse from the Doctrine and Covenants:

"Wherefore, now let every man learn his duty, and to act in the office in which he is appointed, in all diligence."

"He that is slothful shall not be counted worthy to stand, and he that learns not his duty and shows himself not approved shall not be counted worthy to stand. Even so. Amen."

ELDER GEORGE A. LITTLE

President of the Oquirrh Stake of Zion

My dear brethren and sisters: This is not altogether a surprise to me. However, I was very much surprised this afternoon, because

I thought the time would be occupied by the other brethren who were called to the stand.

I am pleased and proud of this opportunity of standing before the Saints in this general conference. It has been my privilege to be called to preside over the Oquirrh stake which lies on the west side of this valley. It consists of five wards and about five thousand members. We are situated in the section where the Utah Copper and the American Smelting and Refining companies have their works. A large number of the members of our stake consists of men and women who are working for these companies. A great many transients come into our midst. One of the bishops, a short time ago, told me that there were 128 recommends sent out of his ward this year. We are receiving new people continually and others are moving out, and it is rather difficult for us to keep our organizations in working order, as we would like to have them. However, we have a faithful people, a class of people who are anxious to serve God and keep his commandments; and even though men and women come into our community and remain there only a few months, we find them to be good, faithful Latter-day Saints, and willing to do anything that God has asked them to do, or willing to do anything they are called upon to do by those presiding over them. We appreciate this. We appreciate the spirit that exists among the Latter-day Saints in our stake.

What a wonderful privilege it is to be a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. It is a Church of development, it is a Church of privileges.

When the brethren were reporting their missions today, it took me back to the time when I was called into the mission field, and I sometimes feel that I would like to be called there again. What a wonderful thing it is to go out into the world and preach the gospel to the people, and bear testimony to them, and to know that the gospel is true when you are preaching it to the people. When I went to the doors of the people to carry my message to them, it was a reality to me. I knew as I know today that the gospel is true, and I knew that Joseph Smith was and is a prophet of God. I knew that God had called his servants out into the world to preach the gospel, and I could not understand how it was that sometimes the people could not see and understand that our missionaries were really preaching the true principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ, because of the strong testimony that they bore and the earnest desire they had to carry that message to the people, and the Spirit of the Lord that accompanied them while they were doing so. The young men would leave their rooms with determined looks upon their faces and with an anxious desire to find someone who was seeking after truth. They would go from door to door and find some who would listen to them, but there were many who would reject them.

I am thankful that my father was a pioneer, and that I was born of goodly parents; that my mother was a pioneer. I am thankful that I have been born and reared in the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, and that I was born under the covenant. I have a strong testimony that the gospel is true. I am thankful for the privilege of bearing my testimony to you this afternoon, and I pray that God may bless us, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The congregation sang, "The time is far spent, there is little remaining."

The closing prayer was pronounced by Elder Nathan Ricks.

The conference adjourned until 10 o'clock a. m., Sunday, October 9, 1927.

THIRD DAY

MORNING MEETING

Sunday Morning, 10 o'clock, October 9, 1927.

The great tabernacle which had been comfortably filled by an ever-increasing number of people during the past meetings of this session of conference, was this morning filled in every space both in the galleries and main hall, and hundreds were standing in the doors and aisles. The Assembly Hall, where an overflow meeting was held, was filled to capacity, and many were unable to gain admission to either building, and remained on the grounds or in their homes listening to the services by radio.

President Heber J. Grant announced that the choir and congregation would sing the hymn, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet."

Following this song, which was sung with enthusiastic spirit, the opening prayer was offered by Elder Edward J. Wood, President of the Alberta stake of Zion.

A duet and chorus by members of the Tabernacle Choir sang, "An angel from on high."

PRESIDENT CHARLES W. NIBLEY

This is a glorious day for the Latter-day Saints. We live in a glorious land; for in spite of all the crime that is committed—and it is shameful that there is so much of it—this is the land of Zion spoken of by the prophets; and this country, especially this intermountain country, this western country, is the place for Latter-day Saints. We are a God-blessed people. If you don't think this is a goodly land, and a blessed country, go down into Mexico, our neighbor on the south, or over to Europe; go to Russia, to China or Japan, and you will return here and say this land, which the Lord in his mercy has given to us, is the best in all the world.

PROGRESS OF THE WORK OF THE LORD

We have heard during the sessions of this conference concerning the progress of the work of the Lord. I have been much encouraged and thrilled in my soul by the remarks that have been made, showing the evidences of the growth and development of this great latter-day work. We are commissioned to preach the gospel. Every elder of this Church has that mission. He should feel, as St. Paul expressed it, that "a dispensation of the gospel has been committed unto me, and woe unto me if I preach not the gospel."

WE ARE ALL MISSIONARIES

We are all missionaries in that sense, by the power and authority of the holy priesthood, and we ought to be filled with the spirit and determination to extend this work and to build it up. From almost every part of the earth come calls for more and still more missionaries. We can't get enough to meet the demand. Then along with the spiritual side, the necessity for more preachers of righteousness, there is a growing demand also on the material side for more meeting houses, for means to extend the work.

We say—and we prove it, too, by our works—that we do love this great latter-day work of the Lord. But do we do all that we should for it? The test of love, after all, is what will you do for the thing you love, the person you love, the institution you love, the country you love? How much will you do for it? Will you give your life for it? Will you give up your means for it? To what extent will you help to build it up in a material way? This tabernacle, for example, was not built simply by preaching and praying. It was built by hard labor. It took material, it took work, it took means.

BUILDING MEETING HOUSES

We have heard from the president of the Church down through the presidents of stakes and presidents of missions, of the wonderful development that has occurred in the building of meeting houses in the Church. Let me just give you some figures. I will read first the expenditure for meeting house purposes in all the Church for the year 1917. That is ten years ago and the people were doing well then, according to the means they had. The entire appropriation for meeting houses for that year, 1917, was one hundred sixty-eight thousand dollars. Now, in nine months of this year, just to the end of September, the trustee-in-trust has paid out in appropriations for stake and ward meeting houses, seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. For the same period last year, 1926, it was four hundred thousand dollars. So you see the amount appropriated for that activity alone, the building of meeting houses, has been enormous.

I hope the time will never come when there will not be a call for more meeting houses, because if such a time should come, there would be no more growth. Since we expect to grow and expand and to keep on growing and expanding, there will necessarily be additional calls for more meeting houses and more elders to preach the gospel.

ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT IN PAYMENT OF TITHING

One other item: Comparing the tithing of 1926 with that of 1917, it shows an increase in nine years of about forty per cent only, whereas the appropriation for meeting houses increased in the same period between four and five hundred per cent. I have not included the appropriations that have been made for meeting houses built in the missions. That is additional. I will not take the time to go into the details of the figures, nor in the increase of Church population, etc; it would take too long. But the point is that all this requires means, and I am under covenant, and you are under covenant, to furnish the means to build up this Church. How? By tithes and offerings.

In the observance of this principle nearly every member of the Church can improve, can't we? How many hundreds are there, not thousands, but how many hundreds are there in the whole Church who pay strictly and exactly one-tenth of all their interest? The revelation says one-tenth of all your interest annually. How many of us do it? There are some, of course, but there are not many who cannot improve and perform more fully this duty in respect to this matter.

The Lord commanded the law of tithing in ancient times. He has revealed it to us in this dispensation. You may read in Genesis that first of all, Abraham, Jacob's grandfather, paid tithes of all that he had to Melchizedek; and then Jacob, the father of the twelve tribes of Israel, made this covenant with the Lord: "Of all that thou shalt give me, I will surely give the tenth unto thee." In Leviticus 27:32, the Lord says this concerning the tithe of the herd and of the flock, "the tenth shall be holy unto the Lord." Solomon, in Proverbs, 3rd chapter, 9th verse, says:

"Honor the Lord with thy substance, and with the first fruits of thine increase. So shall thy barns be filled with plenty, and thy presses shall burst out with new wine."

In the last book of the Old Testament the Lord, speaking through the Prophet Malachi, reproved the Saints in that day. I don't think we need such a stern rebuke as he gave them, but these were his words:

"Will a man rob God? Yet ye have robbed me. But ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? In tithes and offerings. * * * Bring ye all the tithes into the storehouse, that there may be meat in mine house, and prove me now herewith, saith the Lord of hosts, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

THE LORD'S REQUIREMENT

Here was a challenge to them to prove the Lord. That same challenge is open to every Latter-day Saint today.

"And I will rebuke the devourer for your sakes, and he shall not destroy the fruits of your ground; neither shall your vine cast her fruit before the time in the field, saith the Lord of hosts.

"And all nations shall call you blessed, for ye shall be a delightsome land, saith the Lord of hosts."

You can read the revelation given to the Prophet Joseph Smith with respect to this principle of tithing, and that same thought occurs in it, namely, that if you will pay your tithing the very land shall be sanctified and shall be made holy. Let me take occasion to read a little of this revelation to the Prophet Joseph, given in July, 1838:

"Verily, thus saith the Lord, I require all their surplus property to be put into the hands of the bishop of my Church in Zion.

"And this shall be the beginning of the tithing of my people.

"And after that, those who have thus been tithed shall pay one-tenth of all their interest annually; and this shall be a standing law unto them forever for my holy priesthood, saith the Lord.

"Verily I say unto you, it shall come to pass that all those who gather unto the land of Zion shall be tithed of their surplus properties, and shall observe this law, or they shall not be found worthy to abide among you.

"And I say unto you, If my people observe not this law, to keep it holy and by this law sanctify the land of Zion unto me, that my statutes and my judgments may be kept thereon, that it may be most holy, behold, verily I say unto you, it shall not be a land of Zion unto you.

"And this shall be an ensample unto all the stakes of Zion."

THE SAVIOR'S VIEW ON TITHING

We have the commandment from the prophets of old, and here also is the command through the prophet of the last dispensation. I know it is contended by some people that the Savior in restoring the fulness of the gospel in his dispensation did not insist on the law of tithing, and that it was done away in the law of Moses, etc. Anyone who takes that position is entirely wrong, for here is the word of the Savior himself, in the gospel according to St. Luke, 11:42:

"But woe unto you, Pharisees! for ye tithe mint and rue and all manner of herbs, and pass over judgment and the love of God; these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

In other words pay your tithing, of course, but don't go around boasting about it as you do. This ye ought to have done, said he, and the other ye ought not to have left undone. So there is the positive injunction of the Savior of the world that the principle of tithing shall be observed.

HAVE FAITH TO PROVE THE LORD

My brethren and sisters, my testimony is that I could always get along better and be more prospered, more blessed and certainly more satisfied in my heart and soul, at the end of the year, if I got along with 90 per cent and gave the Lord his ten per cent. I have tried to do that; not perfectly, not as I should, but I have done it well enough to prove the Lord. I accepted the challenge which he made through Malachi:

"Try me and prove me herewith, if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

I have proved the truth of it in my own experience and to my own satisfaction. I know there are those who quibble about it and say: "Will 90 pounds of flour go as far as 100 pounds of flour? Will $90 go as far as $100? If you are spending a dollar a day, will not the one amount last 100 days and the other last only 90 days?"

Yes, mathematically you are correct, but, spiritually and counting faith in God and in his promises, you are all wrong. For "without faith it is impossible to please God." You may take as a sample a couple of men working—I have in mind two such men now. One spends all his means, and hasn't enough to pay tithes, he thinks. The other struggles along and pays his tithing. At the end of the year the one who has paid his tithing is better off somehow or other. He has had less sickness, less of what we call bad luck, and a better "break" as they phrase it, than the other man has had at the end of the year.

SANCTIFY THE LAND OF ZION—KEEP THE COMMANDMENTS

I bear witness before you, my brethren and sisters, that if we keep that law, the Lord, just as he has promised, will sanctify the very land, and it shall be the land of Zion to us. It is a land of Zion to the man who has paid his tithing honestly before God. He feels it in his soul. He feels that he is dwelling on a blessed, happy, prosperous land. He knows that he is keeping the commandment of the Lord. Do you not think the Lord, by his Spirit, will sanctify and bless the very land for us according to his promise? I know he will, I feel that way when I come on this block. Time and again, especially if I am alone, my hat goes off in reverence as I step inside the wall. Why? Because I feel in my heart and in my soul that the very ground upon which I stand is holy, sacred unto the Lord. It has been blessed by the power of the holy priesthood and it is sanctified, so that the spirit of reverence, the spirit of thankfulness to God comes over me, and off comes my hat in token of that reverence.

I know, too, that in our homes, with our farms, in our merchandising and all that we have, if we keep this law, we will sanctify to the Lord the land upon which we dwell, the homes in which we live, and all that we engage in; and we will feel the influence of his spirit and know by the power of the living God that we are helping to build up his work, far more, of course, than we would if we fail to obey this commandment.

HOW THE TITHING IS EXPENDED

I repeat, means are called for as well as prayers. Prayers are necessary, preaching is necessary, but it takes work, it takes means to build up the kingdom of God.

I have just given you enough figures to illustrate how the means are expended. I could give a great many more items. In closing, I just want to take occasion to say that the funds that you give to the Trustee-in-Trust of the Church are honestly and wisely expended with absolute integrity and sincerity of purpose, supplemented by the wisdom that the Lord gives. No man or set of men could expend them with greater care. I know that. I have known it for twenty years, for I have been in the Presiding Bishopric and with the President of the Church since that time. You can trust these men implicitly. They have not the first selfish thought for themselves with respect to any of the means. Every penny is as sacred as if it were held by any of your own family. You can depend upon that. President Grant is almost an exception among men in this regard. He almost leans over backwards in the strictness of his integrity and honesty.

PROVE THE LORD IN THE PROPER SPIRIT

Now I have taken all the time I should. The Lord bless Zion, bless latter-day Israel. May we as members of the Church resolve now once again in our hearts and souls that we will prove him, not in the way of challenge, not in the way of saying: "Here, I am giving you something, and I want a whole lot more in return." No, that kind of spirit in paying tithes will not get you any blessing. The Lord loveth a cheerful giver—one who can go to the bishop and say: "Bishop, I feel all right. I want to help the Church. I am going to do all I can. Here is my tithing, my full tithing. I want to build up this work and be the means of helping it." If he goes in that spirit, thankful for what he has received, he will obtain the blessing. But let him not give something merely in the hope of getting more in return, for that spirit will not do at all. Let him give in this spirit: "Lord, thou hast blessed me. Here is thy portion. Of all that thou wilt give unto me, I will surely give a tenth unto thee." The Lord bless you. Amen.

The choir sang an anthem: "The earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof."

ELDER STEPHEN L. RICHARDS

MESSAGE OF THE WORD OF WISDOM

I know of nothing wiser than the Word of Wisdom. I regard this great message from the Lord as being one of the most distinctive and one of the most vital contributions coming to the world through the Prophet Joseph Smith. Like all great messages and documents it connotes even more than it denotes. It is given in sufficient detail to obviate all ambiguity, and at the same time it is sufficiently general to have application to many phases of life and to all of those items which enter into clean living. It proceeds upon the assumption that the greatest thing in life is living, and that the most indispensable thing to good living is health—bodily, mental and spiritual.

We cannot contemplate a good man who does not have respect for the sacred institution of his body. God has given to us in this dispensation a new conception of the body of man. It is something more than earth and the elements of earth. We believe that the spirit is the literal child of God, that it comes to earth in divine providence to take on mortality, that while here it is housed in a tabernacle, that that tabernacle itself is made through the beneficent provision of the Creator in his own likeness. In that conception no one may defile the tabernacle, wherein dwells the spirit, without offering affront to God who gave it. He cannot pollute his body with poisonous or disintegrating substances without committing an offense against his God and his Creator.

SENT BY WAY OF GREETING

The Word of Wisdom has come to us in what seems to me the most excellent, the most pleasing manner possible to give a message. It came by way of greeting to the Saints, not by way of constraint—so it states—in which respect it has seemed to me to be comparable to the greatest messages which came from the Redeemer of the world when in the flesh he spoke to mankind. It rings with the same spirit as do the Beatitudes, wherein the Christ said, not by way of constraint, not in the thunder of commandment, but in that lovely spirit which characterized his ministry: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God. Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." So he gave to us this fundamental message of life and health and strength and purity, "as a principle with promise."

Is it less binding upon us; does it constrain us the less, because the Lord has said that it is pleasing unto him that we should do the things here enumerated and avoid the things here enjoined?

SPIRIT AND BODY CLOSELY RELATED

Within it comes to me the very genius of the philosophy of the gospel. Where is the man, impure in body and defiled, within whom may dwell the Spirit of the Most High? Is there not the closest of relation between the condition of our tabernacles and the spirits which therein reside? I take it that one of our supreme messages to the whole world is the word which comes from this transcendent statement of the fundamentals of our very faith: Keep clean your bodies and undefiled, in order that you may serve God and work out your destiny in mortality.

We have heard considerable during this conference relative to the disorders of society and the great iniquity which prevails in the land. If it were possible to make a survey of all those who have been guilty of infraction of the law, and who have perpetrated crimes against society, we should not find that the perpetrators of these offenses were men and women who have had sacred regard for the tabernacle of their spirits and kept clean their bodies which God gave to them.

The most serious, the direst consequences which follow an infraction of the Word of Wisdom in my judgment, are spiritual, rather than physical; for while the body may be impaired, the spirit suffers most. When the boy begins to smoke he usually ceases to pray, and when he ceases to pray he loses contact not only with our Father in heaven and his uplifting influence, but he often becomes estranged from his family and the best people and is thrown into environment which frequently brings his downfall.

TEACH PURITY AND CLEANLINESS OF LIFE

So, my brethren and my sisters of the Church, I charge you to go forth among the youth of Zion and give to them the lofty conception that we have of the bodies which God in his kindness has given to us. Do all that lies within your power to keep them from polluting these sacred institutions. Exhort them to preserve their purity for efficient service in the kingdom of our Father, for if they keep clean they will be fit instruments for the working out of the great purposes of our Lord. Let us devote our time and our energy, our preaching and our teaching, to the cleanliness of life that follows the keeping of the Word of Wisdom. I pray also that the message which comes from this great and remarkable statement given to us through the Prophet Joseph Smith may go beyond the confines of the Church into all corners of the earth, that men and women may understand that they are created in the image of God and have sacred obligation to preserve that image in all respects.

We love God. As we love him we will do what he asks. He has asked us in the most kind and affectionate way to do these things for our own welfare, for our prosperity, for our spiritual growth and development, for the preparation we need to make to carry forward his great work, to preach the gospel in its fulness, and to give to mankind proper conceptions of life. Surely as we love him we will follow his admonition and yield to his kindly persuasion. I pray that his spirit may attend us in the keeping of our bodies pure and immaculate, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER GEORGE F. RICHARDS

It is exceedingly gratifying to those who have responsibility for the conduct of this great latter-day work to witness the large attendance at this conference, this large Tabernacle being filled to overflowing, as well as the Assembly Hall, and great crowds of people on the grounds, perhaps thousands. And this, notwithstanding the fact that a great many people in their homes today are hearing the proceedings of the conference through their radio sets.

SALVATION AN IMPORTANT QUESTION

I have been edified and built up by what I have felt and heard during the sessions of this conference. My heart has been made to rejoice exceedingly. Every speaker has spoken upon some one or more phases of the gospel, and the gospel is given us that we might know what salvation is and how we may attain that boon and blessing. There is no other question of such great importance to mankind as that of salvation, of what it consists and how it may be attained. There is no other question that has engaged the attention of so many people as that of salvation, and perhaps there is no other question upon which there has been such a diversion of views and opinions. As I understand it, this is the cause of there being so many religious sects, creeds and denominations upon the earth today, and this fact is strange when we think that all these religionists have based their views and established their creeds and denominations upon a belief in the Bible, and its doctrines.

WHY SO MANY CREEDS?

It seems to call for an answer to the question: Why is it so? And I am reminded of the sayings of the scripture that prophecy came not in olden time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved upon by the Holy Ghost. The contents of the Old and New testaments, then, are the things of God given to the children of men by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. The trouble with men today, and the cause of this spiritual darkness that is found everywhere throughout Christendom is that men lack that spirit, the power of the Holy Ghost, that was enjoyed by the prophets who wrote and spoke the things contained in that sacred book, the Bible. If we had the same spirit, the same measure of that spirit, we would understand as they understood, and we would all understand alike.

REPENTANCE NECESSARY

Why do we not get the Holy Spirit, the measure necessary to understand these things aright? The answer is that we have not taken the course that is indicated by the gospel, by the scriptures, to obtain it. A man must be born again in order to even see the Kingdom of God. He must be born of water and of the spirit, to receive the Holy Ghost in the measure that it was enjoyed by the prophets who gave us the word of the Lord contained in the holy scriptures. We must be born again, first of the water and then of the spirit, but before we can receive these ordinances and these great blessings, our faith in God must be such as will be approved of him, that will lead us to do the things that he would have us to do, as fast as they are made known unto us. We must have that faith that will lead us to forsake evil and wrong-doing of every kind, to repent of our sins, to right the wrongs which we have done, as far as it lies in our power, and to forgive our fellowmen who have trespassed against us, even as we desire to be forgiven. Then when we receive the ordinance of baptism by immersion, by one having authority, and have hands laid upon our heads for the bestowal of the Holy Ghost, and confirmation to membership in the Church of Christ, our sins are washed away, the Holy Spirit comes upon us, even the Holy Ghost, whose office it is, and his mission is to bear witness of the Father and of the Son, and of the truth of all things.

OUR MISSION TO MAKE PLAIN THE WAY OF SALVATION

Our mission as Latter-day Saints is to the world to make plain the way of life and salvation. With us what salvation is and how it may be obtained is no longer a question. That question has been solved. We know the way. God our Father, because of his love for us, desires above all other things that we shall have salvation in his kingdom, exaltation where he and his Son Jesus Christ dwell, and that we might have salvation he has made the provisions of the gospel, including the atonement wrought out by his Son Jesus Christ. He has also given us the organization of the Church. One might ask why all this religious activity in the Church, and all that we see of the auxiliary associations? It is necessary; the salvation of man depends upon it. These children of Zion are to have their faith established, and they are to become so educated in the work that they in turn may be able to take responsibility and labor for the accomplishment of God's purposes. Why all this effort and this expenditure of means in the preaching of this gospel, as it is done by the Latter-day Saints? The answer is, the salvation of man depends upon it. Why the building of temples and the work that is accomplished therein at such tremendous effort and expense? The salvation of man depends upon it; and the salvation of man is the end in view that our Father in heaven has. All his works of which we have any account are but a means to that end, and it is because he loves us. The sacrifice made by the Savior—for he gave himself willingly as such—is the result of love for us, because we are the children of his father, because we are his brothers and his sisters. What a glorious truth, what a glorious principle, that we are born sons and daughters of God. That is why he loves us with a perfect love, because we are his sons and daughters. We ought to love him with all our hearts, with all our minds, and with all our souls, and serve him and keep his commandments, seeking to know his will concerning us and doing it at all hazards.

TESTIMONY

Brethren and sisters, I know that this is the work of the Lord. I rejoice in the light that has come to us through the everlasting gospel. I know that Joseph Smith was a prophet of God. I am not afraid to bear this testimony. I never have been. It is my responsibility, and it gives me the greatest of pleasure to have the opportunity to testify of these great facts. I know just as well that Brigham Young, who succeeded the Prophet Joseph Smith in presiding over this Church, was inspired of God, that he held the place the Lord prepared for him, and that his work was acceptable unto the Lord. And so I know of each of the succeeding presidents of this Church. They were the mouth-pieces of God unto this people, inspired of the Lord for their work, and the work has grown and prospered; and today he who stands at the head is an inspired man of God. We know him because he is mortal, and we see that which is mortal of him perhaps more apparent than that which is divine, but we who have association with him so closely bear witness to you as Latter-day Saints and to all the world, that Heber J. Grant has uppermost in his heart the desire to know what the will of our Father is concerning this great latter-day work and this people, and to do the thing that our Father would have him to do. He is inspired, has been and ever will be, and under his administration this work will go on and prosper. I know that this work will triumph, that it is our Father's work, that he is at the helm. Men cannot accomplish this. There is nothing that we can do without his help, but with his help, his purposes will be accomplished, and his name will be glorified in the earth. I bear this testimony to you, brethren and sisters and friends, in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER RICHARD R. LYMAN

WE KNOW NO PARTY

In time of war we know no party; all come to the defense of the country. In this hour, when Constitution and laws are being ridiculed, there ought to be no Democrats and no Republicans, no Prohibitionists and no Socialists, but only the one great party—the party of those who stand for law and order, for the Constitution of our country and the liberties for which we have paid so great a price.

* Surely this, the greatest country in the world, is not bringing up a generation of young folks who carelessly, recklessly, and thoughtlessly break the laws and trample the Constitution under foot, shouting in drunken laughter that this sacred document is "only a scrap of paper."

Four things I desire to mention in the few moments that I stand before you: First, the coming forth of the Book of Mormon; secondly, a brief reference to the teachings of this book; thirdly, the greatest problem that confronts the people of the United States at this moment—lawlessness and disrespect for law; and fourthly, in a few words, I desire to make an appeal to you, here in the tops of these everlasting hills, to come to the defense of the Constitution of the United States.

I. THE BOOK OF MORMON

My lifetime has been devoted to the study and the teaching of mathematics and engineering. I think I am not regarded as one given to hysteria. I have asked many scientific men to offer a solution for Joseph Smith and the work that he accomplished. I have not found anyone able to give any other explanation than that which we give; that is, that Joseph was directed in his work by divine Providence. One man might be deceived; but can you deceive three or four together?

THE THREE WITNESSES

"Be it known unto all nations * * * and people, unto whom this work shall come: That we, through the grace of God the Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ, have seen the plates which contain this record. * * * We know that these plates have been translated by the gift and power of God, for his voice hath declared it unto us. * * * And we also testify that we have seen the engravings which are upon the plates. * * * And we declare with words of soberness, that an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; * * * And it is marvelous in our eyes. Nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things."

THEY WERE NOT DECEIVED

Let us consider that testimony. Is it not remarkable, odd, strange—something new in the world? One man might be mistaken; but can three or four? Here are the Prophet and three witnesses. They say:

"And we declare with words of soberness"—three sane men, mark you—"that an angel of God came down from heaven, and he brought and laid before our eyes, that we beheld and saw the plates, and the engravings thereon; and it is marvelous in our eyes"—marvelous to me, marvelous to you, marvelous to all the world for an angel in these days to come down from heaven.

"Nevertheless, the voice of the Lord commanded us that we should bear record of it; wherefore, to be obedient unto the commandments of God, we bear testimony of these things."

In this skeptical age when the world doubts nearly everything, men might not be satisfied with the testimony of the Prophet himself and these three witnesses; so there are eight more, twelve in all, who bear also the same testimony:

EIGHT MORE WITNESSES

"Be it known unto all nations, kindreds, tongues, and people, unto whom this work shall come: That Joseph Smith, Jun., the translator of this work, has shown unto us the plates * * * which have the appearance of gold."

Does anyone suppose that these witnesses were deceived in that respect? They say the plates had the appearance of gold. People may object: "All that glitters is not gold; the witnesses may have been in error." But their testimony is: "They have the appearance of gold; and as many of the leaves as the said Smith has translated we did handle with our hands." Can eight men be so deceived? Can they come along, one after another, and handle with their hands plates which have the appearance of gold and be deceived as to their reality?

"WE HAVE SEEN AND HEFTED"

"As many of the leaves as the said Smith has translated we did handle with our hands; and we also saw the engravings thereon, all of which has the appearance of ancient work, and of curious workmanship. And this we bear record with words of soberness, that the said Smith has shown unto us, for we have seen and hefted, and know of a surety that the said Smith has * * * the plates of which we have spoken. And we give our names unto the world, to witness unto the world that which we have seen. And we lie not. God bearing witness of it."

I want someone who thinks these testimonies are not true, to account for them.

TESTIMONY OF THE SPIRIT

Those who were in the Assembly Hall this morning listened to the reading of the sixth chapter of Jacob in a silence as profound as I have ever observed in an audience. When you go to your homes, open that book. If you can read the sixth chapter of Jacob as it was read this morning, and can be impressed as was this audience, I believe that a light of heaven will shine into your souls, and bring to you the conviction which we call a testimony, that this is scripture.

II. TEACHINGS OF THE BOOK

A PERVERSE GENERATION

From Helaman, 13th chapter—that odd number 13—I shall read from the 38th verse, a few words spoken by Samuel the Lamanite prophet, as he stood upon the walls of the city of Zarahemla:

"O ye wicked and ye perverse generations * * * how long will ye choose darkness rather than light?" Does not that sound like scripture?—like the gospel of Jesus Christ? It seems to me that, generation after generation, as Samuel explains, the human family "will choose darkness rather than light."

CYCLES OF HISTORY

Nations go around in a cycle. Out of poverty comes religion; out of religion come character, honor, industry and dependability; the result is faith. Then come success, prosperity, riches—all the bright lights; but with these, temptation and that darkness spoken of by this prophet arise. Sin, iniquity, wickedness, follow this darkness, and thus again, the causes of poverty return. Within a few generations, we begin with poverty, rise into riches and success, then go back to poverty. Speaking to the people in Zarahemla, Samuel says: "In the days of your poverty you shall cry unto the Lord, saying, O Lord, canst thou not turn away thine anger from us?" Then he continues:

HOW TO BUILD MEN

"But behold, your days of probation are past; ye have procrastinated the day of your salvation * * * ye have sought all the days of your lives for that which ye could not obtain; and ye have sought for happiness in doing iniquity."

And does not the world, at this minute, seem to be seeking for happiness in doing iniquity? It is character, it is honesty, it is integrity, sincerity, dependability, that will bring stable success. This Church is struggling to bring up a generation of people having these qualities. The Relief Society conference, just adjourned, was struggling to learn what to do before and after children are born, to make them young men and young women with the qualities of Abraham Lincoln, upon whose life and character no limelight has yet been turned that is strong enough to find a flaw.

A CALL FROM LINCOLN

'In a proclamation, March 30, 1863, Lincoln said:

"We have been the recipients of the choicest bounties of heaven; we have been preserved these many years in peace and prosperity; we have grown in numbers, wealth, and power as no other nation has ever grown. But we have forgotten God. We have forgotten the gracious hand which preserved us in peace and multiplied and enriched and strengthened us, and we have vainly imagined, in the deceitfulness of our own hearts, that all these blessings were produced by some superior wisdom and virtue of our own. Intoxicated with unbroken success, we have become too self-sufficient to feel the necessity of redeeming and preserving grace, too proud to pray to the God that made us. It behooves us, then, to humble ourselves before the offended power, and to confess our national sins, and to pray for clemency and forgiveness."

INIQUITY BRINGS RUIN

Can doing iniquity bring happiness? Iniquity is the absence of character, honesty, integrity, virtue, sincerity, genuineness and dependability. It is the want of rectitude and uprightness; it is injustice, unrighteousness, and wickedness. Some of its fundamentals are drunkenness, immorality, gambling, crookedness. When I speak against these, I am teaching not only the doctrine of my own Church, but that of every church, of every philosopher. Educators agree that these vices will bring ruin not only to individuals, but to nations and peoples.

PROHIBITION AND PROSPERITY

I shall here refer to only one of these types of evil—the use of intoxicating liquor. The United States is enjoying unprecedented prosperity. The savings of the country in 1926 were five times those of 1914. In that year the savings amounted to but $6.71 per capita, while in 1926 they were $33.00 per capita, an increase of 390 per cent.

Many attribute this unprecedented prosperity to prohibition. The late Wayne B. Wheeler has said that since the war we have had hundreds of thousands fewer arrests and jail commitments per annum for drunkenness; that our drink-caused poverty has decreased 74 per cent, and that we have reached the lowest rate of pauperism that has been known in the United States.

John G. Cooper of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers says that prohibition is making a capitalist out of the worker; that when the saloon closed, the "Poor Man's Club" vanished, that it is being replaced by comfortable homes. He adds that labor is getting greater satisfaction out of an automobile and a decent home than it ever did out of the corner saloon.

No less an authority than Herbert Hoover says that our prosperity is due to the elimination of industrial waste and to the advent of prohibition. When prohibition was adopted we had in the United States 507 distilleries, which produced annually 288,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits; 130,000,000 of these were made into whiskey. We were maintaining 1,300 breweries, which made annually two billion gallons of beer. There was a saloon in nearly every business block of our larger cities.

HOW STANDS THE LAW?

Today, anyone who buys, drinks, gives, sells, or has in his possession intoxicating liquor is doing so contrary to the provisions of the Constitution and contrary to both federal and state laws.

III. LAWLESSNESS AND DISRESPECT FOR LAW.

The National Economic League which is composed of leading and influential men from all the States of our Union, has concluded that the greatest problem confronting our country today is "lawlessness and disrespect for law," due, they believe, first to indifferent public sentiment on prohibition, and secondly, to lax enforcement of the law.

Hoover says it is time for all good citizens to give attention to the following by-products of our prosperity: One, weakening of moral fiber; two, loosening of family and home ties; three, youthful criminality; four, easy breaking of the law by adults.

"GOD GIVE US MEN!"

We need in official positions, more men like John Wanamaker. To the end of his days, this man, perhaps the world's greatest merchant, regarded as one of his most valuable possessions a notebook in which were recorded the names of those with whom he had taken the temperance pledge.

When Postmaster General, he passed through the gay life of the Nation's capital without partaking of wine and without serving it upon his table. This unusual conduct brought censure and ridicule; but this broad-minded citizen passed without flinching through this fire of criticism.

Not infrequently young men were taken into his presence, while millionaires impatient for an audience with him paced his waiting rooms. When wealthy men expressed surprise at his neglect of them, he explained that those who came on spiritual or religious matters had come on the King's business, and that he always attended to the King's business first.

THE DAY OF EFFICIENCY

Not many years ago a lawyer would hardly think of standing before a jury without a few jolts of liquor behind his belt. It is not long since it was the rule to close a business deal with a drink. But that day has passed. In this age of efficiency, no man can trust himself to do business if his mental machinery is impeded by liquor. Competition is so keen that, other things being equal, he who drinks will fail.

In all seriousness I ask if the United States, or the people thereof, have partially lost the old-fashioned virtues of honesty, sincerity, sobriety, virtue; and dependability.

A PERILOUS TIME

Is it a time to look with indifference upon leading citizens and young people who are breaking the law?

In Salt Lake City recently a national officer in one of the social fraternities of the country said that all good citizens ought to be aroused to the seriousness of the situation. "Most of the young men who are in college today," he declared, "are drinking liquor." If so, what may we expect in years not far ahead? This subtle menace threatens the very foundations of our constitutional freedom.

IV. APPEAL TO CITIZENS

I appeal to you as good citizens to go to the primaries, to do your duty at the polls, and elect to office men who are concerned with the wishes and hopes of the people, not heeding the bidding of men whose principal interest is money-making.

THE HOUR HAS COME

The hour has come when a call ought to be issued for citizens to stand with the Boy Scouts and pledge allegiance anew to the Flag of the United States and to the Republic for which it stands.

A resolution of the judicial section of the American Bar Association explains that the United States has undertaken to suppress the age-long evils of the liquor traffic; that when, for the gratification of appetite or for gain, lawyers, bankers, manufacturers, merchants, and social leaders disobey and scoff at the prohibition law, they are aiding the cause of anarchy, promoting mob violence, encouraging robbery, and increasing homicide. Is it not time for us to call out for those who can save our country from lawlessness and ruin; time for us to exclaim with J. G. Holland, "God give us men"? Do not the times demand strong minds, great hearts, men whom the lust of office will not kill, whom the spoils of office cannot buy?

THE PRICE OF LIBERTY

American liberty has been purchased by the blood and lives of our ancestors. My own brother's son gave his life in the recent World War in defense of that liberty. The body of my own brother lies buried in the sacred soil of France, where he gave his life in the same cause.

Have such lives been given in vain? Are we losing respect for the Constitution, that document which Gladstone has called "the greatest state document of all the Christian ages"? Must voices be raised in the tops of these everlasting hills, calling to the people of the United States to come to the defense of the Constitution? Our forefathers, and our own loved ones have spent their lives for its principles. Are we unwilling to cast our votes for those who will honor it?

PRESIDENT RUDGER CLAWSON

My brethren and sisters: We have had a most glorious conference. I have enjoyed every moment of it up to this hour. The teachings of this conference have been equal to any that I have heretofore listened to.

A LARGE PRIESTHOOD MEETING

Last evening a great multitude of men bearing the holy Priesthood of God gathered in this tabernacle. It was a time of interest and instruction, and perhaps as largely attended a priesthood meeting as we have ever had in the Church. Represented there were all the orders and degrees of the priesthood of God. The duties devolving upon the priesthood are quite well defined in the revelations of God. You will pardon me if I refer briefly this morning to the Council of the Twelve Apostles and the First Council of Seventy, since I am quite closely identified with these councils. As to whether the Council of the Twelve and the First Council of Seventy enjoy the spirit of their calling, you Latter-day Saints are perhaps well able to judge. They are very close to you and you know them.

THE WORD OF THE LORD TO THE APOSTLES AND SEVENTY

The word of the Lord to Joseph Smith the Prophet, respecting these councils, will perhaps be appropriate at this time. In section 107 of the Doctrine and Covenants the Lord says:

"The Twelve are a Traveling Presiding High Council, to officiate in the name of the Lord, under the direction of the Presidency of the Church, agreeable to the institution of heaven; to build up the church, and regulate all the affairs of the same in all nations, first unto the Gentiles and secondly unto the Jews.

"The Seventy are to act in the name of the Lord, under the direction of the Twelve or the traveling high council, in building up the church and regulating all the affairs of the same in all nations, first unto the Gentiles and then to the Jews;

"The twelve being sent out, holding the keys, to open the door by the proclamation of the gospel of Jesus Christ, and first unto the Gentiles and then unto the Jews."

This is repeated in section 124, where the following language occurs. Remember, these sections disclose sacred revelations of God to Joseph Smith, his servant:

The "Twelve hold the keys to open up the authority of my kingdom upon the four corners of the earth, and after that to send my word to every creature."

And in respect to the First Council of Seventy, the "Quorum is instituted for traveling elders to bear record of my name in all the world, wherever the traveling high council, mine apostles, shall send them to prepare a way before my face."

THE LABORS OF THESE COUNCILS

You will remember that it is said that the Twelve is a Traveling Presiding High Council. Such is actually the case. They are not expected to preside directly in the Church, but are also required to travel, and so that has fallen to the lot of these two councils since the Church was organized. They are constantly on the road, so to speak, going or coming, whether at home or abroad, going into the stakes of Zion, when at home, to regulate the affairs of the Church in the stakes, under the direction of the First Presidency; to visit by rotation, some ninety-nine stakes of Zion. And you will perceive that it requires some time to get around and visit these stakes. At least ten, eleven or twelve stake conferences are held weekly, and at most of the conferences members of the Twelve and the First Council of Seventy are represented. What are they there for? To preach the gospel of Jesus Christ, to organize and reorganize wards and stakes of Zion, and to set apart to the callings of the priesthood presidents of stakes, high councilors, etc. And, having accomplished this work at any one or all of these conferences, the apostles and the members of the first council of seventy return to report their work to the first presidency of the Church. And I may say that these brethren have very great pleasure and delight in the labor that is placed upon them.

What about the nations? Well, as the Twelve and the First Council are required to have a very considerable interest in the missions of the world, we have some twenty-seven missions, it is the particular duty of the Twelve, and so stated by the revelation, to open the door for the proclamation of the gospel to the nations, and perhaps also to teach the gospel, by first opening the door and then sending the word of the Lord to the nations. It gives me great pleasure to report here this morning that the Twelve have accomplished, in my judgment, a very great work in respect to this matter. The door for the proclamation of the gospel was opened up to America, our beloved country, by Joseph Smith the Prophet, and the keys to turn this door were also committed by Joseph Smith, the prophet, to members of the Council of the Twelve.

The gospel was introduced into Great Britain in 1839 by Elder Heber C. Kimball, who was then one of the Council of the Twelve. He was accompanied by Orson Hyde, Willard Richards, and Joseph Fielding. They accomplished a great mission. The gospel was introduced into France in 1850 by Elder John Taylor of the Twelve; and in Italy in 1850, by Elder Lorenzo Snow; in Scandinavia in 1850, by Elder Erastus Snow; in Japan in 1901 by President Heber J. Grant; in South America in 1925, by Elder Melvin J. Ballard, who was accompanied by Elder Rulon S. Wells and Rey L. Pratt.

The Pacific Islands mission was opened in 1844 by Elder Noah Rogers and others. Elder Rogers was not of the Twelve. Elder David O. McKay and Elder Hugh J. Cannon visited the Pacific Islands mission in 1921. It was a complete and extended visit. They also went to China, and while Elder McKay was there in that distant land, he felt impressed to bless the land that the gospel might take root in the hearts of that people.

We are told in the revelation that the Twelve will not only take the gospel to the Gentiles, but also to the Jews. Perhaps the first step taken in this matter was the appointment, by the Prophet Joseph Smith, of Orson Hyde of the Twelve, who was despatched to dedicate and consecrate the land of Palestine for the gathering of Judah's scattered remnant, and also the scattered remnants of Israel. You will understand, my brethren and sisters, that since that time there has been a pronounced movement on the part of the Jews of the world to gather to Palestine, undoubtedly influenced by the sacred prayer that was put upon the land of Palestine and by the Spirit of God, who is directing in all these matters.

TESTIMONY

I rejoice in the integrity, in the faithfulness, in the devotion of my brethren and associates of the Council of Twelve and the First Council of Seventy. I know these brethren intimately. I think I have been able to look into their hearts, and to know how they feel. I know what they are doing. I believe that their labors are approved of the Lord, and that his blessing is attending their activities.

We members of these two councils rejoice greatly in the spirit of the gospel and are pleased to labor under the direction of the First Presidency of the Church. We love one another; we uphold one another in our faith. I believe, in fact, I think I may say that I know that the Council of the Twelve and the First Council of Seventy see eye to eye.

Of course, there are other councils in the Church, and there are a great many important callings. I might be pardoned in closing my remarks by quoting from Paul the Apostle, who is regarded as a very eminent authority on things pertaining to the work of God. He said:

"The Church of God is founded upon apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ himself being the chief cornerstone." Now, the Apostle might very well have added—certainly he might have truthfully added—that the Church of God is founded, or built, upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, of high priests, of seventies, elders, and of priests, teachers and deacons, because it must be very apparent to the Latter-day Saints that, after all is said and done, the real meaning of the pronouncement of the apostle was this: that the Church of God is built upon the foundation of the Holy Priesthood of God for that represents divine authority upon the earth. And it is by divine authority that the Church of God has been established and will be built up upon the earth.

This is my testimony. I know that Jesus is the Christ. I know it as fully and completely as I know that I live. I know that Joseph Smith was and is a true Prophet of God. He was a mighty man in Israel, and I bear this testimony in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir sang the anthem, "Awake, my Soul," by Evan Stephens. Benediction was pronounced by Elder J. Wesley Smith.

The meeting adjourned until 2 o'clock p. m.

FIRST OVERFLOW MEETING

In the Assembly Hall, 10 o'clock, Sunday Morning, October 9, 1927, an overflow meeting was held.

Elder David A. Smith, of the Presiding Bishopric, presided.

The music was rendered by the Ensign ward choir, Wallace Bennett, conductor, Alex Schreiner at the organ.

The choir and congregation sang: "Come, O thou King of kings."

The opening prayer was offered by Elder Axel A. Madsen, bishop of the Ensign ward.

The choir sang the anthem: "Fierce raged the tempest."

ELDER BRYANT S. HINCKLEY

President of the Liberty Stake

My brethren and sisters: It is perhaps known to many of you that the Liberty stake of Zion is located in the southeastern part of this city. This stake is about a mile and a half wide and three miles long, so that it occupies very little territory. Residing within the limits of this stake there are approximately 25,000 people, 15,000 of whom belong to the Church. It is an easy matter to walk from my house to any meeting house in the stake in twenty minutes and to make the journey over paved walks. In some sections of the stake, and I may say generally, the people are pretty well-to-do. They live in good homes, on an average better, I suppose, than the homes owned by the Latter-day Saints in many other places. Many of them are professional men. Many of them are successful business men. And withal one must say with pride, the people are good people. We know that it requires the same faith to save a rich man that it does a poor man, and that no man can buy salvation with anything as cheap as money. It requires the same humility and the same obedience and the same diligence to save a rich man that it does a poor man. We have fine meeting houses in our stake, good choirs. Every opportunity seems to be within easy reach of the people, but I am sure our problems are just as serious and just as difficult as the problems of the people who live in the remoter parts of the Church. It is a difficult thing to maintain in the Sacrament meetings the attendance that many of the wards on the outside maintain. I discover that it is a very difficult thing for a man who is prosperous, who is successful, who has gathered about him the things of the world, to exercise the same faith, the same humility, that he did in his humbler days, but nevertheless it is necessary.

I came from the country. I grew up on the soil. I came to this city when I was a grown man. Of course, I can never forget my love for the plain people. My early contact with the people of the soil has left forever in my soul an appreciation of their worth and of the contribution which they make to the Church and to society. I love the people of the city. There are no more faithful people in the world than some of the Saints who live in this city. I know hired girls who pay more tithing, I really believe, than many prosperous farmers.

I have enjoyed this conference very greatly. I think the reference made by the President of the Church, to the support that should be given to law and order, and the pride which this people should have in the great government of which they form a part, was very timely and fundamental. Whenever I am depressed with little things, my heart is inspired with two great thoughts that always cheer and comfort me. In the first place, I am devoutly grateful that I am an American. It is a proud thing to be an American. I firmly believe that the flag that waves over you and over me is the best flag that ever waved over any land or any people—made so by the heroism of the men who founded this Republic and who have maintained it. My heart was touched with the beautiful and dignified tribute which a distinguished visitor, General Summerall, paid to this people yesterday morning. I hope we deserve it, and I believe that we do. I am sure that "Mormonism" has in it the genius of the best civilization the world has ever seen. All good Latter-day Saints are good citizens. Poor citizenship is an evidence of poor affiliation with the Church. It cannot be otherwise. I am grateful for the government that shelters us, for the opportunity which it gives to its citizens. I love this land of ours. The Almighty in his infinite kindness has established our feet in the tops of the eternal hills and given us a place where the sun shines more days in the year than in any other place, where the skies are bluer and the water clearer. We ought to be good citizens, and we ought to stand firmly for the maintenance of the principles bred in the institutions which we love and cherish.

And I am grateful, my brethren and sisters, that I am a Latter-day Saint. I am not boasting, of course, of my devotion, but rejoicing in the thought that I belong to this people. We belong to a great Church. Every man and every woman who belongs to this Church is to be congratulated upon his opportunity, his opportunities for growth, for development, for the establishment of his character. The history of the past should inspire us, and the promises of the future should sustain us. It is a great thing to belong to this Church.

Stress has been placed upon missionary work during this conference. In no sense would I minimize the importance of that work. I know that the ingenuity of men never devised such a marvelous educational agency as the missionary system of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. There is nothing like it in the world. Boys go to the ends of the earth and bring back all they see, and enjoy the advantages of education that comes from travel. Now, that is only one part of it. There is something about putting a young man on his own responsibility and compelling him to make the Almighty his friend that has a marvelous influence upon him. A young man came into my office and when I looked into his face, I said to him, "Where have you been?" He said, "I have been to New Zealand. I have traveled around the world." Then he told me what he had seen. In the conversation he said to me: "What is the greatest thing you ever saw?" I had the inspiration, I believe, to say to him, "The finest thing I ever saw in my life is a boy in whose eye the fire of the Holy Ghost burns, in whose face is reflected the presence and power of the spirit of Almighty God." Isn't it marvelous that mere boys, modest, trembling boys, go away from home and come back in two or three years transformed into strong men? Have you ever seen anything that is quite comparable to that experience in helping a boy? I never have. It is wonderful.

Now, this Church has just three great things to do: First, to preach the gospel to every nation, kindred, tongue and people, declaring with a loud voice that an angel has flown through the midst of heaven and has revealed again, to earth, the gospel of Jesus Christ. We are trying to do that; we are doing it, feebly, perhaps, but doing pretty well. Now, the second is, to develop the individual members of the Church, to help them to grow into their best. And the third is to make a community which will reflect the spirit and power of the gospel. Now, my brethren and sisters, the great problem that always addresses itself to each of us is to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ in our daily contact. That is not so easy. I know men who have gone on missions and preached with power the gospel of Jesus Christ, but who, when home, under the influence of prosperity and ease, have grown apathetic and indifferent and careless. You know it is an easy matter to face belching guns when the delirium of war is on, but many a man who is brave in battle falls down supinely under the monotony and routine of daily life. Our mission at home is to "carry on," so that when men come from far and see what we are doing and get in touch with us, they will discover that back of our conduct there is something sincere and genuine, something that carries over. That is the acid test. God expects to make of us a great people. I believe that we will become rich and prosperous, if we are only big enough to stand it. If we only have that childlike faith that will enable us to practice the plain principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ, we will succeed. We wear better clothes than our fathers wore; we live in finer houses, eat finer food, but that is not fundamental. Have we a better quality of faith? Do we manifest that faith in more righteous behavior? That is the important thing. God bless you, my brethren and sisters, you men and women who come from afar to hear the word of the Lord, in whose honest souls a love of truth burns. You and all people of your kind are, after all, the salt of the earth, and your names will endure forever on the records of his Church. God help us all, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

ELDER GEORGE R. MAYCOCK

President of the Kolob Stake

"It takes a heap of livin' in a house to make it home." I know that my good teacher, Brother Hinckley, did not mean that Liberty stake has better homes; he meant that Liberty stake has better houses. I come from a stake so much larger than his that he does not really know that he has any troubles. Our stake is six miles wide and forty-five miles long, and we haven't any paved roads, and very few paved sidewalks. But we have wonderful people and a wonderful lot of homes, homes wherein the Spirit of God dwells, where people are trying to keep the commandments of God and where we are endeavoring to draw near unto him. I appreciate Brother Hinckley, my brothers and sisters. I have loved him for a long, long while. There came into my life some of his teachings in 1897, in the Brigham Young Academy, that have stood out from then until now. I am glad to follow him and the good things that he taught us in that class. I never have been, in another class, so filled with inspiration. I have never received teaching from another teacher that stood out in my life like the teachings of Bryant S. Hinckley, and so I love him and appreciate him and pray God's blessings upon him.

I appreciate the privilege of laboring in the gospel of Jesus Christ, and the responsibilities that have come unto me have helped me to appreciate more fully the blessings that have come; because I believe that as we labor we learn to love; because I believe that as we associate with our brethren and sisters and see their integrity and devotion and determination to keep the commandments of God, we more fully appreciate the gospel that has been given to us. We can see its fruits, we can see its blessings, and we cherish them more the more we work.

I love this wonderful country of ours, and I am glad that our brethren have talked to us about keeping the laws of the land. I desire to read a few words from Abraham Lincoln on this subject:

"Let every American, every lover of liberty, every well-wisher of his posterity swear by the blood of the revolution never to violate in the least particular the laws of the country, and never to tolerate their violation by others. Let reverence for the laws be breathed by every American mother to the lisping babe that prattles on her lap; let it be taught in the schools, in seminaries, in colleges; let it be written in primers, in spelling books, and in almanacs; let it be preached from the pulpit, proclaimed in legislative halls, and enforced in the courts of justice. And, in short, let it become the political religion of the nation; and let the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the grave and the gay, of all sects and tongues and colors and conditions, sacrifice unceasingly upon its altars."

My brothers and sisters, I wish we could get that into our souls and appreciate the fact that we should not only live the law ourselves but that we should sustain it by assisting others to live it. We have, to a certain extent, a responsibility in this regard, because we are American citizens. I have been in a position the last few years to know something about the enforcement of law, and I have seen some of the results that have come from people stepping over just a little. First we break some of the lesser laws, disregard some of the lesser things, and then our conscience is seared to the extent that we can disregard some of the greater ones. And in our disregarding those things we are setting examples to those with whom we associate. I wish that every mother in this great country of ours could say to her boy and to her girl, "I want you to live the laws of the land as your father lives them." But what would be the condition if our mothers did that? We sometimes are prone to try to cover up our actions, to try to break the law and not let anyone know it. But there is always someone to watch. There is that boy and that girl who are always seeing and always imitating what the older ones do. This summer we raised a little garden at the back of our house, and not so long ago I took the hand plow and went out and was pushing that plow in the garden. As I stepped in the loose soil after I had plowed it, I looked back and there was our babe, nearly four years old, following. I said, "What are you doing?" "Walking in your steps." My brethren and sisters, there came tears to my eyes. I said to myself, "Am I leading aright? Am I willing that my child should walk in my steps in all the things that I do?" If I can so live that I am willing that they should, if I can so live that my children can appreciate the gospel and appreciate the country in which we live, because they have walked in my steps, then I shall feel that my mission has been well filled.

It is not only in the laws of our land but in the laws of our Church that we must keep the commandments. You know the prophet said that there has been a law irrevocably decreed in heaven before the foundation of the world, upon which every blessing is predicated, and if we expect to receive the blessing, we must keep the law upon which it is predicated. Too many of us, my brethren and sisters, are trying to dead-head our way into heaven. Too many of us are expecting to be judged in that great judgment day by the things that we believe rather than by the things we do. The apostle of old said, "The devils also believe, and tremble." The Latter-day Saints believe the gospel. I have a friend who never did anything for the Church; in fact, he scarcely knew that he belonged to the Church. He went away and someone attacked "Mormonism," and he began to defend it, but he defended it not as the "Mormon" elders defend it, but with his fists. He believed the gospel, and when the time came that he had to defend it, he defended it the best he could. Will we be judged by the things we believe? If we must keep the commandments to receive the blessings, it is time that we begin to work.

There are three great commandments revealed that will give to us, as Latter-day Saints, every blessing, I believe, that we could desire. The first thing, it seems to me, that we need—the very first thing that we need as Latter-day Saints, is the Spirit of God to attend us continually, and there is an ordinance given that if we would gather together on the Lord's day and partake of his sacrament and covenant to always remember him, we will always have his Spirit to be with us. I have sat in congregations of the Saints and have watched them partake of that sacrament, have seen them put out their hands—in fact, I believe I have done it myself on many occasions—with my mind just as far away from that ordinance as it was possible for it to be, not remembering him always, not remembering him even while I was partaking of the sacrament. I believe that we should keep that commandment. I believe that we should partake of the sacrament regularly and always remember him, in order that we may have his spirit to be with us.

And then, after we have his spirit to be with us, we want next wisdom and knowledge and understanding; we want health and strength. And if we will read the eighty-ninth section of the Doctrine and Covenants, we can read there the commandment by which we can receive these blessings—wisdom, knowledge, and understanding, and health and strength, and not only that, but we have been given the promise that the destroying angel shall pass by us, even as in the days of the children of Israel, and not destroy us.

And after we have received those blessings, my brethren and sisters, if we turn to the fifty-ninth section of the Doctrine and Covenants, we can read there the commandments by which all things else, it seems to me, that we may need will come unto us; because we are told in that section (and with your permission I will read a few verses):

"And that thou mayest more fully keep thyself unspotted from the world, thou shalt go to the house of prayer and offer up thy sacraments upon my holy day;

"For verily this is a day appointed unto you to rest from your labors, and to pay thy devotions unto the Most High;

"Nevertheless, thy vows shall be offered up in righteousness on all days and at all times;

"But remember that on this, the Lord's day, thou shalt offer thine oblations and thy sacraments unto the Most High, confessing thy sins unto thy brethren, and before the Lord.

"On this day thou shalt do none other thing, only let thy food be prepared with singleness of heart that thy fasting may be perfect, or, in other words, that thy joy may be full.

"Verily, this is fasting and prayer, or, in other words, rejoicing and prayer.

"And inasmuch as ye do these things, with thanksgiving, with cheerful hearts and countenances, not with much laughter, for this is sin, but with a glad heart and a cheerful countenance—

"Verily I say, that inasmuch as ye do this, the fulness of the earth is yours, the beasts of the field and the fowls of the air, and that which climbeth upon the tree and walketh upon the earth;

"Yea, and the herb, and the good things which come of the earth, whether for food or for raiment, or for houses, or for barns, or for orchards, or for gardens, or for vineyards."

All are ours, my brethren and sisters, by keeping the commandments of God.

I bear you my testimony that we are laboring in the cause of Christ, that we are in his Church, which is indeed the power of God unto salvation. Every fibre of my soul declares unto me that these things are true. My brothers and sisters, I pray that we may live to show to the world that they are true, for our actions will show more than our words. May the blessings of God attend us in this conference and throughout our lives, I pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOSEPH J. DAYNES

President of the Grant Stake

I sincerely trust, my dear brothers and sisters, that I shall enjoy the spirit of this conference, that the Lord will direct me in what I shall say, that I shall enjoy your sympathy and good will, and that my efforts shall be the means of stimulating myself to better action and perhaps of helping those of you who are here.

I appreciate the responsibility that comes to an elder in this Church when called upon to speak to the Latter-day Saints. I appreciate that we should undertake to believe in the principles that we advocate. I have observed in this conference, since its opening session Friday morning, that the theme generally has been that of law and its enforcement, all of which I feel to endorse and feel to appreciate its importance. There are many laws that are given to the people of the city and nation which are given for a benefit and a blessing; first, to teach us to respect the rights of others; and secondly that in respecting the rights of others we may grow stronger ourselves. There are other principles that have been given not in the way of legislation by the authorities of the land, but laws and commandments given unto us by our heavenly Father.

One of these principles, known as the Word of Wisdom, has been touched upon more or less during the conference. Being a profound advocate of this doctrine I have been impressed with its importance, and with your kind permission would like to consider some of its many phases. It really surprises us very much to observe that when we are subjected to an examination, that as to our own strength, in the living and observance of this law of the Church, that we have many shortcomings, and fail to measure up to the ideals and standards of a typical Latter-day Saint.

One great authority has said that in the United States, during the year 1925, there were consumed sixty-nine billion ready-made cigarettes, which would mean that during that year every man, woman and child consumed 690 ready-made cigarettes—not counting the number of hand-made cigarettes, cigars, and tobacco. It would be unfair to say that this startling condition exists only in other states, for Utah, the land in which we live, has undoubtedly contributed its share. From the records that have been published it may be well for us to see as to what extent Utah has been a contributing factor in the consumption of some of these articles. During the year 1924 the residents of the State of Utah, including of course all classes, and not Latter-day Saints alone, actually threw away:

|----------------------|-------------|
| For coffee | $2,000,000 |
| For cigarettes | 1,500,000 |
| For tea | 1,500,000 |
| For tobacco | 2,000,000 |
| Total | $7,000,000 |

I have not given an estimate as to the amount of money involved in the purchase of liquor, because that perhaps would be beyond computation.

I have taken this sum of $7,000,000; and have done a little figuring to see what we could accomplish if this sum of money were applied in legitimate channels for the development and growth and upbuilding of our communities, and this is what I observe. We could buy any one of the following things: ten million bushels of potatoes, seventy million loaves of bread, seventy million quarts of milk, 2,500,000 pairs of shoes, 100 million streetcar fares—in fact, this money, if applied, would ride the entire population of Salt Lake City, estimated at 140,000 people, to work and return every day for one year. It would buy 14,000 Ford automobiles. You could take a series of one-dollar bills, standing them up end to end, and construct a fence reaching from Salt Lake City to Los Angeles. It would build 230 meeting houses, at an average cost of $30,000. Assuming that it would cost $500 per year to maintain and sustain each of the students in attendance at the following schools for their living for the entire year, it would provide the education and living for the total enrollment of the student membership of the University of Utah, the Agricultural College at Logan, the L. D. S. College here in this city, the East High School, Salt Lake City, the West High School, Salt Lake City; the Brigham Young University at Provo, the Granite High School, and perhaps others. A total of 14,000 students could be taught and educated for a whole year for this money. And further, let me state that if this money were used legitimately and honorably, it would pay the entire taxes for the State of Utah for the whole year. It would take 2,000 people on a tour around the world extending over a period of three or four months, giving to each one the sum of $3,500 for expenses.

It may be interesting for you to know that in the United States there was expended in the year 1923 for tobacco alone, the amazing sum of 900 million dollars, for liquor two billion, while for furniture which contributes to the happiness and joy of every home, there was expended but 375 million. As we think of this inconceivable amount of money that is expended for these non-essentials, is it not time for us to consider as to what extent we may be contributing to these abuses? As a means of giving us a better understanding as to how to enjoy wisdom in all of our daily undertakings, I feel that a proper understanding of this precious revelation is most vital to every Latter-day Saint family.

In view of these alarming conditions might it not be well to ask ourselves the question, as to what we are doing to rectify the same? You will recall in the revelation given through the Prophet Joseph Smith on the Word of Wisdom, the declaration is made that these stimulants are not good for the human body. Are we exercising the proper restraint ourselves, and are efforts likewise applied in teaching our children, that the use of these beverages and narcotics can only work to their spiritual and physical detriment?

I feel to compliment and congratulate those who regard this principle as vital, and who undertake to observe this law. For those who are weak and apparently not able in and of their own strength to overcome, I earnestly pray that the Lord in his infinite mercy shall give them that added strength that they may be successful in their righteous desires.

I earnestly pray that the means, the talent and the ability that God has given us, will be at all times used in honorable and legitimate pursuits. God help each of us to know our duty, and give us the strength always to properly apply it, I ask in the name of Jesus Christ, Amen.

A solo, "How beautiful upon the mountains" was sung by Arvilla Allen.

ELDER HENRY A. GARDNER

President of the Palmyra Stake

Realizing my limited knowledge and ability, I feel very keenly, my brothers and sisters, the responsibility that rests upon me at this moment, and I humbly desire that the prayer that was offered by our brother at the beginning may be made manifest in my behalf, that I may be able to say something to encourage you along the pathway of life. Like Paul of old, I am not ashamed of the gospel of Jesus Christ, for I realize and know that it is the power of God unto salvation. I have been taught the principles of "Mormonism" from my youth up and have been taught to honor and sustain those who are in authority over me, and as I come to these conferences and gaze into the faces of the brethren who preside over this Church, I go home with a renewed determination and desire to press on in this great latter-day work. It seems to me that there never was a time in the history of our Church when the Lord has fortified us with men to lead and guide us as he has at the present time. Coming yesterday morning, as I read the Tribune and saw on the front page a picture of the First Presidency of the Church as they were taken just before entering the tabernacle, I thought, what a wonderful team of men—well fitted and qualified for the great responsibility of leaders of this people! With the other brethren, I thank God that I am a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, for I realize that this is God's work. Though we may fall by the wayside, this work will go on, for it is God's. "Mormonism," so called, is the gospel of the Lord Jesus Christ. To me it is the grandest, noblest, broadest religion in all the world, for it not only accepts the truth that we have, but accepts the truth, the virtues and the praiseworthy things that we find in men, in churches, and in associations wherever they may be found. We are told to seek after the things that are elevating, that are uplifting and praiseworthy.

I come from the Palmyra stake, situated in the southern part of Utah county. We are there a common people. I thank God that I am among the common people, for I realize that if we are humble and willing to let the Spirit of God work upon us and actuate our lives, we shall be fitted and prepared to enjoy our offices and callings as members of the Church.

Much has been said during this conference relative to law and order. It seems to me that the Latter-day Saints have been taught from their youth that the Constitution of the United States, and that great document of human rights, the Declaration of Independence, were written by men inspired of our heavenly father. Mr. Babson said recently, "The United States of America at the present time is blessed with everything except religion." I feel that not only as a nation, but sometimes as a people, the thing we need most is a return to simple faith in God our Father. We need in our home-lives more of the Spirit of God to lead and guide us. We need to have more family prayer. We need to pray in the spirit and meaning of the word.

I remember a little poem I learned a number of years ago. It went something like this:

I often say my prayers,
But do I ever pray?
And do the wishes of my heart
Go with the words I say? -

I may as well kneel down
And worship gods of stone,
As offer to the living God
A prayer of words alone.

Prayer without the faith
The Lord will never hear,
Nor will he to those lips attend
Whose prayers are not sincere.

If we go back to the beginning of this Church, we find that the Prophet Joseph Smith went out to the lonely grove that he might offer up a simple, earnest prayer to his heavenly Father, desiring to know which of all the churches then existing upon the earth was the true church of God; for they were saying, "Lo, Christ is here," and "Lo, Christ is there." It was that simple, earnest prayer that reached the throne of glory, and God our Father condescended to come and visit him on the earth. What glorious news to the children of men, to know that God lives, has spoken again, and has revealed in this day and age his Son Jesus Christ unto the world. How thankful we as a people ought to be! We ought to be willing, my brethren and sisters, to sing the song with the full meaning of the word, "We thank thee, O God, for a prophet, to guide us in these latter days." And when we are thinking and speaking of this great Church of ours, I sometimes wonder, my brothers and sisters, if there is not too large a difference between the prayer that we speak or utter and the lives we lead. Everywhere we go, up and down in this state and other states, we find the urgent need of the application of the ideals and principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ which we believe and teach, more earnestly, adopted in our daily lives. We need the principles of the gospel of Jesus Christ preached not only from the pulpit but taught and preached by the example of the lives that we live. I want to tell you as a servant of God that I believe he is not pleased with us as a people unless we do our duty. He is willing, I believe, to draw near unto us if we will give him the opportunity, if we draw near unto him. Not everyone who saith unto him, "Lord, Lord," will enter the kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of the Father, which is in heaven. We talk about Latter-day Saints and our Church, and I grant you it is a wonderful Church, for me it is the Church of God; but I sometimes wonder, and I wondered this morning as Brother Daynes read to us some of the statistics regarding our own fair state—the tremendous amount of money expended for those things that the Lord tells us in a simple way are detrimental to our health—I wonder if we are really and truly living up to the principles that are taught to us? Do those statistics indicate to us that "Mormonism" is not functioning as it should function, that we have not the faith to live the gospel as we believe it? Or does it simply show, my brethren and sisters, that we are not able to reach the goal that is set for us?

I hope and pray that we shall remember the counsel and advice given to us by the leaders of this Church, that we may be fitted and prepared for the great responsibility that rests upon us as members of this Church in carrying the great message of peace on earth and good will to the sorrowing hearts of mankind. Jesus Christ did for us the thing that we are not able to do for ourselves, and made it possible for us to have the glorious privilege and opportunity of worshiping God according to the dictates of our own conscience and carrying this great message to the sorrowing world, that they too may enjoy the glorious principles of Salvation and life that we possess. Everywhere we go we find the urgent need of the principles of truth, honesty, and integrity that we believe in, to be practiced and applied in the lives of the people. We are told in the Book of Mormon that the people of this land shall prosper as long as they believe and obey the will of the God of the land—meaning that if we do not obey the principles of truth and righteousness, even this fair country of ours, the grand old United States, may see perilous times.

I sometimes feel that unless we believe the principles of the gospel in our daily lives we may stumble by the wayside. Only recently I had a conversation with a brother who said to me, "Brother Gardner, that which I used to know, I do not believe now." And I said to him, "I wish that you would come back again, when I have a few moments, that we may have a heart-to-heart talk together." And, as he enumerated to me some of the things that had happened in his life—for I knew that at one time he was a faithful brother in the Church; I had listened to him bear testimony of the divinity of this work, and had been inspired and touched by the sincere words that he had uttered—I found out that perhaps some time or other in his life he had been disappointed, had failed to reach some particular office, or that some brother in authority had failed to show him the proper recognition, or had hurt his feelings, and that because of such action he had become dark and gloomy and had drifted away from the Church. It seems to me that there can be no sadder picture painted than that of a man who has been instrumental in instilling in others the principles of the gospel and in showing others the pathway of life, who has planted faith and determination in the souls of men and women to serve God and keep his commandments, and at the closing days of his life comes and says to a young man whom he has inspired, "That which I used to know, I do not believe now."

Oh, I want to tell you there is no greater joy in this world that can come to any man living than the joy of rendering service in the Church of God. Oftentimes I feel my weakness and am very humble in trying to go about to inspire and teach others to do their duty in this Church, but I want to acknowledge to you that I know this is the gospel of Jesus Christ. I feel it in every fiber of my soul that Joseph Smith was a prophet of the true and living God. I feel, my brethren and sisters, that it is your responsibility and mine, in order that we may fulfil the great destiny that God our Father intended that we should.

I do want to say to you, let us be watchmen upon the towers. Let us remember who we are. Let us remember that as fathers and mothers it is our responsibility to see that our children are taught, that we do have family prayer, that we do pray with earnestness and sincerity, that we may enjoy God's blessings, and that we may be watchmen for our children and our neighbors' children, that we may be indeed our brother's keeper. But above all, may we keep ourselves clean and unspotted from the world, that the Spirit of Christ may be in our hearts and homes. For if we have a contented home, we are a contented people; and if we keep the commandments of God, we shall have joy in this world and in the world to come.

May the Lord bless us with the power of appreciation, that we may have in our hearts a love for the truth. May we have a desire to acknowledge the hand of God in our many blessings, and be willing to bear testimony of the divinity of this work, not only abroad but to the rising generation. I want to tell you that there are hundreds and thousands, not only of the older brothers and sisters but of the younger brothers and sisters, who are hungering and thirsting for the Word of God. We need to teach them the simple truths of "Mormonism." We need to implant in their hearts and lives a testimony not only of the divine mission of the Prophet Joseph Smith but of the divinity of Jesus the Christ, and that this is his work. May we be equal to the responsibility that rests upon us, I humbly pray, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER DAVID A. SMITH

Of the Presiding Bishopric

I rejoice, my brethren and sisters, in having the privilege of meeting with you.

Yesterday I appeared in the tabernacle in the uniform of an officer of the United States army, and many wondered why I should be about my official Church duties so attired. In explanation, let me say that as a reserve officer of the United States army, I was under orders yesterday to go to the station and meet General Charles T. Summerall, Chief of Staff of the United States army. His program had been arranged before he reached here, but in conference with the officers at Fort Douglas and the reserve officers in charge here, the suggestion was made that it might be interesting for the General to look upon a congregation of Latter-day Saints in conference session. Accordingly, we planned for it, with the permission of the Presidency of the Church, and yesterday morning as General Summerall arrived in the city an invitation was extended to him to attend and address the congregation. In order that he might do this, it was necessary to shorten his inspection tour at Fort Douglas and the University of Utah. Upon leaving the tabernacle, he expressed his appreciation for the privilege he had of sitting upon the stand and looking upon that vast congregation, and for the music, and for the privilege of saying a few words from the pulpit of that wonderful building. He left yesterday afternoon to continue his inspection tour of the army posts of the United States. One of the great outstanding features of his tour will be, I am sure, his visit with us.

While mentioning this, perhaps it will be proper for me to say that after the World War, I was offered a commission and refused to accept it, feeling that there was no further need of my serving in that capacity, knowing that my Church work was all I could possibly expect to do. Finally request was made of President Nibley, who at that time was Presiding Bishop. He authorized my enlistment. I was called before a board, and a commission with the rank of Major in the reserve corps was given to me. I have since been called to the Presidio of San Francisco and for two years have been a member of the Ninth Corps Area Conference Committee. This work I found to be very interesting, for it gave me an opportunity to study army life in all its phases.

One little experience I had there may be interesting to you. As members of the Conference Committee, we were lined up waiting to take conveyances to go on a tour of inspection, when the officer in charge called my name and stated that I was to ride with the Commanding General. I hardly knew what to expect of it. I was almost the junior officer, and as I stepped out of line, my companion from Utah, who was standing near, and who is not a member of this Church, said: "Now, bishop, cut out that Church influence." I did not realize that it was Church influence for the moment. I was somewhat bewildered, but I had the privilege that day of riding with the Commanding General, stepping ahead of men who held higher offices; men of greater service and experience. It was not until a few days later that I found out what this Church influence really consisted of, that it was not I who was being honored; it was you. It was your sons, your brothers, your fathers. And I, as your representative, was receiving the reward for your service and activity.

As a member of that committee it was my privilege and duty to visit all departments of army work. It was my privilege to go into any office, of any department, of any officer, from the Chief of Staff down, to find, if possible, conditions that could be improved. In this work I discovered why I had been so honored. I found in all activities that Utah stands at the head. I found that the University of Utah as a R. O. T. C. school stands in the first rank. That our high schools—the Ogden, the East High and the West High, were outstanding in their work. I was proud of them. I found that in all our war work, whenever we have been called into service, every demand made by the war department had been met, and met admirably. Then I fully realized that it was not I who was being honored, but you, this people.

Last March I was called to attend a conference in Washington. With nearly three hundred men we stood out in front of the Interior building for the purpose of having a picture taken. I was standing about four rows back, where my rank required that I should be. My name was called, and I was requested to step down to the front. As I did so, all eyes were turned upon me, for they wondered what was going to happen and I wondered also. General Summerall, who addressed us yesterday, was standing in front of that group. I was requested to take my place at his side. And there I stood while pictures of the group were taken. I realized this time that it was not I who was being honored. I have met with high ranking officers many times, I have been a dinner guest in the homes of many, I have had an opportunity of finding out what these officers were doing, trying to do and hoping to do; of knowing what they thought of you as a people and of your sons, and they do appreciate every helpful service.

I am not a prophet, and I have no right to prophesy in the name of the living God, but, as his servant I am entitled to the inspiration of his Holy Spirit, and if I am faithful in keeping his commandments, I should understand the whisperings of that Spirit and know how to act and when to act. I remember before we got into the World War, (I had been called to render service for my country before that time), that on the way to a priesthood meeting held in this building, I mentioned to my father, Joseph F. Smith, who was then president of this Church, that I thought something should be said to the men who were assembled as to how they should conduct themselves in case we should be called upon to defend and uphold the spirit of freedom and liberty. During that meeting, father turned to me and requested that I make the statement I thought necessary. Briefly it was this, that (at that time) I could not see how we could possibly avoid getting into war, for the principles upon which our nation was founded obligated us to assist in the cause of peace and freedom. I was concerned for our boys, and I advised that they immediately fill up the organizations of our state troops, that they join the national guard, which afterward became the 145th, that they get in, then, before final enlistments and drives should come. Nothing had been said of a draft at that time. And many of you bishops and presidents of stakes and fathers went home and, realizing the situation, advised your boys to enlist in their local units, where they could have the companionship of one another, where they could have in a measure, that spirit under which they grew and developed, to be with them during their enlistment, and their war experience, if such experiences should come to them. And finally they were mobilized and ordered to the Coast, and after a period of training were brought home and encamped at Fort Douglas. Then orders came to move on. For some days these boys were seen lined up at the Beehive House or Church offices, awaiting a blessing. Day after day it was my pleasure to be with my father as he gave blessings to those boys—your boys—going out to serve their country in a righteous cause. And in every case, as I recall, the blessing pronounced upon their head, gave them the promise that if they would keep themselves clean, obey the laws of the land, remember their God, say their prayers in faith and humility, and keep the commandments of the Lord, they would go and return uninjured. As I heard father pronounce those words time and again on those boys, and as I saw them leave, not knowing what minute they would be on their way, yet with joy in their souls because of the comforting promise, I paused to wonder! One day in the lull, I turned to father and asked, "What is there that impresses you to make this promise? When we read of the great slaughter and destruction on the other side, it seems to me the only possible thing that can cause your promise to come true will be the termination of the war before the boys get there." He answered: "I do not know whether they shall be called to go into battle or not, but this I do know, for the Lord has given me to understand and know; that promise is made to these young men through their faithfulness, and if they abide the commandments of God, they shall return." Well, the rest of the story you know. They served and met every requirement and returned home again to engage in their pursuits of life uninjured.

I am reminded of them by General Summerall's having been here. Perhaps it is not just proper to mention these things at this time, but I do it because I want you to know that we as a people are looked upon by the men who are responsible for our country's defense, as being outstanding in our willingness to serve. May I mention one more incident which goes to show their feeling toward us.

At the close of the conference I attended in Washington last March, General Cheatham, the presiding officer, stood up to give the closing address. He made this statement. "We have in this body today, an officer who has travelled a great distance. You know very little of the district from which he comes. I am going to take the opportunity of asking him to address us at this time." He called upon me to address that conference. And I did so—but not upon military affairs alone. I bore testimony to them of the goodness of God to this people. I told them that we believed God had established this nation and that it should be a land of liberty forever, and that we believed it was our duty to defend it against evil and designing people. When I had finished and sat down, that body of men arose as one man, and I was somewhat bewildered. General Cheatham stood up and said, "I am on the program to deliver the final address of this conference, but I feel that anything I should say would only detract from the remarks which we have just listened to. I am going to let the remarks of Major Smith stand as the closing remarks of this conference. You are adjourned."

I stood there, as men crowded around me wanting to know something more. They questioned me on the way to the hotel. Some followed me to the station, and even to the train. One of those men shook my hand as I was standing upon the step of the car as it was moving off and said, "I am going home, and I am going to say to my dear old father-in-law that I have at last found a man who is willing to stand up under any conditions and circumstances and say that he knows that God lives, that Jesus is the Christ;" for I had borne that testimony to them. Now I am beginning to realize why Bishop—now President—Nibbey sanctioned my going into that work. I am a peace-loving person, and I have discovered in my association with these men that they are not warlike; the men who are directing the affairs of the Army of the United States, are not seeking war, they are putting their time and best thoughts and energies to devising means of preventing war and establishing peace.

The theme of this conference has been, obey the law. Some of us know enough to obey the law, for we appreciate that through obedience to law we are blessed. There are others who feel that it is proper to obey the law when there is danger in breaking the law of being caught and punished; some who obey the law when it is convenient; for that reason, it is necessary that we should have peace officers to protect those who are peace-loving, just and honest. When men cultivate the Spirit of God, when they learn to love God, when they can put out of their souls and their very lives, the spirit of selfishness, covetousness and envy, then will the need of peace officers be lessened and perhaps done away. But as long as individuals are seeking their own ends, regardless of the effect of their actions upon the peace and safety of others, we cannot hope for that condition which God has promised to come through our obedience to his laws. As long as that condition exists, it will be necessary to have peace officers and armies.

And so I say, I am grateful to have had the privilege of becoming acquainted with these men, to go into the very details of their work, not to know merely theoretically what they are doing, but, through the records and their plans, to know just what they are looking for in the future. I find they are men of high ideals, men untrammelled by the course of politics. Army officers receive their position through appointment, upon merit. They go on year after year, and, as in the priesthood, if I may make a comparison, though not for a moment do I think there is an equality between the two, but only a similarity, for purpose of comparison. We hold the Priesthood, and under that Priesthood we are blessed as we honor it. We grow in intelligence and power to serve as we serve. One of our brethren has said during this conference, one thing that we want in this Church is more thought to the gospel doctrine, to the teachings of God. Let me add to that, and more real service, which permits us to apply that gospel and doctrine through actually doing the things of God; for it is not alone through the study of the work that we are to gain salvation, but through doing the things of God which actually require service. The army of the United States is built upon the same principle. Men develop as they serve and have ability to serve, and their knowledge enables them to go on, step by step. They are not there subject to any senator or politician. Unless because of misconduct, there is no power that can remove them other than the President of the United States, who is the Commander-in-Chief of the Army of the United States. That gives to them a freedom which enables them to speak from their heart that which they think. General Summerall, because of his position, is familiar with the record we have made as a people, which gave him foundation for the statement he made. As President Grant has said, "Thank the Lord he has said it, and thank the Lord he could truthfully say it."

Now, my brethren and sisters, I should not talk longer. I have not said what I intended to say. I wanted to say something about the Word of Wisdom and our missionary work. We have sitting over there in the tabernacle, 53 elders and nine lady missionaries. I wish you could have been with us last Wednesday night. We had been in session since early morning and when the time for dismissal came, they were not ready to go. They were full of questions. They put question after question. And it was 8:30 p. m. before we finally dismissed our little meeting. And yet in that group called to be missionaries, only eleven out of the 53 elders had assisted in baptisms, not one has ever confirmed a person a member of the Church, five have assisted in administering to the sick, three have assisted in consecrating oil, five have not assisted in the blessing of the bread or the water. Speaking of service, these are just every day things that should come to them at home and all of which will be required of them when they get into the missionfield. They are not at fault for not having had the privilege of performing these ordinances. We should see to it that these experiences come to them. This opportunity for service should come to them before they go into the missionfield. Many of them come here without a testimony of the gospel. Let me remind you, that a testimony of the gospel comes only through work. President Young said that more men gain a testimony of this gospel while upon their feet than while upon their knees. We can pray from now to the end of our days, and prayer alone may not bring a testimony of this work. But through prayer and actual service, we do get a testimony.

Don't you know that every individual that comes into this world with the promise of the new and everlasting covenant, has embodied in his very soul a testimony of this gospel? That testimony we may liken to the parable of the Savior regarding the sower; some of the seed, when sown, falls upon stony ground, where it is picked up by the birds and devoured; some in shallow soil, where it sprouts and grows for a little season and withers and dies; some in soil where it grows up with the weeds, and the weeds choke it and prevent its growth; and some in good soil, where it grows and develops and brings forth fruit in abundance. That is the condition of our boys and our girls, and it is our duty as Latter-day Saints, as men holding the Priesthood, as mothers and fathers in Israel, not to wait until our boys get into the missionfield before that seed is watered and cultivated and cared for, that it may grow into a testimony and into service. That should be developed at home. From the moment of birth, the home, the parents, are responsible. The bishops of the wards are responsible with the parents for providing a means for development for these young men.

Now, my brethren and sisters, I must not talk longer. I rejoice in this privilege I have of being with you. I pray God to bless you. I rejoice in the fact that I have fellowship with you in this Church! I take a pride in it. I have found that it is for me a condition of honor wherever I go; for the people of the world are beginning to look upon your works, your faith, your lives, and your teachings as an example to be followed. To be one with you, to partake of these blessings, to partake of these privileges, is indeed a most wonderful opportunity, and I thank God for that blessing and that privilege. May his blessings continue with us. May we always be found serving in faith, that we may be entitled to his promised blessings, I pray; in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The choir sang the anthem: "A prayer of thanksgiving."

The closing prayer was offered by Elder Don Carlos Young.

SECOND OVERFLOW MEETING

At 2 o'clock p. m., October 9, 1927, a second overflow meeting was held in the Assembly Hall.

Elder John Wells, of the Presiding Bishopric, presided.

The music and song were given by the Ensign ward choir, Wallace Bennett, conductor; Tracy Y. Cannon at the organ.

The choir sang, "Now let us rejoice in the day of salvation."

The opening prayer was by Elder Charles B. Felt.

An anthem, "Send out thy light," was sung by the choir.

ELDER LEE R. TAYLOR

President of the Nebo Stake

I certainly trust that the prayer offered shall be answered and fulfilled in my behalf. I feel a very weak instrument at this time in attempting to proclaim the gospel of our Lord and Master to you, but nevertheless with Paul, "I am not ashamed of the gospel, because it is the power of God unto salvation" to all those who accept its principles and live them. If considerable time and care were taken in the preparation of a questionnaire, scattered very generally, and collected, and the results tabulated, and if the main question in that document were this, "What is the great aim of life?" I am sure that the answers compiled, and the meanings boiled down to their last stages, it would be something like this, especially to the non-members of the Church, that the great object of life is to have a rich, full, abundant life. The answer of the Latter-day Saints could possibly be something like this, "To be saved and exalted in God's kingdom is the prime aim and object of life."

If we were to outline the plan whereby this aim could be accomplished, I think it would well come under three heads or divisions: first, to develop right attitudes—proper ideals, if you please; second, to develop knowledge, or the intellect; and third, to develop proper habits or to do the will of God.

With our first proposition, then, we must develop right attitudes or the proper ideals in life. We must know and teach our children to know that what we are to be, each day, each moment, each hour, we are becoming. And in the words of Thackeray, we must also know that "we sow an act, we reap a habit; we sow a habit, we reap a character; we sow a character, and we reap a destiny" in life. I sometimes wonder if our attitude in life does not depend very much more upon faith than it does upon reason. Please do not misunderstand me; as important as reason is in this life, and it is the power to reason that chiefly distinguishes man from the lower animals, yet there are too many people in the world today who accept this doctrine alone and quit at the point that it discontinues. That, it seems to me, is one of the tragedies of life, to accept only reason. Accepting only that, I doubt if one can have the proper ideals or proper attitude toward life; because faith begins largely where reason ends. Reason may be said to be finite, while faith has no limits. Think of a person who tried to live, who does live, only in the realm of reason, who has shut out from his existence the great field outside of the field of reason—faith. No Latter-day Saint could possibly stop with reason alone. I am sure that testimonies generally are not gained by reasoning them out. We go as far as we can by reason, and then we depend upon a higher source, and that higher source takes us into the realm of faith and makes possible the proper ideals and the proper attitudes of life.

Our second proposition: we must develop knowledge, the intellect. Herein comes the great battle against ignorance. Intelligence is the glory of God. To know what a wonderful thing that is in life, to know, not to be driven by every wind of doctrine but at all times to be able to make decisions, to reach conclusions, through reason and through faith and thereby reach our second great aim to our salvation and exaltation in life. And I sometimes wonder if we take the time that we should, as true Latter-day Saints, to teach our children, in order that they may know. How many evenings, how many Sunday mornings, or Sunday afternoons, when the hours are long, do you call others about you, your children particularly? I am most interested at this moment in the children, in the young people of our Church, for next to creating a human soul, the divinest thing is to educate it aright. How many times do we call them around about us and teach them to pray? How many boys and girls can repeat from memory the Lord's prayer, the Beatitudes, the Articles of Faith, and can give a reason for the hope that is within them regarding each of these? How quickly they grasp them! You would be surprised how they drink them in. And I sometimes think that as teachers of this Church, and as exponents of the great gospel of Christ, we overlook a valuable opportunity in teaching our boys and girls so that they will know, will have the power to decide in the hour of temptation.

Our third proposition is that of developing right habits. This, the power to do, is the most important, I'm sure, of the three; because it is not a matter of what we say or what we know but what we do in life that is going to determine our happiness, our destiny, our salvation, and our exaltation. Would that somehow we had the power, that we knew the process, the formula, if you please, of transferring or working over that which we know so that it will be a guide to that which we do. I believe the nearest formula that we have, and which will insure the greatest success, is to start in life young, always to do the right and to keep in mind that that which we are to be, every moment, every hour, we are becoming.

And last, we must, in order to gain our aims and objectives in life, enrich the lives of others. How often others may be about us who would like to know the things that we know, who perhaps do not have the peace of mind that we possess regarding some of these eternal principles. And yet we are fearful that we might offend, or we are fearful that someone else could do it better, and as a result some of our near neighbors, some of our friends in life, go through without the proper perspective of this gospel.

It was a joy in our stake, quite recently, to have a very devout Christian man come back into the Church after an absence of 37 years. Through lack of understanding, largely through the lack of a kind word, a warm handclasp, a sympathetic and confidential chat, as others met him upon the corner, he felt that the Saints, that the Church were against him. Let me implore you, my brothers and sisters, not to let any opportunities pass in life to enrich the lives of others, to make them conscious of the great purposes of life. As to how it may be accomplished: first, by our attitudes, our proper ideals; second, by the knowledge that we gain; and last, by our habits or the things in life we do.

In conclusion, let me read the words of one who has said something that appeals to me very much.

"One ship drives east and another drives west
 With the self-same winds that blow.
 'Tis the set of the sails and not the gales
 That tell the way to go.
 Like the winds of the sea are the winds of Fate;
 We may joy along through life,
 But 'tis the set of the sail that decides the gale;
 And not the calm or the strife."

It is a pleasure, at this time, to tell you that I feel very deeply the truthfulness of this gospel, and I bear you this testimony, and I do it in humble prayer, in the name of Jesus Christ. Amen.

ELDER JOHN H. WHITE

President of the Yellowstone Stake

My brethren and sisters: I feel indeed humble in occupying this position, and most sincerely trust that the Spirit of the Lord may come to my aid. This is one position where one is solely dependent upon the Spirit of God, if he shall utter the things that are most profitable. I have been interested in the remarks of President Taylor in giving us the principal keys, motives, the attitude that should direct us in life. I was thinking about the words of the Lord to the children of Israel, "The Lord hath chosen thee to be a peculiar people unto himself." Living in this age of the world there is oftentimes a tendency among Latter-day Saints to try to be so much like those of other churches that there appears to be no means of determining whether they are Latter-day Saints or members of some other church, or of none at all. I think it is well that we try to impress the world and our associates that we are a distinct people—not that we hold ourselves as better than they, except as we may do better, but principally for the fact that we bear a message which no other people is in possession of.

How may we obtain a testimony of the gospel? No doubt a number of those who heard the teachings of Jesus doubted the divinity of his calling, and he read their thoughts and said, "My doctrine is not mine, but his that sent me. If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." We Latter-day Saints say to the people of the world, that if they will accept of the doctrines of "Mormonism," in faith and in the spirit of true repentance and humility, they, too, may obtain such a testimony.

There are certain features or blessings that characterize faith and obedience to the gospel. The Savior in commissioning his disciples, before sending them out to preach, gave them promises that certain blessings should follow those who would obey. Among those promises were the gift of faith, and the gift of prophesy. My attention is now directed to some incidents that have been of peculiar interest to me coming from the Snake River valley. Many, many years ago, when most of the section now comprised in the Yellowstone stake was in its rough state, there was one section covered with large sagebrush lying level and beautiful. No water had yet been taken out of the river, and just a few people resided there, struggling against adverse conditions and almost discouraged because of the dryness of the soil. One of the brethren of the Council of the Twelve was present with a little body of Saints in our stake. A brother remarked to him, as the visitor was being entertained at his home, "I have dug a hole here in the hope of getting water, but I suppose it is hopeless." The visiting brother, being inspired of the Lord, said to the brother, "Do not fill up the well; you will yet have water in the well, and that within a short time." They had already gone through a few years of trial and had made similar attempts but without success. But within a year following that prophecy, water appeared in that well. Since that time everyone who desired it has obtained water. Water is plentiful. That section, then so barren and uninviting, is the paradise of the upper Snake river valley, the famed Egin bench.

Another incident comes to me. In 1909, when our stake was organized, two of the brethren, shortly after the selection of the presidency, and a few other stake officers, proceeded with the new presidency to different parts of the stake to set the wards in order. They went into one ward, which previous to that time had been a part of the Fremont stake. There was a vacancy in the bishopric, one counselor. These brethren made the visit to select the other counselor. As they sat in the little ward chapel, with its pulpit in the west and the entrance at the east, they went over the matter, trying to determine upon the right man to fill the vacancy. But they could hardly find one who seemed, according to the judgment of the bishop, to be the right man. While they were yet discussing the matter, a brother opened the door to the east and called out across the room to one of the brethren sitting on the stand, "Brother, you are wanted on the outside." Our visiting brother beckoning to him said, "Brother come in, come in." Turning to the brethren behind, he said, "Brethren, there is your man." He had no knowledge of having ever seen that man before. Who told him that that was the man to fill the place in the bishopric? What spirit told him that that man was even a member of the Church? The man was selected, and I am a living witness to the fact that he served in that capacity faithfully and well for a number of years, even up to his death.

I could enumerate a number of such incidents as proof of the fulfillment of the promise made by the Savior that these signs shall follow them that believe.

I wish to support most heartily the remarks of President Taylor with reference to teaching in the home. I fear, brethren and sisters, that we are not giving enough attention to the training of our children in the home. Too often parents thrust the entire responsibility of training their children upon the organizations of the Church, forgetting that at the hearthstone, where the family may assemble and have their family prayer and devotion, is the place where the most important training and the greatest impression may be given.

Let me say further, that I sometimes feel that our people trust their children too much—not that we wish to lack faith in our children, but remember they are human. With the many temptations about us, sometimes those children, and perhaps we as well, do things that are not always in keeping with the Spirit of the Lord. Sometimes some friend would feel to give us warning of dangers that beset our children, and we turn them aside and say, "I do not believe a word of it." I think it is well to give heed to any kind word that may come from our neighbor. I invite it from our good neighbors. If they can help my wife and me by offering us a suggestion of how dangers may be avoided, with which our children are confronted, we will thank them for it.

Another thing, brothers and sisters, that impresses me. I believe that the important factors that contribute vitally to the development of our children and to the advancement of the Lord's purposes is the education of our children in our Church schools where they may be prepared to go into the world as ministers of the word of God. We note that when they return home they seem to bring life and spirit into our wards. I hope, brothers and sisters, that we will look upon the privilege granted us of sending our sons and daughters abroad as a very important opportunity; it means so much to the lives of these young people even aside from the great good they may do in carrying the truth to the people of the earth.

I wish before closing, to bear you my humble testimony. I know the gospel which we have embraced is the gospel of Jesus Christ, that it possesses all the saving principles that will protect and preserve us, make us happy in life and prepare us for a future in the eternities.

May the Lord give us faith. May we always have the spirit of humility and a desire to do his will, I humbly pray, in Jesus' name. Amen.

ELDER WILLIAM R. PALMER

President of the Parowan Stake

It is a bit disconcerting, I assure you, my brethren and sisters, to be called out of the congregation and asked to occupy a portion of the time of these meetings, at which the Saints have gathered from almost the ends of the earth to be fed the bread of life. I am tremendously impressed with the responsibility that rests upon the elder who presumes to occupy even a few brief minutes of this precious time, and I desire very much the support of your faith and prayers, to the end that the Lord will bless me with his Spirit, and draw from me those things which he would have you receive. I believe that it is quite as much the privilege of the congregation to receive the blessings of inspiration and to receive it through the speaker as it is the privilege of the speaker to have that inspiration.

I have been impressed with the strength and the growth everywhere evident in the Church. When we see the Saints gather at these great conferences, the young people mingling with the old, it is evidence sufficient that faith is not dead, but that the Church is growing in strength and in power and in influence.

I was impressed this morning with the talks that were given by President Charles W. Nibley and by Elder Stephen L. Richards on those two somewhat commonplace principles of our faith, tithing and the Word of Wisdom. They expounded those principles much better than I could ever hope to do, but in the few brief moments of the time allotted to me; I desire to bear my testimony to you of the blessings that accompany the living of those principles. I like to find some logical connection between the promises of the gospel and the experience of my every-day life. I am not one of those who look for the mysterious, the mystic, and the miraculous. I like to read of the blessings, the promises, and their fulfilment, in the every-day affairs of my life and in every-day experiences. And it is in this light that I desire to interpret to you my understanding of these precious principles of truth.
